This would include such sacred sites as Hebron and the Cave of the Patriarchs, and Shechem, the burial place of Joseph.

"It is for our own interest," he insisted. "The state will only survive if it is both Jewish and democratic."

The idea of an Israel with more than 3.5 million Arabs is unacceptable, he said. "If we give them the right to vote, there is no more Jewish state – it will be binational. If we don't, the state is not democratic, and we would have a kind of apartheid."

It would be agonizingly painful to give up such holy places as Shechem, or Hebron. But he sees it as similar to an operation – "sometimes you may have to amputate part of the body to save a life."

Rabbi Gilad said Israeli society is coming to realize that the concepts held by the extremes are collapsing. The left, he said, offered peace, but they were rejected. The right has said that if Israel just stays strong, everything will be all right – which is also not true.

Both sides are less sure about the absolute correctness of their own positions, he said, and are therefore becoming more open to listening to each other and making compromises.

The yeshiva he founded, Yeshivat Ma'ale Gilboa, aims to develop students of Torah with similar views. Like the hesder yeshivot, they combine religious studies with army services. Unlike hesder, however, they do a complete army stint.

The students are exposed to diverse opinions, both religious and political. They are encouraged to question all these views. "We can't pretend that questions and other points of view don't exist. They must be prepared with answers.

"We want to develop good soldiers with a a strong moral sense," Rabbi Gilad said. "We want them to remember that even in war, humans are created in the image of God, and must be treated with respect."

He told the story of a soldier from his yeshiva who was involved in searching a Palestinian house. The woman of the house was hysterical about her sick baby. The soldier instantly called the army medic, who gave the baby medicine.

"That's what a Jewish army should be," he said.

Common historical narrative links all Jews: educator

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

How can Jews attain unity if they are so different?

According to Israeli educator Avraham Infeld, this conundrum is the main challenge facing the Jewish world today.

Infeld, who works to foster Jewish identity within the context of pluralism and the centrality of Israel, told a recent breakfast meeting that various gaps among Jews may be bridgeable despite the glaring lack of uniformity in contemporary Jewish life.

Jewish unity, he explained in an off-the-cuff talk sponsored by the Jewish Agency, stands on five legs: memory, family, Mt. Sinai, the Land of Israel and the State of Israel and the Hebrew language.

A traditional Jew who wears a kippah, Infeld is founder and president emeritus of Melitz, a non-profit group whose aim is to strengthen Israel's relationship with the Diaspora. He is also associated with Hillel, the university campus group.

He spoke to members of Hashomer Hatzair, Habonim Dror, Young Judea and B'nai Brith Youth Organization at the Lipa Green Building.

Jewish memory – the common historical narrative – binds Jews together, said Infeld, who immigrated to Israel from South Africa in 1959 at age 16.

"You can't survive as a Jew without relating to this narrative." Then, for emphasis, he asserted, "It's not history. It's memory."

Speaking of family, he observed, "We're not a religion or a nation – but a family." Calling Israel a "family enterprise and a family undertaking," Infeld said that "without this spirit of family, none of this makes sense."

The giving of the Torah at Mt. Sinai, he continued, gave Jews a perspective on the world and sacred commitments to keep.

Jews should bear witness to God's existence, he said. But, warning of the intrinsic hazards in that statement, he added that human beings cannot arrogate that role to themselves.

Avraham Infeld

"You can't be a god. There is no greater criminal than a person who thinks he's God – from Haman and Hitler to Saddam Hussein."

As well, Jews should try to make the planet a better place. "We in Israel don't talk about tikkun olam enough. A better world is not only for Jews, but for everyone, including the Palestinians."

The Land of Israel and the State of Israel are not identical, he said. "The land, all of it, every inch, is the warehouse of Jewish memory."

But the land has nothing to do with political sovereignty, he added. In an oblique reference to possible future talks between Israel and the Palestinians, and in a plea for moderation and realism, he said: "Hebron means more to me than Tel Aviv, but I intend to give up Hebron, not Tel Aviv."

Infeld said the transformation of Hebrew "from a living to a spoken language" was a major revolution, since language transmits culture and, by definition, memory.

Infeld, who drew up the first itinerary for the Birthright program, urged Israeli political leaders to start talking about Jewish unity from his perspective.

"Very few do, and it's a tragedy."

He singled out two Israelis as exceptions – right-wing politician Benny Begin and left-wing politician Yossi Sarid.

Infeld, who described himself as a leftist in Israeli political terms, said that Israel's future as a democracy is totally dependent on its treatment of Israeli Arabs, a minority comprising 19 per cent of its population.

In an interview, he said Israeli Arab citizens do not have the same access to national resources as their Jewish counterparts.

"We're not spending 19 per cent of our educational resources on them," he said, referring to Israeli Arabs. "And they're not receiving 19 per cent of social benefits."

Calling Israeli Arabs "an amazingly loyal population," Infeld said they have grown estranged from Israel since the outbreak of the second intifadah.

Asked whether he agrees with the assessment that Israeli Arabs are second-class citizens, he noted: "They are not equal citizens. They are equal under the law, but equality does not exist in fact."

Turning to current political issues, Infeld said he favours a two-state solution and a unilateral Israeli withdrawal from most of the territories as the way to defuse Israel's conflict with the Palestinians.

"I'm motivated by one thing: to make sure Israel remains a democratic Jewish state. This can be obtained by transfer, which is immoral, or by dividing the land."

Life at a fairly non-Jewish university

By LEORA BERESKIN

When I first told my parents I wanted to go away for university, they thought it was fine – until I told them that instead of going to McGill University or the University of Western Ontario, I wanted to go to the University of Waterloo.

There are not many Jews in Waterloo, my mother explained to me. My parents sweated and slaved for years to put me and my siblings through Hebrew school. As my mother said, if I married outside the faith, I'd have to pay them all that money back. Plus interest.

But I insisted that I wanted to go to UW – where the Jewish student population is 500, compared to 3,000 at Western and 3,500 at McGill – and that I'd find a way to be part of the Jewish community. I figured there would be tons of other Jewish students in Waterloo for me to hang out with. Right?

Well, sort of. The first close friend I made when I came last year was a Muslim girl from Pakistan.

I had spent all my earlier years in Jewish and predominantly Jewish schools, so it had been easy for me to isolate myself from the rest of the world. It's not quite as easy to do that in a diverse environment like Waterloo. Here I have been exposed to many different cultures and religions, and have exposed other students to Judaism.

In my first year, at least four people came up to me and said I was the first Jewish person they'd ever met. Some made anti-Semitic comments, like a Muslim acquaintance who told me that Israel isn't a real country. But overall, I had great experiences, and learned that most people are incredibly tolerant.

After the Sept. 11 attacks, while the television was showing the Palestinians dancing on the streets in celebration, I watched my Muslim friends cry along with everyone else. It can be so easy to make judgments about other cultures when you don't actually know the people.

My parents had agreed to let me go to Waterloo on one condition – that I become involved with the Jewish Students Association (JSA). I figured the best way for me to stay active with the JSA was to join the executive. Planning campus activities allowed me to meet many people that I wouldn't have met if I had just gone to the events.

Occasionally, I found it difficult to balance school with all the Jewish holidays. I had far too much work to come into Toronto for Yom Kippur last year, so instead, I went to one of the two local synagogues, Beth Jacob. I can't even begin to explain how kind the people were to me. An amazingly nice family invited me over to their house to break the fast.

It is very difficult to miss class at Waterloo, so when I stayed here for Yom Kippur last year, I went to two of my classes. Many of my secular Jewish friends don't observe the holidays at all, but it's hard to tell if that's because they are overwhelmed by the pressures of school, or if they just don't want to observe the holidays.

Last year, I had to miss two lab exams scheduled on the same days as the Pesach seders. I found my professors sympathetic, but there wasn't a lot they could do for me. One of the exams was re-scheduled for two days after the seder. But there was no alternative time for me to write the other one, so the mark allocation from that exam was added onto my final exam, making the final worth 70 per cent of my total grade. But things worked out.

I've already forgotten most of what I learned in first year. If you ask me about the scientific term "equilibrium constants," I'll just shrug. But if you ask me about being a Jewish student in a fairly non-Jewish university, I can go on and on, both about the difficulties and the incredible benefits.

Leora Bereskin is a biology major at the University of Waterloo.

Reflections on Israel program and Jewish unity

Four Canadian Grade 12 students were among this year's 26 Bronfman Youth Fellows. Along with their American counterparts, they took part in a five-week program in Israel this summer aimed at developing future community leaders committed to Jewish unity. The participants, who attended a Bronfman reunion in New York last month, shared some thoughts on the program now that they're back in their own communities.

Talya Kagedan

Yonah Krakowsky

Hannah Mayne

Talie Shalmon

Talya Kagedan, Yitzhak Rabin High School, Ottawa: While I definitely have a greater understanding of North American Judaism and the many streams within it, I returned with a renewed sense of pride in my practice of modern Orthodoxy. I am incredibly fortunate to have been granted the opportunity to develop such close relationships with 25 of the most amazing teenagers I have yet to meet.

Yonah Krakowsky, Yeshivat Or Chaim, Toronto: The importance of tolerance within the Jewish community was always clear in my mind. The summer gave me a chance to look into the lives of other Jewish teenagers practising Judaism in ways I would otherwise be unaware of... Perhaps most importantly, the summer has allowed me to question what I do and why I do it, a process that has [allowed] and will continue to allow me to strengthen who I am within Orthodoxy.

Hannah Mayne, Lisgar Collegiate Institute, Ottawa: I've grown as a person, I've developed new skills, and I've made friendships that are going to last me the rest of my life. Before the reunion, it was like any other summer program. When I came home in the fall, I thought it was an amazing summer and that's it. Just seeing my friends again at the reunion made me realize that this is totally different from any camp experience I've been on. We were continuing in a huge way our friendship, our studies and our learning. We had a full, intensive two days. That really sunk in deep: this is for life.

Talie Shalmon, Earl Haig Secondary School, Toronto: Mostly it was the people that made it special – the other students and also the rabbis. Before Bronfman, I didn't really know that much about Judaism and other denominations. I'm not really part of any denomination. It's a cultural thing, not just a religious thing. That's what I thought before. Most of the other students go to synagogue every Saturday. Most were Reform or Conservative; I think there were four Orthodox kids. The majority of people weren't Orthodox, so I sort of felt I had to be more religious. Then I found that what I do is right for me.

Hezbollah: a deep threat to regional security

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The story late last month that Israel had arrested a lieutenant colonel on charges of suspicion of spying for Hezbollah sent shockwaves well beyond Israel's shores.

As it turned out, Israel arrested 10 men, all members of Israel's Bedouin community, which has had a record of solid loyalty to the Israel Defence Forces (IDF). Allegedly, the Iranian-backed Hezbollah bribed the men with drugs and cash to provide information about Israel's troop movements and monitoring activities along its northern border.

Yet beyond this particularly unsettling case lies a far deeper and more troubling story – a story that needs more attention in the daily press – about Hezbollah's fanatically anti-Israeli and anti-Jewish campaign, whose tentacles reach well into the West Bank, the Gaza Strip and even into areas of Israel itself.

In riveting, frightening detail, Jeffrey Goldberg of The New Yorker has told the story in a two-part, 17,000-word, must-read article, "In the Party of God" (Oct. 14 and 28). In so doing, he has supplied journalists with enough raw material for many follow-up reports. Among the details are the following:

Influential figures in the U.S. intelligence community consider Hezbollah "the most successful terrorist organization in modern history" and "the role model" for other international terrorist organizations.

Before Sept. 11, Hezbollah's operations mastermind, Imad Mugniyah, was generally considered the world's most dangerous terrorist. A former member of Force 17, Palestinian Authority (PA) President Yasser Arafat's personal bodyguard, he reports to a branch of Iran's elite Revolutionary Guard called the "Jerusalem Force."

Mugniyah reportedly helped organize the "Karine A" ship loaded with Iragian heavy arms, which was destined for PA areas and intercepted by Israel in the Red Sea. He also apparently has close ties with Iranian-backed Islamic Jihad and even with Al Qaeda.

"A main focus today appears to be the training of specifically anti-Israel militants in the science of constructing so-called 'mega-bombs,' devices that can bring down office towers and other large structures," writes Goldberg.

Hezbollah's chief spokesman, Hassan Ezzedin, said that former Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak pulled the IDF out of south Lebanon because Jews, unlike Muslims, feared death: "Life doesn't end when you die," said Ezzedin. "To us, there is real life after death. Reaching the afterlife is the goal of life. Once you have in mind the goal of dying, you stop fearing the Jews."

Goldberg's lengthy article makes it clear that any effort to distinguish between Hezbollah's radical military wing and its supposedly benign social/political wing is illusory. "Hezbollah is, at its core, a jihadist organization" dedicated to a rigid Islamic state and to the destruction of Israel.

Hezbollah leader Sheikh Nasralah, whose presence at the recent Francophonie conference in Beirut embarrassed Prime Minister Jean Chrétien, has declared that "we all have an extraordinary historic opportunity to finish off the entire cancerous Zionist project."

Hezbollah possesses approximately 8,000 rockets, including some that can reach Israel's industrial heartland. In a U.S. attack on Iraq, Hezbollah could open a front against Israel (as could Iraq). Israel has repeatedly warned Syria – and Iran, Hezbollah's sponsor – that it will be held accountable for any such attack.

Given the threat that Hezbollah poses to Israel's security in particular and to regional stability in general, we can only hope that Goldberg's piece serves as a wake-up call to everyone.

CJN Hamilton correspondent retires after 30 years

By PHYLLIS SHRAGGE
Hamilton Correspondent

HAMILTON — During her 30 years as Hamilton correspondent for The Canadian Jewish News until her retirement last February, Moura Wolpert was determined to give 100 per cent to the job.

She couldn't imagine missing an important meeting of a Jewish organization. The thought of not interviewing a new dignitary in the community seemed incomprehensible. For most of the 30 years, she was single-handedly responsible for reporting on the Hamilton scene and she was going to do it right.

"I used to go to every meeting," she said. A self-described perfectionist, Wolpert said she attended meetings of Jewish organizations for background information, not just to get a story.

After countless meetings, speeches and interviews, Wolpert has nothing but positive recollections about the work. In fact, if it weren't for health problems, she says she would likely still be out there covering every significant event with unceasing commitment.

Wolpert has no qualms about discussing her past battles with cancer and heart disease, and her recent health problems, including osteoporosis, arthritis and spinal stenosis (pain in the back and legs caused by narrowing of the spinal canal).

But she gives the impression that these are just bumps in the road.

In an interview, she said that when she first began reporting on the Hamilton Jewish community for The CJN, she wondered if there would be enough stories. "I was amazed at what I could find. The job turned to be a good deal better than I expected."

When she and her husband Bernard moved to Hamilton in 1955, she devoted her time to raising their small children, Nina and Michael. When their youngest child, Michael, began high school Wolpert found a job at the weekly Burlington Gazette.

"I was terrified. I'm the type of person who says 'yes,' then thinks about it afterwards. I wondered what I had let myself in for.

"The first day I started work, I was sent to a meeting regarding a problem with the postal service in town. I started taking notes and I couldn't keep up. I thought, there goes my job. I thought I had blown it.

"After the meeting, my editor told me to write three pages, double-spaced. Somehow I managed to do it.

"Later the editor came out of his office, and with a grin from there to here, he said: 'You're a natural.'"

The job at the Gazette provided great experience, she said. Unfortunately, four months later, the editor and most of the staff he had hired, including Wolpert, were fired.

Moura Wolpert

"I was itching for something to do."

Then came along the opportunity to work for The CJN. She said she derived tremendous satisfaction from the writing process. "When I had been home with the children, I wrote endless letters to family and friends. I guess it was an outlet for writing."

Wolpert was born in Danzig (now Gdansk, Poland), which was then an independent city-state on the Baltic Sea.

The family moved to France when she was about four, then to Germany and Denmark. She attended a number of schools, including a boarding school in Italy.

Recalling her "erratic education... no science, just a lot of art, music and literature," Wolpert says she is multi-lingual, speaking Russian (which was the language spoken in her home), German, French and "somewhat rusty" Italian.

"My father said he wanted water between himself and the Nazis," so the family moved to London when she was 15.

In her late teens, Wolpert, who has no formal journalistic training, wrote for the Habonim newsletter in London. She later got a job with the British Film Institute writing reviews of educational films and wrote film reviews for a British teenage girls magazine. She was also an editorial secretary for a quarterly published by Penguin Books.

She wrote articles about the British film industry that were translated into Spanish and were published in three Latin American magazines. Eventually she became an editorial assistant at the London Observer.

She and Bernard met in London and married after the war. In 1954, they moved to Montreal. "It was a tremendous culture shock. I missed the theatre... and worst of all, there were no public libraries," Wolpert said.

"When we moved to Hamilton the following year, I felt much more comfortable," she said.

Wolpert wants to continue writing. "I'd like to try essays. I've got all kinds of ideas floating around in my head."

HALIFAX — Six German teenagers and two of their teachers stand out among millions of German citizens who are eager to forget the horrors World War II brought for millions of their Jewish compatriots.

The six high school students of Thomas Heuss Gymnasium of Dinslaken, in western Germany, have completed a two-week tour of Atlantic Canadian high schools and universities, telling Canadians what the Holocaust means to today's German youth.

They presented a program of slides, posters and emotional words on the history of the Holocaust in their town, how the Holocaust is taught in their schools and how their research has helped them understand a dark period of their country's history.

"People here [in Canada] and at home think it's a good thing we're doing," says 19-year-old Sarah Freck, a Grade 13 student. "Even though I'm graduating, I'm so involved in this I won't forget, can't forget. It's so important in our history."

The tour was initiated by University of Kings College professor Dorota Glowacka, daughter of Holocaust victims, who met survivor Fred Spiegel of New Jersey at a Holocaust conference last March. Spiegel was a resident of Dinslaken before the war and, as a child, survived the horror of World War II, eventually settling in the United States.

"He told me about the students, which he met, and suggested they travel in Canada," said Glowacka.

The students funded the trip on their own, receiving some administrative assistance from the Atlantic Jewish Council and being billeted in most communities they visited, including Moncton, Saint John and Fredericton.

"We've put a lot of expenses on our credit cards," said Glowacka.

Thomas Heuss teacher Gabriella Khanna, who teaches English and geography to the student sextet, started the project in 1997 when the state of North Rhine Westphalia offered funding to begin a project on the following year's 50th anniversary of Israel and the 60th anniversary of Kristallnacht.

"My son, in high school at the time, pushed me into the project. There were three pupils at the start," she said. "We arranged a partnership with the community of Arad in Israel and had a student exchange until 2000 when it became unsafe for us to travel there. Their students still come to us each year, visit Holocaust sites and learn about our students, community and project."

Freck said the project has touched her deeply. "It's so incredible what happened, so cruel. I couldnt imagine that one man [Adolf Hitler] could make all this take place."

During the presentation, Grade 12 student Bert Noeldemann said there were 300 Jewish residents of the small town in 1938, but there is now one Jewish woman living there, Edith Marx, who returned about five years ago.

Grade 12 student Lisa Tekolf said the Holocaust is taught from kindergarten, through books and drawings.

"Children start to think about it at a young age," Tekolf said.

Students visit museums, memorials (there is a large one to the former Jewish community in Dinslaken) and synagogues in their region, said Grade 11 student Annika Schubert. "The best part is talking with our grandparents and with survivors, like Fred Spiegel, so we learn firsthand what happened."

Members of the Halifax Jewish community heard the students presentation at an overflow Beth Israel Synagogue breakfast. They saw pictures of Dinslaken, with a synagogue and Jewish schools and an orphanage in the 1930s, and today, with a memorial where a cemetery once stood and no synagogue or evidence of Jewish life.

"People will always deny there was a Holocaust," said Freck, "but we have to try to decrease the discrimination."

"When we ask older Germans about it, many lie and many say they couldn't speak up [during the war] because they were afraid," said Alexandra Sowka, 19. "But we feel we have to ensure it doesn't happen again."

Freck added, "We, as youth, don't have to feel guilty. We are often ashamed because it was our grandparents and our country and we are Germans, but we feel good about what we're doing to keep the story alive and to make sure people understand that it can't be forgotten."

They have discovered most Canadian students know little about the Holocaust. "There aren't a lot of questions," Freck said. "They just don't know what to ask."

CJA Family Affair: Fun with a cause

VANCOUVER — This year's Combined Jewish Appeal (CJA) Family Affair, held Sunday, Oct. 27 at the Jewish Community Centre of Greater Vancouver, was buzzing with activity and spirit. Attended by over a 1,000 people, the event included games and performances and food and goods to purchase. Children were entertained all day with music, dancers, carnival booths, face painters and a caricaturist.

At the centre of the event was Super Sunday, the CJA telethon. Almost 100 volunteers gave several hours each to make phone calls to members of the community. By the end of the day, more than 500 donors had made pledges totalling over $51,000, in addition to the $2.6 million CJA had already raised before Sunday's event.

Family Affair was a community event, showcasing more than 20 different communal agencies, including the Jewish Community Centre, which donated the space for the occasion.

CJA hopes to raise over $4.5 million before Dec. 1. The money provides financial resources for programs and services delivered by over 25 community agencies in Greater Vancouver. CJA also supports overseas programs that help the victims of terror in Israel and families from Argentina. As of Oct. 28, CJA donors had pledged close to $2.7 million.

Asper excoriates most media for anti-Israel bias

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – Media mogul Israel (Izzy) Asper delivered a scathing diatribe against much of the world's media for their biased treatment of Israel, at a State of Israel Bonds event last week.

"Too many of the journalists are lazy, or sloppy or stupid," Asper, the founder of the CanWest Global Communications Corp., told a crowd of 400 at the new Sofitel Montreal Hotel. "They are ignorant of the history of the subject on which they are writing. Others are – plain and simple – biased or anti-Semitic or are taken captive by simplistic ideology. The result is that the biggest casualties of the Palestinian-Israeli war are truth and the integrity of the media."

Winnipeg native Asper, 70, used the term "cancer" to convey how the media's credibility as well as the "world's favourable disposition towards [Israel]" have been eaten away by "dishonest reporting," a phrase he used repeatedly.

Asper emphasized that he was not speaking as head of CanWest Global, "but only as a concerned Canadian and a longtime journalist myself."

He spoke for 40 minutes, assailing coverage of the conflict by some of the world's most vaunted media, including the Washington Post and the New York Times, the Associated Press, the BBC, the major U.S. television networks, National Public Radio and the CBC.

Even CanWest media that "fall within this indictment" should take heed, Asper warned. "I will do all in my power to stamp out dishonest reporting, and biased reporting in any subject."

Asper said as far as Mideast coverage is concerned, much of the media have abandoned the basic principles of "honest" reporting.

"They have adopted Palestinian propaganda as the context of their stories. They have become partisans in, and not providers of, knowledge about this war against Israel."

This dishonest reporting, Asper said, "has made truth a casualty of the war, causing grievous damage to both Israel and the integrity of the journalistic profession, injuring all of us who practice it."

Asper cited a litany of examples of media misconduct, including prejudicial terminology, deliberate omissions, lack of context and several "fundamental big lies" most journalists take as accepted truths. Instead of the well-defined term "terror," biased media prefer "militants," "resistance fighters," "gunmen," "extremists," and even "commandos," he said.

"The terms 'cycle of violence,' 'moderate Arab states,' 'peace process,' 'occupied territories' and 'illegal settlements,'" Asper said, "have also become tools and weapons used by journalistic propagandists in their desire to create undeserved sympathy for the Palestinians and opprobrium for Israel."

The "first and worst big lie" is that the war is about "territory and Jerusalem, and about Palestinian statehood," instead of about destroying Israel, he said.

The second lie, he said, is that the latest "so-called" intifadah was triggered by Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's Temple Mount visit in Sept. 2000, which was used as a pretext to cover up Palestinian rejection of generous offers made by the Israelis at Camp David.

The third lie is that the current conflict is the result of Palestinians frustration over the peace process, rather than the latest chapter in a saga to destroy the idea of a Jewish state since the Balfour Declaration of 1917, Asper said.

Asper said the solution to the bias "starts on the campuses, and in the journalism schools, [and] then it goes to the boardrooms of the media owners, and finally, most importantly, with you, the public."

He urged the audience to demand that universities "re-take control of the teaching process… to ensure that hate is not taught, propaganda is not preached and that the revered term 'academic freedom' is never used as a licence for libel.

"We should withhold our financial support from those institutions that fail this obligation of educational integrity," he said.

Asper also urged the the audience to create "honest reporting response groups" and to become politically active, "to demand government policy consistent with fairness to, and support of, the only beacon of democracy in a swamp of hate, violence, and terrorism, the state of Israel."

Winnipeg judge follows in father's footsteps

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — There were a lot of legal discussions around the supper table when Martin Freedman, newly appointed to the Court of Appeal for Manitoba, was growing up.

"Sitting here today, I have to acknowledge that my father had a significant influence on my choice of career, even though he always tried to be non-directive," Freedman says.

He occupies the same office in the Manitoba Law Court Building that his father, the late Samuel Freedman, first Jewish chief justice in Canada, occupied until he retired in April 1983.

Martin Freedman's original career goal was the theatre. "I did some acting, singing, directing and producing at university and thought I would like to pursue that," he recalls.

"It didn't materialize, so I went to law school."

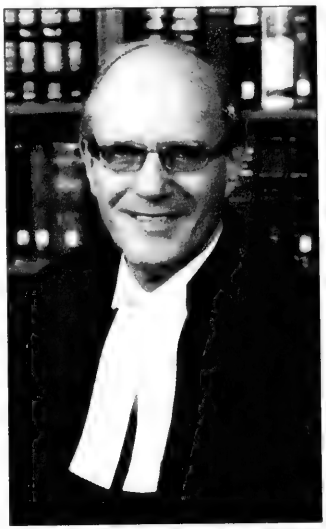
He graduated from law school with a number of awards including the Gold Medal and the Law Society of Manitoba Gold Medal.

After being called to the bar in 1963, he went into practice with Izzy Asper.

In 1969, Freedman joined the Aikins, MacAulay & Thorvaldson law firm while Asper joined forces with Harold Buchwald and Yude Henteleff.

"I loved practising law," he says.

"I found it very fulfilling. I had never really thought about applying to the court until a couple of years ago. As an arbitrator, my work was similar to that of a judge. I thought I would like to broaden my scope."



Justice Martin Freedman

A position on the court used to be a political appointment, said Freedman, "but that changed about ten years ago. Currently, one must apply for a judgeship. It is a long, thorough process."

Freedman put in his application in October 2001, and on July 16, he and his former law partner Barbara Hamilton, were chosen to fill two vacancies on the Court of Appeal. (Hamilton was already serving as a judge on the Court of Queen's Bench.)

"I was lucky," Freedman says. "Timing is everything. This is the first time since 1944 that there were two openings on the court at the same time."

Freedman notes that the Court of Appeal has a full complement of nine judges although in most cases only three sit. In rare cases, as many as five judges may sit.

"The cases we hear are broad in scope," Freedman says.

"In the two months since I have been actually hearing cases, we have dealt with constitutional, insurance and family law as well as criminal cases. A lot of the cases range from significant to very significant."

He notes that to prepare for each case he has to read through an enormous amount of material.

"In one case, there were 26 volumes to go through," he says.

"We spend days preparing for complicated cases which take at most six hours of court time.

"And most of the reading is highly intellectual and academic. It's like being back in law school but without the exams."

Freedman describes his fellow judges – among them Guy Kroft and Freda Steel who are both very active in the Jewish community – as highly collegial, helpful and friendly.

"They have all gone out of their way to help," he says.

"My dad loved it here and so do I," he said.

It is not only as a judge, however, that he has been like his father.

Like his father, Freedman was an outstanding university debater, and has played an active role in the community, especially the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University. In 1998, he was the organization's first recipient of the Excellence Award in Law.

Reconstructionist convention set for Montreal

MONTREAL – The 39th Jewish Reconstructionist Federation (JRF) convention, to take place Nov 7 to 10, will gather over 300 people from across the continent for four days of learning, worship and networking.

The JRF is the synagogue organization of the Reconstructionist movement, providing its 103 affiliated congregations with a wide array of services.

These services include rabbinic placement, and national and regional offices that offer consultation on key areas of congregational life, including youth and adult education, leadership, development, outreach and community-building initiatives, fund-raising and budgeting, as well as musical, liturgical and other resources.

The theme of the convention, the first in Montreal since 1967, is Self, Congregation, Community and the World: Seeking a Reconstructionist Balance.

It is dedicated to the memory of Rabbi Lavy Becker, founding rabbi of Congregation Dorshei Emet, the Reconstructionist synagogue of Montreal; and Rabbi Ira Eisenstein, credited with founding Reconstructionism as a separate movement.

Shabbat morning services will be held at Congregation Dorshei Emet's new building.

The convention's opening plenary session, Jewish Identity in the Modern World, will feature Gil Troy, a professor of history at McGill University and member of Congregation Dorshei Emet; and Rabbi Shawn Zevit, JRF director of outreach and congregational services.

The session will examine where Reconstructionism fits into the landscape of North American Jewish life in both historical and contemporary contexts, using information from the recently released National Jewish Population Survey and other sources.

Participants will have the opportunity to gather in small groups by geographic region to discuss the findings, and their impact on local communities.

Keynote speaker, MP Irwin Cotler, will consider the global implications of the rise in racism and anti-Semitism.

Convention participants will celebrate the many successes of the Reconstructionist movement over the past two years, including the establishment of the first Reconstructionist summer camp that completed its first session this summer; and a new Israel programs department.

Teens from 14 charter member congregations will join lay and professional leaders for special programming and the launch of No'ar Hadash (New Youth), the Reconstructionist Youth Programming Network.

About 40 workshops will be offered on topics including Interactive Jewish Art, Rabbi-Congregational Relations, Leading Shabbat Services, Canadian Jewry in Comparative Perspective and Reconstructionist Halakhah.

Also at the convention, Ilana Axel of Congregation Shir Hadash in Northbrook, Ill. and Staci Scheinblum of Kehilat HaNahar in New Hope, Penn., will be awarded the JRF Master Teacher Award presented to Jewish educators for their exemplary dedication to children's Jewish education.

The first ever Kehilat Tzedek Award, honoring a JRF community for its innovative, effective and sustained work in tikkun olam, will be presented to Darchei Noam Congregation of Toronto.

The business plenum will elect a new board and officers.

Daniel Cedarbaum of the Jewish Reconstructionist Congregation in Evanston, Ill. has been nominated as the new JRF president. He has served on the board since 1990 as secretary, treasurer and vice president of financial affairs.

Affiliates also have access to other Reconstructionist institutions, including the Reconstructionist Press, which publishes a broad selection of books including the six-volume prayerbook series Kol Haneshamah, a Passover Haggadah and CD, educational materials, musical recordings keyed to the liturgy, and related materials; the Reconstructionist Rabbinical College, which trains rabbis, teachers and spiritual leaders; and the Reconstructionist Rabbinical Association, the professional support organization for Reconstructionist rabbis.

Toronto photographer Stephen Epstein, who started the write-in campaign, said despite concerns about UNICEF's position on the Mideast, he urged donors not to let that interfere with their charitable donations.

"I'm encouraging people to make their contributions because if they don't, children will be hurt," he said.

Epstein said a UNICEF news release, posted on its Web site (www.unicef.org/media/news notes/02nn34opt. htm), fails to note why some Palestinian schools were closed and why others, in areas where terrorism was not active, remained open.

The press release blames "Israeli-imposed sanctions" for preventing 226,000 Palestinian children from attending school.

The release goes on to say Israel is obliged under the 4th Geneva Convention and the Convention on the Rights of the Child to ensure education is accessible to all Palestinian children. The organization calls on Israel to lift mobility restrictions on Palestinians during school hours.

Epstein said he was also concerned about other UNICEF pronouncements on the Arab-Israeli conflict, particularly an April 4 statement attributed to UNICEF executive director Carol Bellamy.

The statement, he said, criticizes the use of violence by both sides, in effect, drawing a moral equivalence between Palestinian terror and Israel's response to it.

The statement, he said, is "very unbalanced" and while appearing to be addressed to both sides, "it criticizes Israel more."

Epstein and Canadian Jewish Congress representative Simon Rosenblum recently held separate meetings with David Agnew, UNICEF Canada's president and CEO, during which they discussed UNICEF's "unbalanced" approach to the Palestinian-Israeli conflict.

"They don't contextualize that in terms of the Israeli response to terror. It's as if Israel woke up one day and decided, 'How can we make Palestinian kids' lives difficult,'" Rosenblum said. "There is no mention of the effect of terror on Israeli children."

Referring to his meeting with Rosenblum, Agnew said "I assured him there was no intention to stray from our deeply held mandate to be non-partisan."

UNICEF's goal is to improve the condition of children around the world, whether through immunization programs, promoting early childhood development, protecting children against slave labour and prostitution, and providing education for girls, Agnew said.

"I assured [Rosenblum] that at UNICEF Canada, we take that mandate seriously."

Agnew said he has passed along Rosenblum's and Epstein's concerns "to the most senior levels of UNICEF.

"I am confident they have heard them. [Senior UNICEF officials] expressed to me in no uncertain terms there was no attempt to express a bias. We agreed we'd continue to be vigilant, to make sure that the things we say and do in that region are not subject to that interpretation."

Addressing the issue of Syria's Lahhan, Agnew said UNICEF has "strongly dissociated itself from his remarks… We view them as hugely inappropriate" and UNICEF has been in contact with Lahhan to warn him about repeating such remarks.

Agnew noted UNICEF has many supporters and financial benefactors in Israel. In Canada, he added, "we are proud to count among our supporters, staff and volunteers members of the Jewish community."

Prof. Baskin to discuss new book

By PHYLLIS SHRAGGE
Hamilton Correspondent

HAMILTON — Judith R. Baskin, director of the Harold Schnitzer Family Program in Judaic Studies and professor of religious studies at the University of Oregon, will discuss her new book, Midrashic Women: Formations of the Feminine in Rabbinic Literature, at Temple Anshe Sholom Nov. 24.

Her book looks at how non-legal rabbinic writings view women and their lives. While most gender-based analyses of rabbinic Judaism concentrate on the status of women in Halachah (the rabbinic legal tradition), Baskin focuses on women in the aggadic midrash, a collection of expansions of the biblical text, rabbinic ruminations and homiletical discourses that constitutes the non-legal component of rabbinic literature.

In the book, she concludes that rabbinic Judaism, a tradition formed by men for a male community, deeply valued the essential contribution of wives and mothers to daily life, but consciously presented women as less than men.

Baskin, daughter of Rabbi Bernard Baskin, rabbi emeritus of Temple Anshe Sholom, and Marjorie Baskin, argues that often non-legal literature provides a more complex view of women and their actual lives than the legal discourse found in biblical and halachic texts.

A frequent lecturer at colleges and universities who has addressed synagogues in North America, Europe and Israel, Baskin will speak at a breakfast club meeting. Breakfast is $3 and will be served at 10 a.m. There is no charge for the lecture, which will begin at 11 a.m. For further information, call 905-528-4508.

New cancer support group in Edmonton

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Jewish women undergoing cancer treatment in Edmonton are helping each other cope with the trauma of cancer diagnosis and treatment through a new suppport group.

Jan Joseph and Gitta Lederer, both 51, who founded the group, went through radiation at the same time for breast cancer and recognized the need to communicate and with support each other.

"Although there are other support groups in the community, we felt that there was a need for a cancer support group for Jewish women," said Joseph in a telephone interview.

Joseph said the Edmonton group was formed to lessen the feeling of isolation that often accompanies a cancer diagnosis.

"Cancer is a very private matter, but holding it in isn't healthy either," she said.

Five years ago, when Joseph changed doctors, her new doctor insisted that she go for a mammogram – the first in her life, she said. Her previous doctor did not believe she was old enough to require one.

Elizabeth Erlich (left) co-founder of the L'Chaim Cancer Support Group in Toronto, and co-founder and current president Marsha Urowitz (right) with Jan Joseph, founder of a similar support group in Edmonton.

"It was shocking – I was lucky she sent me for the mammogram as there were no signs. It saved my life."

After having undergone surgery, chemotherapy and radiation, she urges women of all ages to have mammograms.

Joseph and Lederer got the idea for the group after they saw an article in The CJN on L'Chaim Cancer Support Group for Jewish Women in Toronto, which was formed in 1999. They contacted the group for more information and Joseph said they have been "very helpful."

"They provided us with copies of their video on survivors, a diskette with informational sheets for their binders, training material for volunteers, samples of their gift bags and even copies of inspirational material," she said.

She and Lederer then met with Dr. Michael Handman, director of psychology at Cross Cancer Institute, who agreed to be the group's facilitator.

Today, there are 10 women in the Edmonton group, which holds one meeting a month. Along with a communications network, the groups hosts educational programs with guest speakers.

Joseph said although the women in the group are between 45 and 60 years old, everyone is welcome.

Because cancer strikes with no rhyme or reason, a support group can help others, Joseph said, and it "gives a purpose to what we have gone through."

Elizabeth Erlich, who co-founded the Toronto group with Marci Tenenbaum, which now has more than 50 members, said in an interview that other communities have also made inquiries about forming Jewish support groups for cancer patients and survivors.

"We would be happy to work with groups to form branches across the country," Ehrlich said.

The Toronto group offers two services, she said. Their primary service is a telephone support network. New patients are matched with survivors with similar histories who provide ongoing support throughout the course of treatment.

The group also visits with newly diagnosed patients and brings them gift bags that include a binder with resource materials, including information about local support group meetings.

For more information on the Edmonton group, call Joseph at 780-489-1492, and for more information about the group in Toronto, call 416-633-0409.

New leukemia treatment focus of million-dollar trial

Health Canada has recently approved Fludara oral, a new treatment format for a class of drug that works to destroy white blood cells in patients with chronic lymphocytic leukemia (CLL), a common form of leukemia. Approximately 4,000 Canadians have the disease.

"Fludara intravenous (IV) is already a treatment mainstay for CLL and is increasingly used as first-line therapy," says Dr. Peter Anglin, medical oncologist at Credit Valley Hospital in Mississauga, Ont.

Fludara oral showed a promising efficacy when it was tried in the United Kingdom and other countries as a second-line therapy in patients with CLL who have failed with other conventional therapies. It is very well-tolerated, offering little or no hair loss, and only transient nausea and/or vomiting.

The approval of this new treatment comes on the heels of the news that a large Canadian trial will study the use of Fludara oral as a first-line treatment for CLL. It is being conducted by the National Cancer Institute of Canada Clinical Trials Group (NCIC CTG) and sponsored by Berlex Canada Inc., a Montreal-based pharmaceutical company.

The two-year study, which has recently been activated and is recruiting patients, will span 25 centres across Canada, including Toronto and Montreal.

At the trial's completion, an assessment will be made based on the extent of a patient's disease at the end of treatment, compared with the patient's status at baseline.

The NCIC CTG is an independent research organization that carries out clinical trials in cancer therapy and supportive care across Canada and internationally.

Netanyahu will be foreign minister, if polls are early

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Former prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu announced Sunday night that he would accept Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's offer of the Foreign Ministry – but only if Sharon calls early elections.

Sharon's office responded with a statement saying that the prime minister "welcomes Netanyahu's willingness to join the government he heads," but is still examining the terms Netanyahu has set – which, in addition to early elections, include a series of political conditions.

In a television appearance following their meeting, Netanyahu said that these conditions included getting rid of Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat, changing the location of the security fence between Israel and the West Bank and opposition to a Palestinian state.

Sharon, his aides said, was furious that Netanyahu had gone public with these terms, noting that, in addition to not agreeing with them, the prime minister also felt that acceptance would almost certainly cause a rift with the United States.

A rift would be problematic at any time, his aides noted, but is especially problematic now, on the eve of a possible American attack on Iraq, as Sharon has repeatedly promised U.S. President George W. Bush to do nothing during this period that might deflect attention from the Iraqi issue.

At his meeting with Sharon, Netanyahu justified his demand for early elections by saying that this would strengthen the Likud, as current polls show the party will receive more seats in the next Knesset. But Sharon associates accused the former premier of engaging in "political trickery."

"[Netanyahu] is purporting to act in the Likud's name, but he is actually promoting the demise of the Likud government instead of helping to stabilize it," said one Sharon aide.

"If we want to call early elections, we don't need Netanyahu," he added. "That we can do by ourselves."

But Netanyahu, speaking on Channel Two television Sunday night, noted that he has been advocating new elections ever since Ehud Barak's government collapsed two years ago, on the grounds that it was impossible for any party to govern when it commanded only 19 seats in a 120-seat Knesset. New elections, he predicted, would double the Likud's parliamentary strength.

New elections were also essential for the economy, he argued, since in a minority government comprising six parties besides the Likud, "the government will be paralyzed, and will be blackmailed by MKs every day... Anyone who has eyes in his head understands that we are heading toward economic collapse, so we must go to elections."

Meanwhile, Sharon is proceeding with talks to establish a narrow coalition. His associates said he was determined to keep a government together at least until the budget had passed in the Knesset and as long as the region appeared to be in the run-up to a war on Iraq.

Suicide strikes condemned

The report's writers reject the distinction drawn by some Palestinians between attacks on Jewish civilians living in the West Bank and Gaza and strikes on Israeli civilians inside the Green Line. International law, the authors declare, prohibits terror attacks against both types of civilians, as well as strikes on reserve soldiers and soldiers who are not on duty.

The new report charges that the Palestinian Authority failed to act to stop terror strikes. The Palestinian Authority's failures in this respect apply to periods when it still had the wherewithal to constrain terror (this was before major parts of the Palestinian Authority's security apparatus were destroyed).

The report's authors say PA officials have behaved as though their duty to put murderous terrorists on trial is open to negotiation, and not unconditional.

ANNOUNCING

THE BRONFMAN YOUTH FELLOWSHIPS IN ISRAEL 2003

For the seventeenth consecutive summer, a group of outstanding Jewish teenagers in the U.S. and Canada, coming from a wide variety of backgrounds and entering the twelfth grade of school, will be recipients of the Bronfman Youth Fellowships*. They will spend five fulfilling weeks of study, dialogue and travel in Israel.

The Bronfman Fellows will be selected on the basis of character, intellectual interests, special talents and leadership qualities. Merit, not financial need, is the program's selection standard. Fellowship activities begin June 30th, with a return from Israel August 6th. All meals will be kosher, and Sabbath activities will be in keeping with the sanctity of the day.

While in Israel, the Fellows will engage in an intense interaction with a diverse faculty of master educators, representing a wide range of Jewish perspectives. They will explore Jewish texts against the background of Israel's land, culture and customs, meet with Amitei Bronfman, our parallel Israeli fellowship and take part, at a time of rapid change, in seminars with some of the country's leading political and cultural figures. Simultaneously, they will debate a constant flow of ideas and search for insights on the various ways to define oneself as a Jew today — all in an atmosphere of mutual respect and open dialogue.

The purpose: to return home with a new understanding of the myriad issues facing the Jewish people and the Jewish state, and a new appreciation of the need for dialogue among Jews of all kinds.

* Fellowships cover all expenses including roundtrip transportation between New York and Israel, room and board and travel in Israel.

Completed applications must be postmarked by January 31, 2003

One in five Israelis poverty-stricken – 1.17 million in all

By RUTI SINAI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Nearly one in five Israelis is living below the poverty line, according to official statistics released Monday.

The report also showed that more than half a million children – almost 27 per cent of all children in the country – are living below the poverty line, an increase of 1.7 percentage points over last year.

Labor party chair Benjamin Ben-Eliezer tabled a no-confidence motion against the government Monday as a result of the findings.

The figures for 2001, compiled by the National Insurance Institute [NII] and the Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs, showed that the number of Israelis living below the poverty line rose by 81,000 last year – 50,000 of them children – bringing the total number of poverty-stricken Israelis to 1.17 million, 19.6 per cent of the total population, a rise of nearly a full percentage point. Of them 531,000 are children.

By the end of next year, with deep cuts planned in welfare benefits in the 2003 State Budget, NII researchers estimate that nearly one in three children could be living in poverty.

The study shows that the cities of Haifa and Bat Yam have been particularly hard hit economically. In 2001, the number of families living below the poverty line in Haifa jumped to 14.8 per cent from 11.6, and in Tel Aviv's satellite city of Bat Yam, to 19.6 per cent from 14.

The report was based on economic standards for 2001, under which an Israeli couple is considered poor if their monthly earnings fall below NIS 2,768 ($584 US). The poverty line for a couple with two children was set at NIS 4,428, ($934) and with four children at NIS 5,881 ($1,241).

Responding to the release of the figures, Meretz MK Ran Cohen, chair of a Knesset panel studying the socio-economic levels of Israeli society, said he was "not surprised, but struck dumb. These are the statistics of a catastrophe, pointing a finger at us as a societal monster.

"This is a mark of Cain on the foreheads of those who brought about this situation," Cohen told Israel Radio, referring to the ruling coalition. He called for the resignation of Labor and Social Affairs Minister Shlomo Benizri of Shas, who last week voted for the cuts in the 2003 budget.

At the same time, the gap between upper and lower classes widened appreciably. The share of the earnings of the three lower deciles in Israeli society as a percentage of the nation's total economic income declined from 4.5 to 3.5 per cent, while that of the top two deciles increased by 1.3 percentage points, to 53.9 per cent.

Departing from official custom, the report discussed the expected consequences of current plans to slash NIS 6 billion in NII benefits in the 2003 state budget. NII researchers estimated that even after receiving social security supplements, the percentage of all Israeli families living under the poverty line will climb from 17.7 per cent in 2001 to 19.1 per cent in the period 2002-2003.

During the same period, the estimated number of Israelis living below the poverty line is expected to climb to 1.29 million in 2002-2003 from 1.17 million, representing 21.7 per cent of all Israelis. Estimates indicate that the number of poverty-stricken children could reach 605,000 in this period, or 30.6 per cent of all children. This would mean one in every three children would be living below the poverty line.

IDF approves U.S. 'road map' for peace

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The "road map" drawn up by the American administration as the basis for a settlement of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict "for the most part answers Israel's security needs," according to the professional opinion of the Strategic Planning Branch of the Israel Defence Forces.

The branch therefore recommends that Israel's political leadership accept the blueprint, while adding some remarks and reservations about some of its paragraphs.

The branch, headed by Brig.-Gen. Eival Giladi, is currently working on Israel's formal response to the "road map." It will be handed to the Americans after it is approved by Prime Minister Ariel Sharon.

U.S. Deputy Assistant Secretary of State David Satterfield is due to arrive in Israel on Nov. 11 to present an updated version of the U.S. blueprint, which will include the remarks of the sides and those of the so-called international quartet, made up of the United States, Russia, the European Union and the United Nations. The final text will be completed and authorized, according to plans, in December.

The opinion of the IDF, presented to Sharon last week, is that the "road map" acknowledges several of Israel's diplomatic demands – first and foremost that the diplomatic process should be phased, and that every advancement should be measured against the "test of implementation."

The IDF also welcomed the requirement that the Palestinian Authority come through with basic security and administrative reforms, and the fact that this requirement is more binding than in the speech of U.S. President George W. Bush on June 24. Other clauses welcomed by the IDF were the demand that Arab nations be part of the process, and that they drop their support for extremist groups.

According to the "road map," a Palestinian state will be set up within temporary borders by the end of 2003, following the withdrawal of the IDF from PA territories and the holding of elections for a new parliament there. The country within the preliminary borders will then begin negotiations with Israel on a permanent agreement with a view to reaching one in 2005.

According to the IDF, the timetable for the "road map" takes into account the expected U.S. campaign against Iraq. This is the reason the United States is proposing that Israel and the Palestinians begin formulating a new security working plan only in the second stage, between January and May 2003, when it is thought the war in Iraq will have ended.

The IDF's major reservation is that the "road map" lacks specific security demands of the Palestinians in the first stage of its implementation. It speaks merely of a leadership statement about ending violence and terror and the end to incitement by official sources, but leaves practical steps to a later stage.

The IDF also has reservations about the proposal that verification of the implementation of the plan will be left to the mechanism of the quartet.

Ohel Leah Synagogue, Hong Kong seeks a RABBI
Position Available: July, 2003

Ohel Leah Synagogue serves a diverse Jewish community in Hong Kong. The synagogue building, which dates from 1902 and was recently restored, is part of a complex that includes a mikveh, Jewish Community Centre (with kosher grocery and restaurants) and Jewish day school.

The Ohel Leah Rabbi should provide dynamic leadership to a Modern Orthodox congregation composed of 200 families and single adults, largely from Israel, North America, Europe, South Africa and Australia. The successful candidate should have a centrist philosophy and pluralistic approach to Modern Orthodoxy. He should demonstrate leadership skills in rendering Halachic decisions and in motivating adults and children, and should have significant pastoral experience. A university degree is preferred but not required. Fluent English and excellent public-speaking skills are essential.

The successful candidate will receive an attractive salary, housing, and other benefits.

Partisan politics motivated Ben-Eliezer

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

A bitter budgetary dispute was Benjamin Ben-Eliezer's ostensible reason for resigning last week as Israel's defence minister and pulling the Labor party out of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's 19-month-old national unity government.

Ben-Eliezer, the Labor party's leader, quit over Sharon's refusal to allocate about $145 million (US) to settlements rather than to pensioners and students. Since the sum in question represented a mere drop in the ocean – 0.26 per cent of Israel's $56 billion annual budget – Ben-Eliezer's explanation for bolting was, at best, disingenuous. A month ago, he declared that "only a crazy person and a crazy party" would leave the government on the eve of a probable war in Iraq and in the midst of a Palestinian uprising and a worsening recession.

As Sharon correctly surmised, Ben-Eliezer actually left for partisan political reasons, concerned that his grip on the anemic Labor party, with 25 Knesset seats, would be jeopardized if he stayed on in Sharon's right-wing cabinet.

The Labor party, which was trounced in last year's election and has been a declining force for the past 25 years, faces a leadership primary on Nov. 19. Trailing his two opponents – Haim Ramon and Amram Mitzna – by a wide margin, Ben-Eliezer calculated that he could improve his chances by distancing himself from Sharon.

Benjamin Ben-Eliezer

Ben-Eliezer, a certifiable hawk, is very much associated with Sharon's repudiation of the Oslo accords, his attempt to isolate and topple Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat, his re-occupation of the Palestinian autonomous areas, his emphasis on maintaining the settlements in the West Bank and Gaza Strip and his reluctance to negotiate under fire.

Indeed, Ben-Eliezer and Shimon Peres, the foreign minister, were so closely identified with Sharon's policies and attitudes that dovish voices in the Labour party had accused them of providing legitimacy to the prime minister's government.

The dissatisfaction over Labor's partnership with Likud occasionally boiled over. Three weeks ago, Labor's secretary-general, Ofir Pines-Paz, called for the breakup of the alliance with Likud. Arguing that Labor should offer Israelis an alternative to Sharon instead of cohabitating with him, Pines-Paz suggested that a cessation of violence and a return to bilateral talks with the Palestinians were not likely to occur with Sharon in the prime minister's seat.

Prior to Pines-Paz's outburst, Shlomo Ben-Ami, the former foreign minister, resigned from the Knesset in protest over Labor's participation in the government, and Dalia Rabin-Pelosoff, citing similar qualms, stepped down as deputy defence minister.

Theirs were not the sole voices of dissent. Last June, Yossi Beilin, one of the party's brightest doves, announced his intention to break away and form a new left-of-centre political movement. Meanwhile, Avraham Burg, the Knesset speaker and a former leadership contender, warned that Labor risked irrelevancy by "holding on to power."

Judging by a recent survey, he may be right. One third of Israelis who voted for Labor in 2001 disclosed they would switch to another party in the next election.

By any yardstick, Labor's marriage of convenience with Likud was a rocky affair, punctuated by seemingly endless policy disputes pitting Peres, one of the architects of the Oslo accords, against Sharon, one of its chief denigrators. However, they did agree on an incremental approach to Arab-Israeli negotiations, and both dismissed the attempt by Sharon's predecessor, Ehud Barak, to sign an end-of-conflict accord with the Palestinians.

Yet on an issue-by-issue basis, from the counter-productive siege of Arafat's headquarters in Ramallah to the re-occupation of the Palestinian autonomous areas, Peres and Sharon were invariably at odds. As well, Labor backbenchers constantly complained that Sharon was not offering the Palestinians a "political horizon."

This was a government with a brief shelf life, and its eventual collapse was to be expected.

The Flood

this story is based on Genesis and the Midrash

The scent of gardenias wafted over the valley. Birds chirping melodically soared overhead, and the early morning mist drifted over the primeval landscape. The rising sun swathed the nearly completed ark in rosy light.

"Are you still working on that stupid boat?"

Noah put down his hammer, and looked up at the thugs looming over him. "Good morning, Mogo. Good morning, Tiny. I see you've brought your friends. Yes, I'm still working on this boat. Thank God I'm nearly finished."

"Nearly finished?" laughed Tiny. "It only took you 120 years!"

"And all this time I've been warning you. God is going to to destroy the world. He knows all the terrible things you've all been doing. The things you think are normal. Murdering innocent people, marrying animals, and stealing everything from food to people's wives." Noah's voice rose. "No, it's not OK. This is not the way the world is supposed to be. And if you don't all do something about it, God will flood the world. And all you sinful people, you wicked people, will die."

The giants were glaring at him menacingly. "Yeah?" mocked Crusher. "We're all going to die, huh?" He bent over and gave Noah a hard shove, sending him sprawling into the dirt.

"Even if the world would flood, we're so tall the water couldn't reach our necks!" scorned Mad Dog.

Noah got up and looked around for his hammer.

"Nice hammer," said Squeaky, grabbing it before Noah had a chance. "I think I'll take it."

"Give that back!" demanded Noah, lunging for his hammer.

"Catch!" yelled Squeaky, throwing it to Mad Dog. Noah ran toward him, but before he got to Mad Dog, his hammer went hurtling over his head to Tiny, to Mogo, back to Squeaky. Noah thought he'd never get it back, but after an hour of keep-away, the giants got bored. Crusher sent the hammer sailing into the side of the ark, and Noah cringed as the plank shattered.

"Be happy I didn't do more. I've got half a mind to smash your whole boat right now. Nah, I'll wait till you're finished building it."

The giants lumbered away, laughing.

"Noah! It's starting to rain!" shouted Noah's wife Na'ama from the ark's door. "What are you doing out there? Did you forget some animals?"

"No, they're all in there!" shouted Noah back.

"So come in already! What are you waiting for?"

Noah ignored his wife. He was looking at the world. The beautiful world. He was looking at the delicate blades of grass quivering under the raindrops. He was looking at the distant mountains covered in flowers, at the birds seeking shelter from the rain. No. God wouldn't destroy a world as beautiful as this. There was no way a flood would happen.

A bolt of lightning ripped through the clouds, and powerful thunder roared over him. The rain was coming down harder now, the drops were getting bigger. Still, Noah hesitated.

What was that? Boiling geysers were beginning to erupt! The water was getting deeper. It was up to his ankles already! The rain began falling so thickly that Noah could barely see the ark. The world was gray, blurry. Ghostly voices echoed around him, and he sensed forces of death approaching. He ran to his ark, forcing his way through the churning waters. The rain was getting fiercer, hotter.

His son Shem was waiting for him at the bottom of the ramp. "Let's go," he urged his father, who was happy to comply. They reached the top of the ramp, and began raising it. Through the still open door, all Noah could see was a wall of gushing water. But in the distance he could hear, "Noah was right!"

"Well, don't let him get away! If we're going to die, at least he'll die with us!"

"Let's flip his boat over!"

"Let's break it in half!"

"This is it," thought Noah to himself. "It's all over."

But none of the giants reached the ark. It sounded as if fierce animals were fighting them off.

The ramp lifted, sealing out the outside world. The ark was moving now, bobbing slightly in the water. Slowly, the waters lifted the ark from the ground.

For 40 days and 40 nights the rain fell.

The entire world was obliterated.

And in the Ark, Noah, his family and the animals lived on.

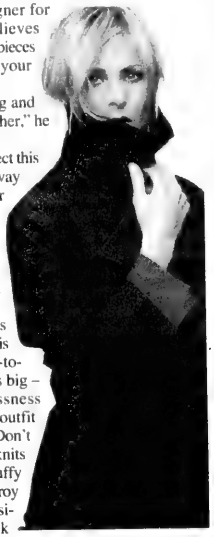
Casuals combine richness and comfort this winter

This winter season, casual clothing will emphasize good, solid "wearables" that combine style, rich colour, easy-to-care-for fabrics and comfort so you can forget about what you're wearing and get on with your life.

"It's time for casual clothing to return to its own basic roots and do what it is meant to do," says Michele Kesten, owner of The Casual Way on Yonge Street.

"Besides the obvious protection from the elements, [winter casual clothing] is there to make you feel good," Kesten says. "Nothing more, nothing less."



Donald Johannesson, a designer for French Dressing Jeanswear, believes casual wear is about taking classic pieces and casually mixing them up in your own personal way.

"There's no need to think long and hard as to how to put a look together," he says.

The colours for this winter reflect this mood. Blue denim still leads the way in "forget-about-it" dressing, whether it's lightly stonewashed or softly rinsed. Indigo has become the staple colour for the beginning of the 21st century, capable of being combined effortlessly with almost any other colour.

Black is also important this season; do not underestimate it. This non-colour, whether worn head-to-toe or played off other shades, is big – again, because of the effortlessness involved in putting together an outfit that looks great any time of day. Don't be afraid to mix chunky ribbed knits with supple leather, lace with fluffy angora and suede or stretch corduroy with silky satin. It's this juxtaposition of textures that makes black so fascinating.

The other colours of the upcoming season that mix with all others for no-fuss dressing are midnight, stone and taupe. The red family is very important for the fall as East meets West – think rich Moroccan carpets heaped beside coppery pots and deeply glazed pottery – and brings us red, burgundy, claret, cranberry and rust. Raisin and purple add a zap of intense colour while camel, truffle, mud, mushroom and khaki finish the palette.

You can accent the other colours with metallic shades of gold, silver and the new bronze. These shiny shades look spectacular woven into knobby, loopy knits.

Fabrics this winter focus on the simple and uncomplicated. Denim and stretch denim, cotton twill and corduroy all have wonderfully soft, lived-in qualities, but are very gently weathered this season to maintain their rich appearance and versatility.

The new story is "plush" – invest in stretch versions of corduroy or velvet for any time of the day. Or go "lux" in sheened fabrics with polished or lavish hands such as satin or sateen.

For winter 2003, everything is clean and understated, with a paring down of unnecessary detail and excess fabric. Bottoms are available in a range of minimalist fits, from narrow straight legs to wider straight legs, boot cuts and flares. Shirts are semi-fitted and have spare detailing.

Also for the upcoming winter, skirts and jumpers are either just above the knee or at the ankle, usually pencil straight, though slight A-lines are starting to emerge as are gored or pleated versions in either length.

Vests and jackets are key elements of the winter wardrobe. Vests have an almost suit feeling as they become longer, while jackets run from 23" boxy windbreaker looks and 25" western or suit-inspired pieces to 29" barn shapes, a new 34" car coat and the elongated 50" duster, the denim item of the season.

A great way to update your wardrobe for the season without mortgaging the house is to add some new accessories. If you only invest in one item for this winter, make it a scarf – the longer, the better. Wrap it once around your neck and then let it hang down to your knees. Choose one in a chunky striped knit, crocheted cotton, cozy polar fleece or faux fur.

Other key accessories this winter:

Handbags, too, remain important, with the large "doctor's bag" making the biggest statement. Whatever you choose, keep it big, soft and slouchy.

Bold, chunky jewelry, including chandelier earrings and pendants on leather or suede chains, will be everywhere.

Velvet anything, from hair accessories to belts and bags should take its place in your wardrobe.

Boots, boots and more boots are in, with knee-high boots the newest look. Chunky heels are out; laced-up stilettos or the next highest heel you can find – if you can walk in them! – are in.

Winter 2003 fashion is all about lifting the spirit. Get things that are simple, elegant, well-fitted and comfortable. Put them all together in an uncomplicated way and then get on with your life.

NEWS, NEWS, NEWS

According to Steve Mulholland at SpaMedica the FotoFacial RF is the next evolution in light- based skin rejuvenation. The FotoFacial RF combines intense pulsed optical and radio frequency energy in the same pulse. It treats and improves pink and brown discolorations of the face and minimizes the appearance of wrinkles and pores. It enhances skin tone, improves the skin's elasticity and therefore increases firmness – not bad for "no surgery required."

Faces, the Canadian cosmetic retailer is buzzing once again. It has new ownership that is dedicated to bringing forth a superior cosmetic line at affordable prices. Their new focus is to open stores rather than kiosks so that the consumer can have a complete line of colours. And the most exciting news – a 21-product complete skin care program called Faces Skin Essentials.

CAROL'S TIPS

SKIN CARE: A breakthrough in Estee Lauder's scientific research lab provides a new addition to their Resilience Face Crème. Called Resilience Lift OverNight Face and Throat Cream, it targets hormonal depletion that affects collagen and elastic production while bathing your face in complete hydration.

Youth Prolongator from Lancaster helps to prolong the vitality of a younger-looking skin. It is targeted for those 30 to 40 years old and helps to increase cellular activity, creating more radiance, suppleness and, if I might say so, the appearance of being a little plumped up.

Fashion as art

Fashion can be glamorous. But can it be art? For those of you who view fashion merely as pairing cute tanks with cute skirts, I'd like to introduce you to my world.

Many people view my infatuation with fashion as a two-dimensional interest that will only last for another few years. People say it's just a stage, but I am here to prove them wrong.

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

When I lose myself in the pages of Vogue, I become entranced in a fantasy land full of genius designers, such as John Galliano and Alexander McQueen, who are true artists in every sense of the word.

Their designs cover magazine pages and billboards all over the world, yet the average teenager is oblivious to them.

Walking down the halls of my school, I see Louis Vuitton, Gucci and Prada logos. It amazes me how close to superior style people can come without reaching it because they are too pre-occupied with the name. If you look beyond the name and discover the genius, your money can go much farther. Next time you're at Holt Renfrew, I urge you to browse through Marc Jacobs, my favourite designer. I am by no means telling you to drop $600 on a jacket, but looking can be just as much fun.

To me, looking is like viewing paintings at a gallery. You're not exactly going to blow a million dollars on a painting, but you can still appreciate it. Fashion is wearable art. The designer's canvas is the body and their paints are the fabrics they use.

Fashion shows are another piece to the exhibiting of art in the fascinating world of fashion. Toothpick-skinny models strut down the catwalk wearing millions of dollars-worth in everything from alligator leather to plastic wrap. Cameras flash, reporters scribble and die-hard fans tear up as the designers walk down the catwalk. People like me become so enveloped in the style and grace that it is hard to see clothing in any other way.

Though this world is far away from school walls, it is easily accessible. You might doubt my ranting and raving's relevance to you, but if this has sparked any interest, I suggest you look further. Pick up an issue of Vogue, watch an episode of Sex and the City, look it up on the Internet. I guarantee you will discover that the world of fashion is a world of art and that it is closer than you thought.

Biotherm complements its Age Fitness collection with Age Fitness for eyes and an Age Fitness Essence. Both contain the dual-action pure olive leaf concentrate. They contain high proportions of anti-aging molecules and have an exceptional reparative power that encourages the synthesis of collagen.

Vichy's Oligo 25 Anti-Dull Skin Hydrating Treatment will benefit your skin using an exclusive association of active ingredients, as well as reactive microcirculation to help your skin reveal its lustre.

Scrub yourself down with B. Kamin's new Maple Sugar Body Scrub, which uses sweet maple to create a scrumptious treat for your whole body. It's a luxurious dual-action moisturizing and exfoliating treatment that leaves your skin sparkling clean and soft as silk.

Chanel's Precision line presents a new eye creme called Age Delay Eye, which helps to prevent wrinkles and gives the area around the eyes a real boost.

A new addition to Orlane's B21 OLIGO VIT-A-MIN line is Cooling Balm Eye Contour, which treats puffiness and dark circles. It contains 46 components that combine to revitalize and provide excellent results.

Lancome's new Impactive, a triple performance creme that silkens, hydrates and creates cellular stimulation is really quite a little marvel!

FOUNDATION: The new foundation from Christian Dior, called DiorSkin Fond de Teint Osmose or Skin-True Makeup, is light as a feather. It's designed for all skin types and its "water-in-silicone" formula leaves the skin's oxygen supply intact, leaving your skin free to breathe and looking as natural as can be. Its counterpart, DiorSkin Compact, is equally impressive with its fine texture and refillable container.

Chanel introduces a new foundation: Vitalumier/Satin Smoothing Crème. Its water in oil emulsion is particularly good for mature skin – actually provides moisture all day. It is available in an ultra-gliding fluid or a creme texture for medium coverage.

CHEEKS: Variations in pink (the new red) turn up in Chanel's new collection of Les Perles, a jewel of a makeup compact created with precious cream pearls to bring a touch of luminous radiance to the face, whether for the eyes, the cheeks or the lips. The silky texture makes skin simply glow with a sheer iridescent finish.

MAC's pink flurry blush in their winter Snowgirl collection is fabulous and it's so iridescent it will reflect even dark club lights – perfect for you club girls.

FRAGRANCE: A sexy, deep blue bottle from Christian Dior houses its latest scent, Dior Addict – feminine, fresh and very vanilla. Thierry Wasser, a world-renowned nose and the creator of this gorgeous aroma says he has finally achieved the tension between sensuality and energy in a fragrance.

Lacoste Pour Homme is not for boys, but specifically for very masculine and mature men. Their advertising campaign – the image of a naked man sitting with a cup of tea – delivers a strong message. The scent indeed oozes with sensuality.

"Youth Prolongator" from Lancaster helps to prolong the vitality of younger-looking skin.

Fabulous and new from Jo Malone is a fragrance called Wild Fig and Cassis. It envelops you in a cloud of sun-warm figs with top notes of fresh grass, soothing cassis and a dash of cherry.

Tommy Hilfiger presents Tommy Girl Tickled Pink Shimmer – a collection of scented body accessories, including body mist, body shimmer and a sparkling fragrance gel – so festive and fun. The pearly-pink spray lightly scents the body and leaves behind a feather-like sheen.

Bvlgari's Tea Blanc is a delicate fragrance of warm, intimate and relaxing notes designed for moments in luxury. This very rare white tea is hand-picked in China on only a few days of the year. Be patient. It's available in Spring 2003. Also new from Bvlgari is Object Desire, an ideal purse-size coffret containing Bvlgari's Pour Femme fragrance – total luxury.

The latest perfume creation from Salvatore Ferragamo is Ferragamo Parfum Subtile, an ultra-feminine floral scent that is classic, yet subtly sensual. Exclusive at Holt Renfrew this fall.

Romeo Gigli, the "master of understatement" and the "romantic intellectual" exemplifies his philosophy in a fragrance called Romeo di Romeo Gigli. A unique bouquet of soft and sharp, fruity and sensual aromas makes for a most interesting experience. The unique bottle is exquisite with its rare shape and white bow.

The unmistakable style of Robert Cavalli is embodied in his first signature women's fragrance sheathed in his famous leopard, tiger and zebra prints. It captures the vivacious and seductive energy of every woman's soul and even has a shining austere boa sinuously wrapped around the top of the bottle protecting the sexy pink liquid inside.

EYES: Maybeline has a new mascara called Lash Expansion that volumizes every lash with its unique brush with hook-like bristles.

Revlon's ColorStay Lash Tint promises to stay on up to three days. Wake up to dark lashes without smudging or flaking! It colours safely with natural botanicals and plant-based conditioners.

Rimmel's new Crystal Tip Mascara, is a clear mascara infused with tiny particles of silver. Sparkle your lashes, eyebrows and hair and party on down – great for the young and the young at heart.

Looking for a little Holiday drama? Check out Estee Lauder's Holiday Dramatic Palette, which offers deep vivid shades of plum and gold for eyelids, rich, velvety reds and browns for lips and a champagne creme patina for cheeks.

MaxiMeyes from Dior is an outstanding mascara. In one short stroke, you will receive extra volume, curl and length.

LIPS: Just smashing is Street Chic Dior – a duo of Dior Addict lip colour in the most gorgeous packaging. Definitely a perfect gift. The sleek box is gunmetal-grey metal with a perforated Dior logo and a large black cotton strap pierced with eyelets, so that you can attach it to your wrist, belt or handbag.

Revlon's ColorStay Overtime Lipcolor does double duty with its double-ended package. One end contains the liquid colour-lock colour, the other end features the glossy top coat that keeps the lips moisturized. Results are exquisite and last up to eight hours.

Spectacular is the word to describe Estee Lauder's Pure Color Velvet Lipstick in Velvet Kiss – what a colour, and does it ever feel luscious!

Another wonder from Elizabeth Arden – four eight-hour cream sheer lip tints with an SPF 15. The shades are easy to wear, and it will help relieve chapped, cracked lips leaving them smooth, soft and intensely moisturized.

HAIR: Did you know that Lisa Kudrow wore a $10 smashing Goody hair clip at the Emmy Awards show? Sometimes it's not about the dollars but about the style. Terry Ritcey Salon (122A Yorkville Ave., 416-926-0123) is really bustling for the holiday season. According to their expert artists, hair will be full of spirit and full of bounce. Whether the style is long or short, the key is movement, vitality and a sense of well being. Free and soft are the way to go. Most popular colour shades will be varying hues of red, with maybe a touch of terra cotta.

Hair talk for men

By FRANCES GOODMAN PELLATT
Special to The CJN

Much fuss has always been made over women's hair. The cosmetic industry has customarily targeted the female half of the population with a multitude of concoctions to colour, straighten, curl or thicken women's tresses. What about the other half of society?

A man's mane is also important to his overall look, and although we are all familiar with the expression "clothes make the man," what about above the neck? How a man wears his hair can reveal a great deal about him. He may be dressed in Armani, but his hair can give a different message.

"It's fashion trends, clothes and TV that influence men's hair styles," said Gaetano Pirollo, who has been styling men's hair since the 1950s.

"People see what is being worn, how actors wear their hair, and they want to copy them... and the hair styles go with the clothing styles," explained Pirollo who has an artistic eye and a good imagination for creating the right hair look for his customers.

Men also must consider their hair type and how much time they want to spend on maintaining their chosen look. They can opt for a spiked fashion (a shorter version of the '80s punk style), which can be worn by men with any hair texture, or longer lengths that may require more maintenance. And young men are even opting to put streaks or highlights in their hair. Hair fashion, for men as for women, is heavily influenced by film and television.

For example, several years ago, actor George Clooney combed his hair over his forehead – a look quickly adopted by many men, especially those with receding hairlines. And heartthrob Tom Cruise, at one point, was sporting a medium-length hairdo. Hair can be worn behind the ears or pulled back in a pony tail, and men with rather straight hair can get away with this look – even for the office.

Another option is the bald look first sported by Yul Brynner decades ago. It's now becoming a look of choice for many men, young and old, who are losing their hair. This is high maintenance, however, since you must visit your stylist once or twice a week to keep your dome sleek and clean.

Of course, you could do it yourself at home, and Pirollo stresses remembering to soften the hair follicles with hot towels (or a shower) before shaving your scalp, and closing the pores with cold towels afterwards, including a shpritz of aftershave.

Pirollo maintains that it's the structure of a man's face that is the foundation for how the top of his head should look, and he stresses that hair should never be just cut, but styled.

"When I first started [in this business] men wore brush cuts," he said, "and mothers would bring in their sons and say, 'Make it short, cut it short.'... When they became teenagers, the boys would want to copy their friends and I would make suggestions, leaving the hair longer on top to create a wave."

Men's hair fashion has come a long way since the bowl-on-top-of-the-head look, and Pirollo believes there should be individuality in men's coiffures.

"A man with a long face should wear longer sideburns. Hair has to be balanced... longer on the sides and shorter on the top to frame the face," he said, explaining how the length of the sideburns can fill in the face.

"If you have no chin, for example, a beard completes the face, fills in the contours of the face... and a mustache left longer over the upper lip camouflages small facial defects, like thin lips or crooked teeth," Pirollo added.

It's not just women who can be accused of being vain. Men also take pride in their personal appearance. And they are not ashamed to use hair-enhancing products, including gels and mousse, hair wax and pomades to create the style they want, even enduring soft perms to achieve curls and hair dyes to maintain a more youthful look.

"If he doesn't have a nice [nape], then I leave the hair longer in the back and thicker," said Pirollo, who believes a man should style his hair in a fashion that suits his personality and lifestyle and makes him feel comfortable.

Men are taking more control over their hair and adopting a variety of ways to wear their locks that reflect their lifestyles and who they are.

"Everyone today wants a natural look," Pirollo concluded. "The way a man dresses depicts how he should style his hair... one falls into the other and makes a statement of who he is."

Mandy Patinkin

Patinkin says Mamaloshen celebrates all cultures

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

With his 50th birthday approaching at the end of this month, Mandy Patinkin says he's just getting going.

"I'm excited about being 50," he said last week, with a hearty laugh that reverberated over the phone from Boston, where he was performing on tour. "I feel that the best is ahead of me. I've been more than blessed."

The Emmy and Tony award-winner – a native of Chicago now based in New York – brings his Yiddish-language concert, Mamaloshen, to Toronto on Nov. 14, at the Toronto Centre for the Arts. The concert, which was last here in 1999, will be the only Canadian stop in his current tour.

Patinkin's schedule this year has him alternating three concerts: A pops concert, Mamaloshen, and Celebrating Sondheim, which was recorded live in February for a CD that was released last week, Mandy Patinkin Sings Sondheim. The Sondheim show will run from Dec. 2 to Jan. 6 at New York's Henry Ford Theater two nights a week and Christmas Eve.

Patinkin said he was also waiting for word on a new television series, a dark comedy in which he plays "the Grim Reaper, but I'm a good guy." The pilot was filmed in Vancouver for Showtime and could represent his return to series television following the demise in 2000 of Chicago Hope, in which he played heart surgeon Jeffrey Geiger.

Among his other projects, Patinkin is working on a Mamaloshen book, a long-term project with a scheduled completion date of two years ago, he laughed.

On a more serious note, he mentioned he's planning a trip to Eastern Europe and "hopefully" Israel – a trip he is planning to make in conjunction with his writing. The main purpose, he said, would be to walk in the footsteps of his ancestors and those of Joe Papp, the late Broadway producer who set Patinkin on his Yiddish journey.

As a supporter of Peace Now, Patinkin has not wanted to visit Israel because he did not support Israeli government policies. But now, Patinkin has changed his tune.

"I'm going now," he said. "It's a time to show myself that life is to celebrate and not be afraid of anything. My struggle in life is to turn darkness into light...There's no darker place in the world where I'd like to bring some light both to myself and to Israel.

"It's also an important time to make a statement as an American Jew that Israel's not a place any of us should be afraid of visiting, and to spread the word for peace for all humanity."

Even after years of working on his Yiddish repertoire, Patinkin still hasn't figured out why the music of his ancestors touches him so deeply.

"Wherever you come from," he advises, "even if you've never heard the music, the lyrics, or the history of your culture, dip into it. Without a doubt it will leave you with the most enigmatic, wonderful feeling," he said.

Mamaloshen is "very much a celebration of all immigrant cultures, told through Jewish immigrant eyes," he said.

Unlike his new pops concerts, Mamaloshen, which is based on his 1998 CD of the same name, is "a set, formal piece," he explained. The wide-ranging Yiddish songs are linked by snippets of Paul Simon's American Tune. This year's concert includes a couple of new encore songs, he said.

In keeping with the formality he mentioned, Patinkin wears a black suit for the performance, albeit with a t-shirt – the combination reflecting to an extent the intensity found in songs like Belz, and the fun of an all-Yiddish medley that includes Supercalifragilisticexpialidocious.

In the wake of last year's terrorist attacks on Washington and New York, Patinkin said, "This is not a time when I am going out to raise money," referring to fundraising he has done during past performances. "I'm going out to raise spirits."

Classic Creations Says Thanks To Its Clients

Tucked away at the north end of Toronto, in the Newtonbrook Plaza, is one of the city's true treasures. Classic Creations was once referred to as one of the best kept secrets in Toronto. Now in their 19th year, brothers Ami and Sam Freiberg credit their success to the loyalty of their clients. "Our business has grown strictly by word of mouth," Ami told the CJN.

The "Dynamic Duo", as they have been affectionately referred to as, travel the world extensively to bring back the latest in jewellery fashion and design. "Our clients have come to expect the newest styles at unbeatable prices, never sacrificing quality." Classic Creations Say Thanks To Their Clients

When you first step into their new location, you feel as though you have been transported to a beautiful jewellery store in Europe. The friendly and knowledgeable staff makes you feel at home. "The right attitude is everything." "When we first discussed moving into our newer and larger home we kept emphasizing to our designers that we don't want to lose our 'Haymishe' feel." You can sense the warm friendly atmosphere the second you arrive.

Their custom design work is outstanding. The care and attention given to each piece by their master craftsmen is only surpassed by the delight and joy on the face of the recipient.

Where their true strength lies is in their diamonds. "We take great care and effort in selecting that 'perfect diamond'. We have a great selection of shapes and sizes at prices that have made us the talk of the town."

They have a large collection of watches, such as Concord, Baume & Mercier, Movado, MontBlanc, Raymond Weil, TechnoMarine, Swiss Army, Lancaster, Ritmo Mvndo, as well as other affordable brands.

Their newest line of watches is the Corum brand. "We are very excited that Corum has chosen us. With such models as the Bubble, Trapeze, Heart Watch, Sugar Cube and Lady Oval to name just a few, Corum has become the benchmark for creative innovation by offering models that are different from other watch brands."

Classic Creations is at 5799 Yonge St. Suite 101 in the Newtonbrook Plaza, just north of Finch. Their store hours are Monday-Wednesday 9:30-6, Thursday 9:30-8, Friday 9:30-7, Saturday 9:30-6 and now Sunday 12-5. Call 416-222-0405.

It's possible to 'do' China in under two hours

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

SHENZHEN, China — China is an immense country, its touristic points of interest scattered far and wide.

It would normally take a visitor weeks, if not months, to visit the most important ones.

But in Splendid China, a theme park in Shenzhen, a mainland Chinese city only about an hour away from Hong Kong by car or train, you can "do" China in a day, and, in fact, in less than two hours.

It's a virtual tour, of course, but after you've walked through Splendid China, you know what's worth seeing and lingering over in the People's Republic of China.

The 67 sights, from the Great Wall of China to the Forbidden City in Beijing, are one-fifteenth of their normal size and set in a beautifully landscaped park of expansive lawns, coconut palms and stone lions, elephants and camels.

When you gaze upon the scale models, you are immediately and effortlessly transported into an exotic and mesmerizing world of temples, pagodas, palaces, mausoleums, tombs, mountain peaks, waterfalls, grottoes, forests and terra cotta figures.

The Buddhist Stone Sculpture.

Looking at these wonderfully crafted miniature models, you feel as if you're in an airplane at an altitude of a few thousand feet.

Apart from the Forbidden City, among the models that most impressed me were the Three Gorges of the Yangtze River, Sun Yat-Sen's Mausoleum, the Stone Forest, the Ming Tombs and the Buddhist Stone Sculpture.

While you're in the vicinity, take time out to visit the adjacent China Folk Culture Villages, which preview 21 of China's 56 ethnic groups in their life-sized dwellings.

The landscaping here, too, is magnificent, with ponds and foot bridges and manicured flowerbeds, trees and shrubs.

The gentle greenery creates a placid atmosphere that is at once pleasant and relaxing.

The highlight of China Folk Culture Villages is doubtless the the awkwardly named Grand Folk Costume Poetic Spectacle.

An hour-long sound and light show featuring exquisitely costumed dancers and the flare and sizzle of pyrotechnics, it is indeed a sight to behold and savour.

Shenzhen itself, in a special economic zone created to foster capitalism in Communist China, has come a long way in two decades. In 1980, Shenzhen was a backwater with little to recommend it. Today, it's a booming city filled with cars and bristling with red and yellow building cranes, a gateway to southern China.

Yet, in the name of progress, Shenzhen appears to have lost some of its inncocent charm. The rice paddies that once graced its outer fringes are all but gone, having been largely replaced by a bluish and greenish wall of skyscrapers.

Play sets Canadian bootlegging couple's story to music

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

At the heart of every bootlegging couple is emotional intimacy and romance. Or so Whiskey Serenade would have us believe.

In its world premiere run from Nov. 8 to Nov. 23 at the Toronto Centre for the Arts, the musical depicts the true story of Rocco Perri and Bessie Starkman, an Italian mobster and his Jewish wife who rose from city slums to run a successful criminal network in Toronto in the 1920s.

Not only did they smuggle whiskey to Mafia families in upstate New York, the Canadian version of Bonnie and Clyde also shipped booze to Chicago's Al Capone.

Staged by Tribal Productions and written by Ralph Small and Michael Kitz, the criminal love story swirls around themes of ambition, loyalty and rags-to-riches success. And all this from two bootleggers with cravings for cash.

"They were making millions when even making a million was unheard of," says director Eli Lukawitz. He adds that Whiskey Serenade is above all a human story with romantic brushstrokes – so don't expect The Untouchables.

The story centres on Starkman and her control of the illegal activities that consumed the couple.

As a Jewish woman in the underworld, Starkman (played by Jennifer Gould) became a symbol of empowerment and leadership, Lukawitz says, adding that she perhaps should be considered a pioneer feminist.

In the 1920s, women were rarely appointed to positions of power, but Starkman battled stereotypes to become the force behind the bootlegging and racketeering network. In fact, Perri (played by Sam Owen) had less say in business matters than his wife.

"Without her, Perri would have never succeeded like he did," says Lukawitz.

In the play, the financial rewards inspire the couple to sing a tune appropriately titled Let It Roll.

Elements of Judaism from Starkman's life, such as Yiddish phrases and Shabbat candles, add flavour. And a scene involving an inspirational zaide also helps explain Starkman's ambitions.

Lukawitz, a founding member of Tribal Productions, says he was attracted to the story's romantic elements and underworld backdrop. And his love for the Mafia genre blended well with the tale of these local crime legends who rose from poverty.

"I wanted to do a show about Canadians, by Canadians, for Canadians," he says, adding that many people believe the country's history is bland and tame. But he hopes audiences will see the aspiring couple as a testament to the idea that love conquers all – even the law.

Other upcoming shows for Tribal Productions this year include a comedy called Wild Guys and an adaptation of George Orwell's 1984.

For tickets to Whiskey Serenade, call Ticketmaster at 416-870-8000.

Film explores how survivors turned to each other for love

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

"We were young when we were liberated. With no place to go, we turned to each other. Some might say Hitler was our matchmaker."

The speaker, a Jewish woman, is a Holocaust survivor, and the sentiments she expresses were quite common among survivors after World War II.

Torn from their loved ones during the Shoah, and more than ready to resume their lives after the war, these survivors sought what we all want: peace and quiet and normality.

Turning to each other for comfort and empathy, they formed intimate relationships that often solidified into durable marriages.

In Undying Love, a documentary to be screened at the Bloor Cinema (506 Bloor West) on Sunday, Nov. 10 at 7 p.m., Helene Klodawsky explores the healing power of love.

The 87-minute film, the first to my knowledge to touch on this theme, tells the stories of several individuals, now living in Canada and the United States, who reconstructed their lives in the wake of this unprecedented catastrophe.

Produced by Ina Fichman and narrated by Molly Parker, Undying Love unfolds through on-camera interviews, vintage clips from Hollywood and Yiddish movies and dramatic re-enactments.

It's a poignant film, and deserves an audience.

After the liberation in 1945, David Rybowski, a Polish Jew from Lodz, was "hungry for love." By chance, he ran into Zenia, whom he had known, and fallen in love with, in Poland.

Zenia was not really in the market for a husband, but, being lonely and in need of companionship, she agreed to marry David. Eventually, she learned to love him.

Bluma Klodawski, the director's mother, endured hunger in a ghetto and hardship in several concentration camps.

Standing forlornly on a railway platform in Frankfurt, she saw a young man emerging from a train. It was, of all things, her old boyfriend. Bashfully, she acknowledges that sex was part of her emotional re-awakening.

David and Anna Newman met in a labour camp in 1943, but were separated shortly afterward.

In Buchenwald, remarkably enough, David persuaded a sympathetic German guard to let him write two letters to Anna.

"She was destined to be my wife," he says.

And so she was.

Joe Korzenik had lost faith in humanity after spending some of the best years of his life in a ghetto and in concentration camps.

He hated everyone.

But after meeting Ruthie in the United States, where he had settled in 1946, he rediscovered life. "Ultimately, I learned that when you hate, you are the one that hurts."

Helen Schwartz, the daughter of a matchmaker from Bialystock, met her husband-to-be, Eric, in a labour camp. He promised her food and protection if she agreed to marry him after the war.

She said yes.

Separated for a year-and-a-half, they found each other in Bergen-Belsen, a camp in Germany.

"Life is as good as you make it," she says. "I think I was the best wife a man could have."

Tania Rozmaryn was 18 when her mother introduced her to Mendel. She thought Mendel could provide Tania with financial security.

Tania did not like Mendel, who was temperamentally too different from her for her tastes. Nevertheless, she married him. Her mother had threatened to kill herself if she spurned Mendel.

Predictably, their marriage was less than successful. On the day she enrolled her son in medical school, she asked Mendel for a divorce.

To her amazement, she met another man, and now believes in love.

A re-enactment from Undying Love.

Lilly Friedman and her two sisters together survived Auschwitz and a forced march.

In a displaced persons camp, she met a man who became her fiance. He was a resourceful person, trading cigarettes and coffee for a German parachute whose fabric was used for Lilly's bridal gown. Subsequently, the gown was worn by 17 other brides.

"We had no parents or grandparents to advise us," says Lilly. "We had to rely on ourselves."

Not too surprisingly, the Jewish birthrate in DP camps soared. Indeed, it was one of the highest in the world.

As Undying Love ends, David observes that nothing is as important as love.

"You said the right thing," Zenia counters.

He could not have put it better.

Grey Zone creator happy his movie had no Hollywood involvement

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Tim Blake Nelson, the writer and director of The Grey Zone, one of the most chilling and powerful films ever made about the Holocaust, is now glad that Hollywood studios failed to option his movie.

"Thankfully, there was no studio involvement," he said in a telephone interview last week from his home in New York City.

In fact, The Grey Zone was financed by two independent Israeli producers – Avi and Danny Lerner of Los Angeles-based Millennium Films – who found his script compelling and irresistible.

The Lerners were so committed to it that they did not expect to recoup their $4 million (US) investment, Nelson said.

Tim Blake Nelson

Starring Harvey Keitel and David Arquette, The Grey Zone takes place in Auschwitz on the eve of a 1944 prisoners' revolt, the first and only one in that concentration camp.

In retrospect, Nelson realizes that if The Grey Zone had been bought by a major studio, it probably would have been tainted by untenable artistic compromises.

Speaking of his association with the Lerners, he said, "I didn't have to soften or sentimentalize the subject matter for commercial appeal. There were no such pressures. Had it been made by a studio, it wouldn't have been what it is."

Currently playing at the Cineplex Odeon chain, The Grey Zone turns on a doomed group of Hungarian Jews in a sonderkommando squad. Sonderkommandos helped the Nazis exterminate their fellow Jews in exchange for certain privileges and a longer life.

Nelson, whose grandparents fled Nazi Germany on the eve of Kristallnacht in November 1938, does not see it as a strictly Jewish film, despite its setting.

"I consider it a film about being human under terrible circumstances," said Nelson, referring to the moral dilemma the sonderkommandos suddenly face when they are forced to decide what to do with a Jewish girl who has miraculously survived the gas chamber.

"Their decision was human, not Jewish," he added.

The genesis of The Grey Zone was a play Nelson worked on about his family's emigration from Europe.

His grandparents, Herman and Kate Kaiser, as well as his mother, were German Jews who got out just in the nick of time. They joined relatives in Tulsa, Okla., where Nelson was born 38 years ago.

"After a year of researching and writing, I decided that the play would have been redundant. Others had said the same thing better. So I kept doing my research."

Then he read Primo Levi's essay The Grey Zone in the book The Drowned and the Saved.

"It was one of the most provocative pieces of writing I had read," said Nelson, a graduate of Brown University and the Juilliard Theatre Center. "Levi is the patron saint of this project."

Raised in a fairly conservative Jewish household, he was captivated by Levi's nuanced depiction of life in Auschwitz, his steadfast refusal to sanctify Jews just because they had been victims and his view that the Holocaust is infinitely repeatable.

"I admired his bare-bones honesty."

The movie, which originally took the form of an off-Broadway play, was also inspired by the memoirs of Miklos Nyiszli, a Hungarian Jewish doctor who helped the infamous Dr. Josef Mengele with his gruesome medical experiments in Auschwitz.

Nelson, whose father Don was a petroleum geologist, spent five months planning and filming in Bulgaria.

His wife, Lisa Benavedes, whom he met at Juilliard, has a supporting role in the movie.

There were rough moments during the 41-day shoot. "Sometimes, I felt it was like climbing Mount Everest with bowling shoes."

Although the sets, including the crematoria, had been constructed with meticulous attention to detail, Nelson had them destroyed when the shoot was finished."I didn't see any reason to leave them so they could be exploited for other reasons."

The Grey Zone, which has earned about $3 million (US) in North American box office receipts so far, was originally scheduled to be released last year after its debut at the Toronto International Film Festival.

But after the Sept. 11 terror attacks, Lions Gate, the distributor, held back.

"They feared no one would want to see a film as relentless and intense as The Grey Zone."

Lions Gate also felt that "incorrect connections" might be drawn between Sept. 11 and the Holocaust.

"I urged them to release it, but I ended up agreeing with their reasoning," he said.

Nelson, who is also an actor, having appeared in such films as O Brother, Where Art Thou? and The Thin Red Line, is pleased with the critics' reaction.

"The majority have responded positively... [Chicago Sun-Times movie critic] Roger Ebert gave it four stars."

Even critics who did not particularly like it expressed a measure of admiration, he said.

Prior to The Grey Zone, Nelson directed O, a modern adaptation of Shakespeare's Othello, and Eye of God, a thriller.

Currently, he is considering an offer to direct Sylvia Plath's The Glass Jar.

Business Profile

Canadian film company gets respect in Tinseltown

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

When Peter Sussman was a young lawyer working in the entertainment division of a Toronto law firm, he got lucky and met the founders of Atlantis Communications, a fledgling Canadian film company.

The individuals in question, Michael MacMillan, Seaton McLean and Ted Riley, were rising stars in the business.

One day, MacMillan called Sussman and asked him whether he would like to join them. Atlantis Communications was growing. That was in 1985.

Seventeen years on, Atlantis Communications, founded in 1978, has morphed into Alliance Atlantis Communications, one of Canada's leading producers and distributors of filmed entertainment, and Sussman has become a principal shareholder and a chief executive officer of one of its divisions.

Formed from the 1998 merger of Alliance Communications and Atlantis Communications, the company is divided into three operating units, some of which seem to overlap.

The entertainment group, of which Sussman is in charge, acquires, produces and distributes movies and television shows including the black comedy Dirty Deeds and the CBS TV detective series CSI: Crime Scene Investigation.

The motion picture distribution group, Canada's largest distributor of movies, has links with New Line Cinema, Miramax Films, Artisan Entertainment, USA Films and Studio Canal. Its films run the gamut from Lord of the Rings and Ararat to Spy Kids and Bowling for Columbine.

The broadcast group, which launched Canada's first two cable channels, Life Network and Showcase, now has a roster of channels, some of which are Home & Garden Television, History Television, Discovery Health and Food Network Canada.

Sussman was born and raised in Toronto. But for the past 11 years, he has lived in Santa Monica, a fashionable seaside suburb of Los Angeles, and has represented Alliance Atlantis in Hollywood.

"I like L.A. a lot," Sussman said.

The brain behind a forthcoming two-night mini-series on Adolf Hitler, Sussman is what is commonly known in the industry as a "player," a person of influence in Hollywood.

"Hollywood takes you seriously if you're talented and can deliver," said Sussman, who was recently in Toronto to promote a raft of Alliance Atlantis movies – among them Frida and The Quiet American – at the Toronto International Film Festival. "They don't care where you're from. In L.A., it's all about the product."

According to Sussman, Hollywood is mercurial – cold and alienating if you're an outsider, warm and friendly if you're an insider.

Alliance Atlantis, he said, commands respect in Tinseltown because of its size, scope and reliability.

The facts tell the story.

Sussman's entertainment group has produced approximately 250 movies and more than 75 TV drama series, which have won some 200 major prizes, including a coveted Academy Award.

His first television film, Cowboys Don't Cry, was followed by The Ray Bradbury Theatre. The latter was not only a hit, but a door-opener. It essentially introduced Sussman to Hollywood.

He is particularly proud of two of his projects.

CSI: Crime Scene Investigation, now in its third season and with a mean audience of 25 million, was recently nominated for a Golden Globe. A spinoff, CSI-Miami, debuted on Sept. 23.

Bowling for Columbine, a feature-length documentary written and directed by satirist Michael Moore and unveiled at the Toronto International Film Festival, brazenly asks viewers: "Are we a nation of gun nuts, or are we just nuts?"

Sussman, who is partial to director-driven movies, plans to release a number of new films soon. They include The 51st State, starring Samuel Jackson; The Good Thief, starring Nick Nolte; and Owning Mahowny, starring Philip Seymour Hoffman.

A master of the TV mini-series, Sussman has overseen a panoply of award-winning prime time television movies. Joan of Arc received 13 Emmy Award nominations, while Life with Judy Garland: Me and My Shadow, drew 20 million viewers and was the most-watched TV movie of the 2001 season.

Brought up in a Conservative Jewish household, Sussman has always taken a special interest in mini-series films dealing with Jewish topics.

Nuremberg, with Christopher Plummer and Brian Cox, turned on the 1946 trial of Nazi war criminals in Germany.

Haven, based on a book by American foreign correspondent Ruth Gruber, dealt with the refugee aspect of the Holocaust.

Sussman's latest project on the Holocaust, whose working title is Hitler, is currently being filmed in Prague and Munich, and will be broadcast in Canada and the United States next May.

In general, some projects can be delivered within two years, he said. But others, he explained, can take a decade to flesh out and develop.

"Projects are funny. Some are meant to be made at a certain point in time."

Now 44, he is married to Heather, a freelance journalist, and the couple have two children.

He was raised in a middle-class neighbourhood near Forest Hill, the son of Murray (Sonny) and Norma Sussman. Murray, a mortgage banker, works with his other son, Sandy.

Sussman attended Bathurst Heights Secondary School and then York University, where he studied law.

"I practised law for a year, but I had other aspirations," he said, referring to the entertainment business.

After joining Atlantis Communications, he wrote his California bar exam "to keep doors open." Sussman knew the company would have to open an office in Hollywood sooner or later

As he put it: "You can only do business in L.A. by being a member of the community."

Sussman, who controls 73 per cent of the company's shares along with his partners, is confident that Alliance Atlantic will prosper

"So far, every year has been better than the last. I hope we'll make similar progress in the future."

His strategy is hardly a secret, being contained in the company's glossy annual 2002 report: "We are committed to producing and selling high quality, commercially appealing content while focusing on reducing higher cost production and the capital we invest in it."

It sounds bland, but it sums up Sussman's philosophy in a nutshell.

Old clubs, old friends, old stories

By DAVID HIMELFARB
Special to The CJN

"Irv, is that you?"

You heard a lot of that at the Y All-Clubs Reunion held Oct. 22 at the Bathurst JCC's Leah Posluns Theatre. Before vigorously shaking hands, hugging or even choking back a tear, you had to be sure it was an old friend whom you hadn't seen for so many years.

The reunion was a celebration of 50 years (give or take a few) of friendships forged in high school and cemented through years of dating, softball, basketball, Crystal Beach, hi-jinks and socials (weren't we quaint?).

It was an after-school life that centred around being a member of the YMHA, first on Brunswick Avenue, then at a variety of downtown locations: 12 Major St., 44 St. George St., and as of 1953, the spanking new building at Bloor and Spadina, where practically every downtown Jewish boy belonged to a club.

For so many it was their home away from home.

With a few posters, a nutty invitation, lots of word-of-mouth and a timely article in The CJN, about 150 "Y Old Boys" showed up to eat, drink, jog their memories, renew acquaintances, tell wild stories and laugh.

Sure, their appearances have changed over the years, but it wasn't exactly the good, the bad and the ugly.

It was more like a scene you might find in Dr. Bernstein's waiting room. A few more pounds here, a few more pounds there, and more hair on faces than on heads. An ambitious wig-maker could have made a fortune.

Or as one wit was overheard to have said, "I feel like I'm at the reception from my big fat geek wedding."

Where did it all start? About five years ago some members of the Y's Club Kenton and Club Demaurie decided they still liked each other's company well enough to get the guys together for breakfast on the first Thursday of every month. Pretty soon word got out, and other old Y clubbers started showing up.

These were guys who were keen to renew friendships and relationships and to hold on to what they once had. Call it camaraderie, male bonding or whatever. They knew it made them feel good, and they wanted it back.

Spurred on by the impetus of Kenny Borden, Sonny Langer, Hy Himmel and Herbie Fruitman, a committee was soon formed to pull all the pieces together.

Back in a previous lifetime, Sonny had been a member of Club Kenton and later became a professional worker in the teen department at the Bloor Y. He had maintained contact with many of his old friends so it was relatively easy for him to put the word out. And it spread like wildfire.

An event of this nature had been talked about for some time, but this time, perhaps inspired by the life and recent death of Murray "Squirt" Tonken, the committee was determined to bring it to fruition.

"Squirt" was a mainstay of the old Y scene who did everything from organizing sporting events to running the now legendary Sunday night dances. A special tribute was paid to him at the reunion and the entire evening was dedicated to his memory.

It was an event that had to happen, and boy, did it ever. They started showing up at 6:00 p.m. and they kept coming and coming.

It began with polite hand-shaking, then looks of bewilderment and finally smiles as some looked in awe at their old friends. Many hadn't seen each other in more than 30 years. They spent the next few hours trying to erase those intervening years. It was like a walk along College Street again.

After the shmoozefest, they all sat down at their respective club tables to enjoy a delicious buffet dinner catered by Sonny Langer (it's good to have a friend in the food business), with an open bar conducive to jogging sweet memories.

Some wonderful entertainment was supplied by story teller Jack Gelman, Jerry Gray of the Travellers, and Irv Pancer. Even if you'd heard some of Pancer's jokes before, his uncanny delivery made you laugh all over again.

Everyone received a commemorative T-shirt to remember the evening, whose proceeds are being donated to the Bathurst JCC.

And it was agreed not to wait another 50 years to do it again.

Haifa stuns Manchester United in Champions League play

By ORI LEWIS
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

NICOSIA, Cyprus — Maccabi Haifa last week recorded perhaps the greatest-ever result by an Israeli team in European competition by beating the mighty Manchester United 3-0 in the Champions League at a Haifa home game played in Cyprus.

Having already assured themselves of winning the group, United fielded a depleted lineup still hoping to maintain their unbeaten record, but they came unstuck against a Haifa side that played with passion and commitment and fully deserved to win.

Haifa, who were thrashed 5-2 by United in their first meeting at Old Trafford in September, gave their travelling army of supporters, an estimated 10,000 fans who flew and boated to Cyprus, plenty to cheer about.

If their debut in the Champions League at Old Trafford was hailed at the time as an historic chapter in the annals of Israeli soccer, the performance last week made the joy complete and made worthwhile the expense of travelling to Cyprus for home matches. (Israel is prevented from hosting international games due to the security situation in the country.)

Haifa looked like the much better team for the entire match, while United appeared to slow the pace sometimes looking as if they playing a practice game.

The first half was played with Haifa giving all it had against a team that was a pale imitation of the one that 12,000 United fans (almost all from Cyprus) had come to see, even if the club's superstars were missing.

Haifa held the majority of the possession and threatened more than their opponents, but it was United who had the first credible attempt at goal, when Paul Scholes shot from outside the area, forcing Dudu Awate to parry the ball for a corner.

While other flawed attempts by United players either ended up with weak or wide shots, Haifa tried to build moves, mainly through Giovanni Rosso, who created several dangerous situations that lacked a finishing touch.

But Haifa finally got their just reward when after a scramble, the ball fell loose for Yaniv Katan, who shook off John O'Shea and shot from 20 metres went high into the back of goalie Ricardo Lopez Felipe's net.

The second half started tamely, although Haifa, knowing that one goal would surely not be enough, continued to pressure United all over the field.

Their tactic paid dividends when defensive midfielder Raimondas Zutautas blasted a 25-metre shot from in front of the goal, leaving Ricardo no chance. It was almost a repeat of Katan's goal, but from even longer range.

The third goal, which completed the rout, came from an Yakoubu Ayegbeni penalty in the 77th minute after Zutautas had been brought down by Ricardo.

After the game, United manager Sir Alex Ferguson said Haifa was a worthy winner. "Two tremendous strikes that came out of nowhere, and they won it. After their second, they sat back behind the ball, played the counter-attack and made it very difficult for us."

United played without England captain David Beckham and countryman Nicky Butt, Argentina's Juan Sebastian Veron, Dutch striker Ruud van Nistelrooy, Welsh winger Ryan Giggs, French stars Fabien Barthez and Laurent Blanc and Irishman Roy Keane.

1/2 tsp. cinnamon

In large roasting pan, mix popcorn and chow mein noodles.

Melt butter and sugar together, stir in vanilla and cinnamon. Pour over popcorn, toss to coat.

Bake at 250°F for 1 hour, stirring every 20 minutes.

Add nuts, spread on waxed paper or parchment paper to cool. Store airtight. Makes 11 cups.

About Teens

Dear Karilani,

I recently got a part-time job at a store in the mall near my house. I enjoy working, and I like the other employees, but I am having some problems with my boss. He is not giving me as many hours as the other staff, and he is constantly scheduling mandatory meetings and not paying us for them. This is my first job, so I do not know how managers are supposed to treat their employees, but I don't feel I am being treated fairly. What do you think I should do?

Troubled Employee

Dear Troubled Employee,

What you are experiencing is a very common problem. Unfortunately, many teenagers are unaware of their rights, and because of that employers sometimes take advantage of them.

Try talking to your boss. Tell him how you feel and ask him to explain the way he runs the store. Often, more workers then needed are hired, and the result is that some people must work fewer hours than others. There may be reasons behind his behaviour that you are unaware of. As with anyone else, you should discuss your problems with him before coming to any conclusions.

It is also important that you do your research. Contact your provincial labour board or ministry of labour and tell them your concerns. They will be able to provide you with the laws and regulations that your boss must follow. If you feel he is violating any of them, present him with the information you have learned. Being educated is the key to getting him to take you seriously.

If you still have doubts about your job, it may not be the best thing for you right now. Working is supposed to be a learning experience, not the source of suffering. Maybe right now it's best to focus on school and not worry about a job. Or, it may be time apply elsewhere. Either way, this job was not a wasted experience. You have learned valuable lessons and have one more thing to add to your résumé.

Dear Karilani is written on a rotating basis by three high school students. The drawing is a composite. We welcome questions from our readers. Please mail, e-mail or fax them to The CJN.

Cranes over the Hula Valley

Tens of thousands of cranes arrived last week at the Hula Valley in northern Israel during their annual migration away from the harsh winter in Europe. Some of the birds fly on to Africa, but most remain in the Hula and return to Europe at the end of the winter. [Israel Sun photo]

First Nations and Inuit tour Israel

'From the Land of the North Star to the Land of the Star of David.'

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Four years ago, Rev. Roger Armbruster was addressing a Christian conference in the capital of the new territory of Nunavut in the north.

"I mentioned I would like to see some Inuit people visiting Israel," recalls the freelance minister, who is part of the evangelical Fellowship of Christian Assemblies. "There was a lot of enthusiasm, so we began organizing."

Since then, Rev. Armbruster, who is based in southern Manitoba, has led three Inuit tour groups to Israel and has a fourth scheduled to go in January.

He says the Inuit are not your regular North American Christian tourists, because they are not as interested in visiting religious shrines as they are in getting a feel for the land and the people.

Among the stops on the upcoming 10-day tour will be nature parks, the Sea of Galilee, the Dead Sea, Mount Carmel and a Bedouin community. The group will also spend several days in Jerusalem, which will include meetings with government officials and representatives of the mayor's office.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Project Hope

WINNIPEG — Nearly two dozen Christian clergymen and Jewish community officials were briefed recently about the efforts of Bridges for Peace to help Jews in the Former Soviet Union (FSU). Bridges for Peace, which promotes good relations between Christians and Jews, provides free services for needy Jews across the FSU, said Stanislaw Gawel, a minister and administrator of the organization's Project Hope program, which provides the Jewish poor with electric heaters, wood or coal for winter.

Hezbollah in Canada

OTTAWA — Opposition foreign affairs critic Stockwell Day slammed Foreign Minister Bill Graham for being "wrong again" about Hezbollah's legal status in Canada. In a news release, Day said the minister claimed in parliament that Hezbollah's military wing was "banned." However, Day said, "it is not a crime to recruit, organize or train for any branch of Hezbollah. While the government can confiscate the assets of the so-called military wing, the terrorist group is free to raise funds under the auspices of its political branch."

KINGSTON — Lt.-Col. Bob Chamberlain, a former military attache who was once kidnapped in the Middle East by members of Hezbollah, says Hezbollah is a terrorist organization and Canada's decision to separate its military and political sides makes no sense.

Holocaust Education

HAMILTON — UJA Federation of Hamilton will participate in the Asper Foundation Holocaust and Human Rights Studies Program for students in grades 9, 10 and 11. The program includes an 18-hour educational component and a visit to the Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C. followed by community volunteer work.

Realtor Mourned

TORONTO — Hundreds of mourners gathered at Temple Har Zion to pay their respects to Lisa Posluns, a 38-year-old realtor who was found stabbed to death in her Yorkville office building last week. Posluns was remembered by her sister, Helen, as a woman possessing great strength and "an impeccable code of ethics."

Submissions Sought

TORONTO — Gam Yachad, a new literary journal spearheaded by University of Toronto student Jason Rotstein as a response to the crisis in Israel, is issuing a final call for contributions to its first issue. Essays, drawings, poems, short stories and photos by Canadian Jewish youth (age 16 to 24) are welcome. Submissions, due by Dec. 1, should be sent to: gamyachad@yahoo.ca.

ISRAEL

Burial Box

JERUSALEM — The Israeli owner of a burial box believed to hold the remains of James, the brother of Jesus, is under investigation for allegedly acquiring the ossuary illegally. Oded Golan is suspected of illegally purchasing the burial box. According to the Antiquities Law, any artifact discovered or found in Israel after 1978 is state property.

WORLD

Senate Minyan

WASHINGTON — The Jewish presence in Congress has grown to 11 senators and 26 representatives, up from 10 senators and 27 representatives. In the House of Representatives, one new Jewish face emerged after Tuesday's mid-term elections – Rahm Emanuel, the former Clinton adviser. Emanuel will join Eric Cantor of Virginia, a staunch conservative and the only Jewish Republican left in the House.

In the race for the Senate, Democrat Frank Lautenberg won in New Jersey while the one Jewish senator up for re-election – Carl Levin of Michigan – was re-elected easily. With the victory of Norm Coleman in Minnesota over former vice-president Walter Mondale, the Senate's minyan grew to 11.

The Jewish incumbents in the Senate are Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.), Russell Feingold (D-Wisc.), Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), Herb Kohl (D-Wisc.), Joseph Lieberman (D-Conn.), Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.), Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) and Ron Wyden (D-Ore.)

JDL's Rubin Dies

LOS ANGELES — A jailed leader of the Jewish Defence League was declared brain dead after making what police described as a suicide attempt. Authorities said Irv Rubin used a razor to slit his neck and throat and then fell or jumped from a prison balcony as he and other inmates lined up for breakfast. The incident occurred hours before he was scheduled to appear in court for a hearing in his case.

Rubin was arrested in December 2001 for conspiring to bomb a mosque and an Arab American representative's office in Los Angeles.

Books and Buttons

TORONTO — Stop the Homicide buttons produced by Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region (CJC), the National Council of Jewish Women, Toronto section (NCJW/T) and Jewish CUPE locals are being distributed to local Jewish book and gift stores.

The proceeds of the sales will be donated to the David Rosenzweig Memorial Fund for Victims of Terror.

Janice Landy, president of NCJW/T said, "While we are pleased to see the support of the Jewish book stores, we look forward to other book stores taking up the cause and joining us in distributing this button."

Lil Nobel, president of CUPE local 2063, which represents employees at UJA Federation, CJC Ontario and Jewish Immigration Aid Services said that "many of us were hurt and disappointed when CUPE Ontario endorsed what I can only describe as an appalling resolution against Israel. This is a small attempt to demonstrate that members from our locals stand in solidarity with our Israeli brothers and sisters."

Canada's policy on funding Hezbollah draws fire

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Harvard law professor Alan Dershowitz plans to participate in academic conferences in Israel at least twice in the next few months, he told a capacity crowd last week.

UJA campaign closes

"Going to visit Israel during these times of crisis is crucial," he said in an impassioned speech at the Sheraton Centre Hotel, where more than 2,200 people had gathered for the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's annual campaign closing.

For those who have considered making aliyah, Dershowitz said, "Israel has never needed your support more than now."

He urged audience members, who were celebrating a record campaign of $67 million – a significant percentage of which supports social service needs in Israel – to continue their support of the Jewish state (this year's campaign total was $16.5 million higher than last year, representing the third largest of its kind in North America), to pressure the Canadian government, write letters to the editor, train young people to become politically involved and to educate non-Jewish friends and neighbours.

Alan Dershowitz

"You are entitled as a matter of absolute morality to speak your mind and tell your government the truth," he said.

Dershowitz clarified that he is in favour of a Palestinian state – not in response to terrorism, but rather after leaders take steps to end terrorism.

It's a myth that the root cause of terrorism is desperation and frustration, said Dershowitz. The root cause of terrorism is its success in the eyes of the terrorists, he said, reiterating the thesis of his new book, Why Terrorism Works (Yale University Press).

According to Dershowitz, Palestinian terrorism has been "a paradigm of moderate success. There is no Palestinian state, but everyone in the world knows about the Palestinian cause."

Although there is much poverty and desperation in the world, only a small number of people have been willing to resort to terrorism, he noted, adding that although such circumstances may add to the pool of potential terrorists, the phenomenon is "top-down" (that is, driven by leaders) rather than "bottom-up."

Europe and, to some extent, Canada have rewarded terrorism, he said.

Dershowitz criticized the Canadian government for "naively [believing] it can distinguish between money that will go to the good causes of Hezbollah and the bad ones…

"Listen to the statement of your own foreign minister," he exhorted, referring to Bill Graham's recent justifications of Canada's policy of allowing the Lebanese terror group Hezbollah's to raise funds here for its "innocent doctors, teachers and other people."

"Has he no knowledge of history? Does he not recall that the Nazi party had teachers, doctors, lawyers, and that they did, in fact, help to prevent inflation? Does he not remember that [Josef] Stalin provided some social relief to poverty?

"Your foreign minister is on the wrong side of history, the wrong side of morality and the wrong side of experience."

There is one area in which Canada's government has acted better than his own, said Dershowitz, referring to Graham's criticism of the new American law that requires Canadian citizens born in Iran, Iraq, Libya, Sudan or Syria to be photographed, fingerprinted and registered when they enter the United States.

Dershowitz says profiling is fine, but not on a racial, ethnic or national basis. He said better criteria would include a person's travel record, criminal record and statements in support of terrorism.

A visit to Germany

From the editor's desk

In the late summer of 1945, my parents found themselves in Germany. They were displaced persons, refugees without a home, stateless, part of the pitiful remnant of eastern European Jewry, the one-out-of-10 Jews of Poland who had survived the long horrible night of Adolph Hitler's National Socialism.

In an irony so cruel it bordered on the surreal, they and some 200,000 other displaced persons were sent, after the war, to live in the very country and among the very people who had convulsed Europe in a six-year miasma of murder and mayhem, who had engineered the most singularly evil and efficient killing machine ever devised in human history, who had caused the destruction of European Jewry and the slaughter of one third of the total number of Jews then on earth.

Some 57 years after my parents' temporary shelter in Germany and some 54 years after they built their permanent home in Canada, I was invited to visit the Germany that has evolved since then and, in particular, the Jewish community newly burgeoning there.

It was not an invitation I had anticipated; it was not an invitation I handled easily. Like many of my peers, I had never thought to visit Germany; nor, frankly, had I wanted to.

After considerable soul-searching, however, I set aside my qualms and accepted the invitation. There was simply too much Jewish history there.

At the end of October, I returned from a seven-day visit sponsored by the Goethe Institut, Inter Nationes and the Press and Information Office of the Federal Government of Germany.

Over the next few weeks, I shall record some of my observations from that visit.

Germany is one of the few Diaspora communities, along with Canada and Australia, that is actually growing in size. Of the approximately 200,000 displaced persons who wound up there after the war, some 15,000 remained, too infirm or too lacking in skills to be wanted by any other country, and unable, for whatever reason, to find their way after 1948, to the then-nascent Israel.

These 15,000 Jews were the nucleus of the community that eventually evolved. A decade after the end of the war, some 30,000 Jews lived in western Germany, a figure that remained more or less the same until the beginning of the 1990s. But by the end of the decade, with the collapse of the Iron Curtain and the dismantling of the Berlin Wall, more than 70,000 Jews had moved to Germany from the FSU.

In Berlin, to find out more about the "new" Jewish community of Germany, I met with Stephen Kramer, the managing director of the Zentralrat der Juden in Deutschland, the Central Council of the Jews in Germany.

The Zentralrat is "the head political, umbrella organization that lobbies government at the federal level on behalf of Jewish interests," Kramer explained.

Kramer is the chief civil servant of the Central Council, much younger than I had imagined he would be, a stout, energetic, mid-30s Jewish bureaucrat, whose spoken English was perfected in the United States.

His office is located in the Leo Baeck House near the famous synagogue on Oranienburgerstrasse. It is on the second floor of the meticulously-crafted, high-ceilinged, elegantly appointed old stone building. Like every other Jewish institution in Berlin, it is heavily guarded outside by the police and carefully protected inside by private security.

In Germany, Jews live in 90 Jewish communities throughout the 16 states of the federation.

Unlike anything we are used to in North America, Jews who wish to affiliate with their community must register with the state government, which then deducts a payroll tax for denominational purposes (Kultesteuer) and which is then remitted back by the state government to the synagogue or community centre with which the taxpayer is affiliated.

But this payroll tax yields far too little monies to accommodate the surging needs of Germany's overall Jewish community that has grown threefold in the last 10 years. Moreover, Kramer estimates, about 30,000 additional Jews living Germany are not registered with any local councils. This swells the demand for communal services without adding concomitant revenue to help pay for those services. One of Kramer's key tasks, therefore, is to find new sources of funds to help bridge that gaping revenue gap.

The young bureaucrat spoke quickly, in near-staccato cadence, pouring information into our discussion. When asked to identify the most pressing challenges facing Germany's Jews, Kramer chose three:

- The absorption and integration of Jewish immigrants from the FSU – amore than 10,000 are arriving each year – into the established Jewish and broader community of Germany.
- Waging the fight against xenophobia and anti-Semitism "which includes dealing with the change in generations among politicians and in their attitudes of looking upon historical events in Germany before 1945."
- Defining Jewish identity in Germany: enabling Jews to find a way back to their roots.

"The 90 communities in which Jews live are served by only 28 rabbis," Kramer said. "We are starting to lose our own roots. And this is wholly inadequate and quite problematic. Since we are Jews living here, not immediately planning to leave the country, somehow trying to build a future, what do we need and what do we want to do for our local Jewish institutions?"

That question was the key challenge on Kramer's agenda. It also steered my personal search throughout my seven-day visit.

Iraq not perceived as a serious threat to Israel

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Iraq probably does not possess the operational ability to launch conventional or non-conventional attacks against Israel, the former chief instructor of the Israeli army's Command and Staff College claims.

Holocaust Education Week

In an interview, Yaen Vered said that even if Iraq's missiles penetrate Israel's air space, they would not inflict great harm.

He also speculated that Iraq may attempt to strike Israel preemptively if it is convinced that an American invasion is in the offing.

A colonel in the reserves, Vered was brought to Toronto by Holocaust Education Week to deliver a lecture about the current situation in the Middle East.

His topic was Killing by Gas – The Threat to Israel.

Currently a senior Jewish National Fund official based in Tel Aviv, Vered said that Israel can theoretically block an Iraqi conventional assault.

"No problem. Iraqi mothers will cry," he declared, referring to the casualties Israel could impose on an Iraqi attacking force.

Vered, the JNF's representative in British Columbia from 1981 to 1985, said that Israel will not "stand aside" should Iraqi Scuds fall on Israel.

"We won't let the U.S. play with our lives."

During the 1991 Gulf War, Iraq fired 39 missiles at Israeli cities. Israel abided by a U.S. request to exercise restraint, and did not retaliate.

If the Israeli government is certain that an Iraqi attack is imminent, he said, Israel may try to knock out Iraq's missile bases in western Iraq.

In all certainty, he noted, the United States would itself attempt to neutralize these bases at the start of a military campaign designed to unseat Iraqi President Saddam Hussein and his Ba'athist government.

Yaen Vered

Israel's newly developed battery of Arrow missiles, which he described as "the best in the world," can likely shield the country from an Iraqi missile onslaught.

Still, Vered acknowledged, there is an element of uncertainty in the equation, and Iraq is capable of causing as much property damage today as it did in 1991.

In his view, the United States has no alternative but to oust the Iraqi regime. "Saddam Hussein should go. The whole region, including Israel, would benefit."

He has no idea when Washington will launch a war.

"Since the destruction of the temple, prophecy is given to fools."

Vered accused Iraq of terrorizing Israel by virtue of its backing of radical Palestinian groups such as Hamas and Islamic Jihad.

Turning to a related subject, Vered said that the main target of Islamic fundamentalists is the United States. "They want to erase everything Western."

But Israel is in their cross hairs, too.

Vered, who spoke to Chabad Lubavitch in Thornhill last week, said the current Palestinian uprising cannot be subdued militarily.

Ultimately, Israel and the Palestinians can only resolve their conflict politically.

"I don't see any other solution but a two-state solution," he said.

Asked to comment on the possibility that Hezbollah may open a front against Israel in the event of a war in Iraq, Vered said that it hinges on Syria's consent.

Mother of two sheds 20 pounds with hypnosis and says:

"Now I can look in the mirror and smile!"

My name is Nancy Greenberg. I own my own New York style deli. I have been married to my husband, Arnie, for seventeen years. I have two children, Hailey and Harrison (who is having his Bar Mitzvah soon!) I dropped 20 lbs. of fat in 6 weeks. My story is so remarkable. I would like to share it with you.

"I avoided going out and dressed in tent dresses"
Nancy Greenberg before shedding 20 lbs.

For an entire year, I avoided going out. I dreaded parties and wore tent dresses. I was suffering mentally. I couldn't get over having failed to control my eating.

Dieting Failures. I had tried all the fad diets. I ate only protein and counted points. I was simply too stressed out. My weight always came back. I was tired of counting calories and knowing how many ounces I was eating. I own a restaurant and it was painful to sit and watch everyone else eat all that mouthwatering food.

From Skepticism to Hope. I had read about Positive Changes Hypnosis in the newspaper. I stopped smoking with hypnosis so I knew that it worked. Still, I was skeptical. After reading all of the Positive Changes' success stories, I finally called for my free evaluation appointment.

As soon as I walked into Positive Changes, I could tell that it was a friendly and professional place. My evaluator was warm, informative and easygoing. There was no pressure whatsoever. I signed up and lost 20 lbs. in 6 short weeks. I lost four inches off my waist. My dress size plunged from a tight 14 to a sleek size 9.

"Customers say I have a new air about me"
Nancy Greenberg after Hypnosis

Immediate Results! Immediately after my first session my food preferences changed. My cravings were now for healthy foods. I didn't even know that I was changing my food intake. By the next day, I walked with a new spring in my step and a smile on my face. I lost 4 pounds my first week and 10 pounds my first month! I melted off over 20 pounds in total. I am happier and feel stronger thanks to Positive Changes Hypnosis.

Hypnosis Delivers Benefits! It's a delight just to walk into my Positive Changes centre. It's a totally stress-free environment. I look forward to my visits not only for my wonderful hypnosis sessions, but also for the calming, positive atmosphere that always greets me when I walk in.

Recommends. Everyone's noticed the change in me. At my restaurant, our customers are like family. They all say that I have a new air about me. I am constantly hearing how much younger I look. My husband is thrilled. My children see me enjoying fruit and vegetables. They are all amazed at the change in me!

Hypnosis has given me a calm determination for success. I can say "No" without feeling stress or guilt. I never feel deprived. I eat when I am hungry — not just when food is around. I am more productive and I cherish my leisure time more.

Call Today! I urge you to take the first step to a new you. Stop counting calories and fat grams and start counting on you! Hypnosis is stress free and the easiest way to an amazing new life. Don't carry around that unwanted weight or stress any longer. Call Positive Changes Hypnosis and ask for your free hypnosis evaluation. If you're like me, you'll be glad you did!

Businessman provides clothing for the homeless

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Coat manufacturer Paul Lindzon has made it his mission to help the homeless survive winter on Toronto's streets.

Lindzon, who is the chief executive officer of ITA Ltd., a manufacturer of shearling coats, and also the vice-president of Ve'ahavta: The Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee, is teaming up his company with Ve'ahavta to distribute ITA's sheepskin gloves to the homeless.

Lindzon says he believes he has a responsibility to "give back to the community both personally and corporately – to give back money, time and product."

A fashion fundraiser on Wednesday, Nov. 20, at the York Event Theatre, called Starry Knights, will raise money for Ve'ahavta's new daytime van program, part of the organization's Mobile Jewish Response to the Homeless.

Organizers hope the first annual kosher dinner, fashion show and silent auction will raise $100,000.

Ve'ahavta, which in Hebrew means "and you shall love," is a registered non-profit organization established in 1996. Its Mobile Jewish Response works in partnership with Na-Me-Res' (Native Men's Residence) Street Help Outreach Program to finance and staff a van that travels the city's streets two nights a week to provide the homeless with warm clothing, personal hygiene products and food.

Lindzon got involved with Ve'ahavta after he went with his 13-year-old son, Jared, on one of the Street Help vans.

Paul Lindzon

"My son and I were both very impressed with the work the volunteers were doing," says Lindzon.

Initially, volunteers for Ve'ahavta went out in the Street Help vans one night a week. (The Street Help Outreach Program has been in existence since 1995.) Today, Ve'ahavta's Mobile Jewish Response has expanded and now has its own van that goes out during the daytime three days a week.

Lindzon says Ve'ahavta is the first Canadian Jewish organization to go directly to the front lines to deliver these essentials right on the street. Last year, the Mobile Jewish Response's staff moved more than 400 homeless from the street, into "self-sufficiency" and "a better way of life," he says.

"This work gives me a feeling of fulfilment," says Lindzon. "You can't help the homeless solve their problems, but you can help them make it a little easier."

After he got his family and staff involved with Ve'ahavta, Lindzon turned to the fashion industry to raise money for, and awareness of, the organization.

Two years ago, he started the Shear Warmth project as part of ITA, asking other members of the fashion industry to donate coats, blankets, sleeping bags, mittens, socks and personal hygiene products to the homeless.

The Starry Knights fashion show, hosted by Susan Hay of Global Television's Heart of the City, will include clothes by 10 designers.

To reserve or volunteer for Starry Knights, call 1-800-265-4363 or visit www.shearwarmth.com. For more information on Ve'ahavta, visit www.veahavta.org.

Dershowitz favours national identity cards

It is "incredibly important" for Canada and the United States to work together because of their large border, he said at a press conference preceding the event.

The Sept. 11 attacks changed Dershowitz's thinking on the use of national identity cards. He said he is now in favour of them. "That does not violate a right of privacy. It might compromise a right of anonymity, [but] I'm prepared to compromise with that liberty."

The use of such cards would also make racial profiling "less necessary," he said. "So I think that actually helps civil liberties."

War crimes program update: more of the same

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Citizenship and Immigration Canada (CIC) has released its fifth annual report on Canada's war crimes program, but there is very little in it to distinguish the government's efforts against Nazi-era war criminals from those of the year before.

The Department of Justice's war crimes unit launched one additional case in 2001-2002 when it began citizenship revocation and extradition proceedings against Vancouver resident Michael Seifert. In November 2000, Seifert was found guilty by an Italian military tribunal of war crimes, including murder and torture, committed while he was a guard at a German police transit camp in northern Italy.

Other than the Seifert case, no new alleged war criminals were brought before the courts.

"The stuff is moving at a glacial pace," said Jack Silverstone, executive vice-president and legal counsel for Canadian Jewish Congress. "The legal processes are continuing; it's a very protracted process."

The report, which is available on the Internet at www.cic.gc.ca/english/pub/war2002/index.html, repeats the longstanding federal government position that "the policy of the Canadian government is unequivocal that Canada is not and will not become a safe haven for persons who have committed war crimes, crimes against humanity or other reprehensible acts regardless of when or where they were committed."

The report states 18 World War II-era cases have been launched since 1995, of which 11 have been concluded and seven remain in the litigation phase. The report also addresses concerns about the relevance of the war crimes program.

In recent months, federal spokespeople have denied reports that lawmakers were considering eliminating the Nazi-era program. The report states that "despite the increasing difficulty in pursuing World War II cases, there is no strong rationale at this point in time for either eliminating or formally reducing the priority of the WW II component of the program. As activity levels decrease, resources can be transferred to the ongoing modern investigations."

The report notes that Canada has ratified the International Criminal Court (ICC) Statute and was the first country to introduce legislation (the Crimes Against Humanity and War Crimes Act) to incorporate the treaty's provisions into domestic law.

Of the 18 Nazi-era cases, the report states, "eight had successful outcomes for the program in terms of either a successful decision at the Federal Court of Canada or a decision by the defendants not to contest the proceedings." Six defendants died during the proceedings and three cases are at various stages of the revocation process.

Silverstone said he was concerned by the paucity of new cases and the slow pace at which ongoing cases are proceeding. "We are constantly in touch with the ministers. We intend to meet with the ministers responsible [Justice and CIC] to make sure they have a full appreciation of this dossier."

Terry Beitner, director of the War Crimes Unit, said the unit "has work that is ongoing. There are matters pending and outstanding, but there were no new cases."

Beitner acknowledged that several years ago, "and especially after we had secured funding, we had set out an objective of commencing 14 cases… We commenced several, but not 14 as was originally anticipated."

Beitner said that once the files were examined more closely, only a few appeared to present "a reasonable prospect of winning the case." Recent proposals by the minister of immigration and citizenship to streamline denaturalization procedures by taking them out of the hands of cabinet and making them a purely judicial procedure could "save some time," he continued. "It certainly opens up the process and it would become more transparent."

While it would be difficult to predict how much time would be saved, "ballpark, I'm confident to say you could save a year or more," he said.

Indefensible policy

"It was not by cheer [sic] coincidence that Hezbollah turned into a struggle movement against the "Israeli" occupation. Because Hezbollah's ideological ideals sees [sic] no legitimacy for the existence of 'Israel,' a matter that elevates the contradictions to the level of existence. And the conflict becomes one of legitimacy that is based on religious ideals. The seed of resistance is also deep in the ideological beliefs of Hezbollah, a belief that found its way for expression against the Zionist occupation of Lebanon. And that is why we also find the slogan of the liberation of Jerusalem rooted deeply in the ideals of Hezbollah."

The preceding words appear on the English-language home page of the Hezbollah Web site. In the singularly tunnelled mindset that twists religion and hatred into violent liberation theology, they are both a declaration of faith and a declaration of war. Both are aimed at the Jewish state.

"Hezbollah's ideological ideals sees no legitimacy for the existence of 'Israel.'" Could any statement be more definitive? "The liberation of Jerusalem [is] rooted deeply in the ideals of Hezbollah." Could the aim of this "ideological, social, political and economical mixture" (also extracted from the Web site, but note there is no express inclusion of military into the "mixture") be more explicitly expressed? Is it not clear beyond any shred of a doubt that the aims and goals of the Hezbollah movement are to destroy Israel?

Yet, despite the overwhelming clarity of Hezbollah's own spokespeople and despite the fact that the Hezbollah itself does not bifurcate its movement into military and humanitarian arms, the Canadian government somehow finds it reasonable to do so for the purpose of allowing Canadian taxpayers to support the sending of domestically raised funds to the "humanitarian" arm of Hezbollah.

"We don't believe," said Foreign Minister Bill Graham last week, "it would be appropriate to label as terrorists innocent doctors, teachers and other people who are seeking to do charitable and other good works in their communities."

The minister's rationale is spurious. He draws a distinction without a difference in the face of the horrible truths about Hezbollah that mock him and the Canadian government.

Among those truths is the worrisome fact that Hezbollah has deployed more than 8,000 missiles – paid for by Iran and transported through Syria – along the southern Lebanese border with Israel. They are aimed at Israel's heartland. No doubt the missiles are a boost to the morale of some of those "doctors, teachers and other people who are seeking to do charitable and other good works" for Hezbollah. But should Canada help underwrite this deadly morale booster?

The government's policy is indefensible. It defies logic. And it evokes feelings of shame when one contrasts its permissive approach towards Hezbollah's so-called "humanitarian" arm with its punitive treatment of Canadian Friends of Magen David Adom, towards whom, remarkably, it shows no relenting in the campaign to strip the organization of its charitable status.

Students passionate about Israel

In an article in The CJN's Oct. 24 issue, "Defending Israel: Where are the Other Jewish Students?" York University student and Jewish Student Federation board member Miriam Levin poses two fundamental questions: How do we engage students and how can we foster greater Jewish involvement on campus? We sympathize with Levin's undoubtedly difficult experience and we commend her for her unwavering passion for Israel advocacy. But we cannot in sound judgment agree that her particular experience is reflective of that of the general Jewish student population at York. Now more than ever, Jewish students are passionate and enthused, active and vocal. They are making noise and ensuring Israel's voice is heard on campus.

Through the end of last year and throughout the summer, our student leadership worked to develop a plan for Israel advocacy on campus. It was decided that we must change from a reactive approach to a proactive one. This year, we stopped focusing on responding to anti-Israel rhetoric propagated by the small pro-Palestinian minority and began our own pro-Israel discourse aimed at the uninformed campus majority.

While we carefully monitor the activities of our detractors, attend their programs, read their pamphlets and challenge their every move, we have introduced new ideas to the campus. Israel for Peace, Israel is a Multicultural Society, Zionism is Jewish Nationalism, Israel is a Democracy and We Have Pride in Israel are the names of just a few of our campaigns. Each of these asserts a pro-Israel position to the widespread campus community, and is truly representative of the views and goals of York's Jewish Student Federation.

Corrects record

In your Sept: 5 issue of The CJN, in an article titled "Sisters working for the cause: Eat to the Beat," you refer to "Willow" as the only known facility in Toronto to offer non-medical, peer support to breast cancer patients.

But as a board member of the Bayview Support Network, which is affiliated with the Toronto Sunnybrook Regional Cancer Centre, I am writing to inform you that the Bayview Support Network has, for 10 years, offered a variety of non-medical support services to cancer patients and their caregivers. These services include, among others, peer support, both individual and group; patient orientation; in-patient visitation; a patient library; a supervised playroom for the children of patients; and a quarterly newsletter. All are staffed by volunteers who are either cancer survivors or caregivers.

Let's fight Canadian MDA ruling

Many years ago, following countless contributions to the Red Cross, I wrote them a letter stating that until they recognize the Magen David Adom (MDA) in Israel, as they do the Arab Red Crescent, I shall give my donation entirely to MDA.

I am a firm believer in the fact that while individually we cannot make a difference, collectively we can have enormous power. I suggest we start a campaign of letter writing to our government representatives and bombard Prime Minister Jean Chrétien with petitions on the injustice of the Federal Court of Appeal's recent decision in favour of the Canada Customs and Revenue Agency's (CCRA) attempt to disallow tax receipts for donations to Canadian Magen David Adom. The CCRA cannot be permitted to revoke the charitable status of this vital humanitarian organization, particularly in view of the current devastating suicide bombings. Such an act would be blatant government anti-Semitism and should not be permitted in our democratic country.

In the meantime, we should all donate wholeheartedly to Canadian Magen David Adom. Our contributions today are, tragically, more essential than ever.

Objects to TV show

On the front page of the Sept. 26 issue of The CJN, an article about film executive Peter Sussman reports that he is producing a million-dollar television movie about Adolf Hitler and how he managed to fool the world into believing him ("Film exec defends Hitler mini-series," CJN, Sept. 26).

It seems that Sussman, a man born into a Conservative Jewish family, knows very little about who Hitler was. I have mourned all my life for my parents and for other family victims because of Hitler's bright idea to profit from the ashes of millions of Jews. Holocaust survivors will certainly take the movie as a terrible insult.

Sussman is sure his viewers will understand that Hitler and the Germans did not lose the war, as Hitler, a soldier during World War I, repeated ad nauseam, but were stabbed in the back by the Communists, the Jews, the Lenins and the Stalins. This propaganda appealed to German industrialists, who saw in Hitler the man who would save them and bring Germany to its feet. The future Fuhrer was caught in the putsch against the government and was sentenced to jail with his early supporters such as Rudolf Hess, who helped him to write the Nazi bible Mein Kampf.

Does Sussman know what this movie or other garbage about Hitler will do to help the neo-Nazis and anti-Semites?

There is no need for anyone to make a film about Hitler, particularly a Jew. The ancient Hebrews knew how to deal with the "Hamans" in their ages. Let Hitler burn for eternities in deepest hell and not be remembered as a vengeful soldier. There are enough Nazis who never forgot Hitler and will certainly appreciate this project.

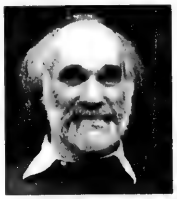
Jewish and on the left: a tricky place to be

By ERNIE LIGHTMAN

It's hard to be a Jewish lefty these days.

For those on today's left, political correctness demands absolute condemnation of Israel. Also in vogue is the questioning of the state's fundamental legitimacy. And a modest dose of old-fashioned anti-Semitism isn't out of place, either. To be a Jew who supports the state, even while criticizing many of its policies, brings immediate marginalization and loss of credentials as a bona fide lefty.



Ernie Lightman

Life, of course, is more complicated, but the lines are drawn in the sand, and you can be either a good lefty or a good Jew – but not both.

It wasn't always this way for me: Throughout my adult life I have fought the good fight for approved progressive causes, with a disproportionate share of those around me always seeming to be Jewish. In my youth, we marched against racial segregation in the American south; as a graduate student at Berkeley in the late '60s and '70s, I opposed the racist war in Vietnam; more recently, we got gassed at the World Trade Organization's summit in Quebec City in April 2001 and opposed the horrific Harris-Eves government since the day it was elected.

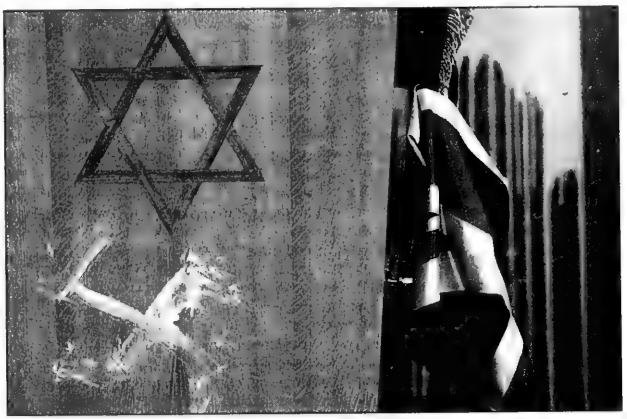
Demonstrators protest against Israel earlier this year at the U.N. Conference on Sustainable Development in Johannesburg, South Africa. [RNS/Reuters photos]

Throughout that same time, I have been a Zionist: I travel to Israel as often as I can, I absolutely support the state, though not always the actions of its duly elected governments, and I endorse a two-state solution. I've never in the past experienced any incompatibility between these perspectives.

Recently, however, others have found a problem. The upsurge in anti-Semitism that people across the spectrum of the Jewish community have noticed, and experienced, creates a particular conflict for those of us on the left, as it is our erstwhile allies and comrades who now disown us for our views on Israel. The sense of alienation and isolation that many Jewish lefties now feel from our former friends and associates have made us deeply discouraged and pessimistic, both about Israel and even more about the left itself.

Many on the left believe this "new" anti-Semitism is directly attributable to the policies of the Sharon government and the occupation of the West Bank and Gaza Strip, and that the end of both will bring peace in our time. But I don't buy this: though I fervently dream of Israel after Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and after the occupation of the West Bank and Gaza Strip, I don't believe the "new" anti-Semitism is really new at all. It's old – very old, indeed. After 1945, anti-Semitism was dormant for a time, but the occupation of the West Bank and Gaza Strip has now made it socially acceptable once again, bringing all kinds of ancient anti-Jewish hatreds out of the woodwork.

The left has a need to look at the world in dichotomies: good guys, bad guys; underdog, oppressor. In general, I have no difficulty with such an approach, because I see the world in class terms, and in many cases, the issues are clear. But in the Middle East, the left has got it backwards. Israel is labelled the oppressor because it has had the temerity to survive – and to actually win some of its wars. While the Palestinians are clearly among the oppressed, their co-religionists across the Arab world are not. Wars create refugees, sad but true: If they are lucky, refugees will be compensated and resettled (as former prime minister Ehud Barak proposed at the failed Camp David talks). Nowhere else in the world do refugees claim a right of return half a century after their original displacement. Israel, assisted by world Jewry, absorbed and integrated those Jewish refugees who fled from Arab lands in the years after 1948. The Arab states, with their virtually infinite wealth, have shown no responsibility to the Palestinian refugees created by the same 1948 conflict; instead, they have kept them in refugee camps, a potent political symbol to divert attention away from their own domestically repressive regimes.



The defacement of this synagogue in London earlier this year contributed to a sense of palpably growing anti-Semitism in Europe in the wake of widespread anti-Israel sentiment as a result of the Jewish state's unresolved conflict with the Palestinians.

What is perhaps most troubling about the mindless anti-Israel sentiment on the left is its selectivity and its regular use of double standards, whereby Israel is condemned as an apartheid state, while far worse happens elsewhere without a peep. Israel is the only functioning democracy in the Middle East, the only society where women and minorities have legal rights, the only country where children receive widespread education and the only country with a viable, independent court system that on occasion actually produces important and progressive decisions. These rights and institutions aren't perfect, of course – far from it – but they are light years ahead of what transpires elsewhere in the neighbourhood.

If we want to criticize Israel's actions in the territories – and such a stance is certainly fair game – then let's show a minimum of consistency and integrity and also condemn some of the many repressive regimes elsewhere in the world. (Let's also remember who offered peace, and who sank the talks at Camp David). How about the genocide in Rwanda or the military despots in central and south America? Why not oppose the black slavery still openly practiced in the oil sheikhdoms or the treatment of women in those places? Or the treatment of our aboriginal peoples right here in Canada – or Toronto? Why the incredible silence over the wanton slaughter of kids attending a discotheque in Tel Aviv or buying pizza in Jerusalem? Or the failure to challenge anti-Semitism as a particularly virulent form of racism?

When it comes right down to it, few countries have their hands totally clean. It is the moral duty of the left to criticize these atrocities, but by focusing on Israel as if it were the only – or the worst – offender, the left serves only to discredit itself.

And what is a Jewish lefty to do when others on the left insist on their unthinking and mindless criticism of Israel – and the Jews? To some of us, our credentials as good, solid leftists are so intertwined with our essential being that we cannot contemplate breaking the official line; hence, we sit in agonized silence. For my part, however, I think those on the mainstream left have lost it – through their ignorant attitudes and behaviours towards Israel, their double standards and tolerance of anti-Semitism, they've lost their sense of direction, even their traditional ability to identify who is the real underdog.

'Most troubling on the left is... its double standards and tolerance of anti-Semitism'

If my words lead to expulsion from the left, so be it. For I know, deeply and intensely, that rather than those who kick in windows at Concordia University or attempt to embrace Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat as if he were some paragon of virtue, it is I – we – who hold true to the faith on the left. It is we, not they, who remain among the real progressives today.

What moves the sniper?

By the time you read this column, the tale of the sniper who terrorized Washington, D.C., and its suburbs will already be a part of history – a bad memory, but one consigned to the past.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

All along during those terrible days of anxiety and public fear, I found myself in the District of Columbia.

After a number of agonizing weeks, a pair of suspects were apprehended.

The alleged shooter, John Allen Muhammad, 41, and his young associate John Lee Malvo, 17, face state and federal counts in the shootings in Maryland, Virginia and Washington, D.C., that left 10 people dead.

The pair are also suspected in earlier killings in Louisiana, Alabama and Washington state. In the latter, they are also suspects in a shooting last May at a synagogue – Temple Beth El in Tacoma – that reportedly caused minimal damage (no one was in the building at the time).

I wonder what kind of a human being Muhammad is. He has probably dreamt all his life of possessing some power, rather than be the object of the whims of others. For once, he wanted to be in charge.

In a sense, his activity probably represented a form of revenge: he was paying back others with what he felt they deserved because of what he has experienced in his, from all accounts, meagre existence.

Every one of us responds in his or her own way to the challenges of life and, hopefully, we keep our response within the bonds of humanity.

But, as with everything else in life, there will be actions that are exceptions to the norm, and when these occur, they can be devastating.

Whatever the future brings, may it leave us room to act intelligently, aware of not only our needs and hopes, but also those of others.

None of us is the centre of the universe and our lives depend on those around us. We have to live with others, even as we have the need to live our own lives.

But it is this interaction with others that makes it all worthwhile, and it is in this interaction with others that each one of us wishes to be remembered.

On another subject, my 90th birthday was remembered by so many of you with kindness and generosity, and I have no other way to respond than to tell you, through this medium, of my profound gratitude.

Aging comes all by itself, but friendship does not.

Thank you again to all of you who have helped me to celebrate my special anniversary.

I shall always remember your generosity, which has so enriched my life.

Are gas masks part of life?

Given the implications, it should be unthinkable. It isn't. It should have felt a bit spooky. It didn't. It should have been deeply disturbing. It wasn't.

Truth be told, when my wife and I went to the army's local Home Front Command (HFC) centre the other day to get updated gas mask kits for our family, it was strangely banal. After all, we had been through this before.

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

Lately, with the prospect of a new U.S. war against Iraq being ever more real, Israel is preparing for a possible Iraqi counterattack. As part of this effort, the government is encouraging people to get new civil defence gear (read: gas masks).

To that end, the HFC has opened special distribution centres and has launched a series of ads with the sobering slogan: "Gas mask kits – They're part of life."

The army now has 32 HFC centres around the country, including three in Jerusalem. The one nearest our home is in the large Malha Shopping Center in the south of the capital. At the mall, the HFC centre is virtually invisible. No signs point the way and only by asking did we find it, relegated to a dusty corner in the mall's huge, dimly lit parking garage.

It's an austere, makeshift operation run by a dozen male and female soldiers. While we stood in line, my mind flashed to a scene exactly 12 years earlier. In October 1990, on my first full day in Israel after immigrating from France, my wife and I lined up at a Jerusalem community centre that was then also serving as an HFC station.

It was just before the Gulf War and Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein had already invaded Kuwait and threatened to "incinerate" Israel with long-range missiles and unconventional weapons. So as not to take chances, Jerusalem was equipping the entire population – including newly arrived immigrants – with gas mask kits. I took the whole thing as my initiation into Israeli citizenship and the hard-boiled reality of life in the Middle East.

During the Gulf War, Saddam made good on part of his threat when he fired 39 Scud missiles at Israel. Fortunately, none contained his feared chemical or biological weapons.

Today, despite a sense of déjà vu, there seems less public angst than before the Gulf War. Citing its newly deployed Arrow anti-ballistic missile system and Iraq's depleted arsenal, the army claims Israel is in much better shape than it was in 1991 vis-à-vis Baghdad.

That's not to suggest that Israelis are complacent. The army is asking people to pick up new gas masks; the Health Ministry wants to vaccinate the population against a smallpox attack; the Education Ministry recently staged emergency drills in schools; and municipalities are fixing up public bomb shelters and preparing contingency plans for mass evacuation, just in case.

No doubt people in Tel Aviv and Ramat Gan, which bore the brunt of Iraqi missile attacks in 1991, have more reason for concern than Jerusalemites. Many feel Saddam wouldn't dare fire missiles (with or without non-conventional warheads) at Jerusalem for fear he might score a direct hit on the Temple Mount, Islam's third holiest site, or inadvertently strike nearby Arab neighbourhoods. But the actions of a desperate dictator are hard to predict.

Our visit to the HFC centre proved surprisingly swift, clinical and free of charge. In less than 10 minutes, we exchanged our aging gas masks for the 2002 models, which included a special drinking straw and syringes with antidotes for nerve gas attacks.

I'd like to believe that the millions of new gas mask kits now in Israeli homes will never be needed. I'd like to believe that one day they will be mere artifacts from another era, like telex machines. I just wouldn't bank on it.

Far more likely, given the murderous ambitions of Israel's enemies, I'll be back at the local HFC centre in a few years trading in my 2002 gas mask for an improved model.

Maybe there really was something to that HFC slogan after all.

Physicians for human rights - or anti-Semitism?

The flood of anti-Israel propaganda released in the past two years has begun to subside, and while progress is slow, some people are rethinking their positions in the face of brutal bus bombings and murderous attacks.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

The massive letter-writing campaigns and boycotts against virulent Israel-bashers in the media and non-governmental organizations (NGOs) are having an impact. Major newspapers have removed non-professional journalists whose support for Palestinian terrorism was their main calling-card.

The Economist, often described as the most prestigious news publication in the world, published a detailed article rejecting the canard of "double standards" regarding United Nations actions on Israel. Human Rights Watch, which joined in publicizing the "Jenin massacre" that never happened, has attempted to atone by recently issuing a (belated and limited) condemnation of Palestinian suicide bombing.

However, there is still a long way to go to defeat the disinformation campaigns at the core of the movement to demonize Israel.

A new example was produced and distributed recently by an NGO known as Physicians for Human Rights (PHR). In an eight-page cartoon pamphlet that can only be described as anti-Semitic, this organization displayed caricatures of heavily-armed Israeli soldiers "oppressing" innocent-looking Palestinians.

In one cartoon, two Israeli soldiers at a checkpoint are portrayed as mocking a pregnant Palestinian woman. The ambulances used to carry suicide bombers and explosives are conveniently erased in this crude propaganda, and inhuman Palestinian terrorism is not even mentioned. The pamphlet, distributed in Hebrew in an effort to propagandize Israelis through emotional manipulation, is a disgrace. (The English version can be viewed on the Internet at: http://www.phr.org.il/Phr/Pages/PhrArticle_Unit.asp?Cat=10&art=478)

While the Israeli branch of this organization is relatively small and of little importance, these marginal activities receive attention as a result of the advertising money that they collect and spend. Fifteen (!) sponsors are listed as having provided funds to produce, print, and distribute this crude propaganda. Among them are governments, led by the European Commission, Switzerland, and the embassy of Finland in Tel Aviv.

In addition to the dubious practice of using taxpayer's money for propagandizing against the policies of a democratically elected government, these governments have already been criticized for providing billions of dollars in aid – no strings attached – to the Palestinian Authority and its president, Yasser Arafat. Some of these funds (as in the case of the Karine-A arms ship) were used to purchase weapons, ammunition and explosives in order to murder Israelis, and other money disappeared into the bank accounts of corrupt officials.

Undaunted, these governments (as well as the Ford Foundation, which some people consider to be practically a government in itself) are also actively supporting the demonization campaign against Israel and the Jewish people.

While many of the sponsors are NGOs with the usual anti-Israel and "Palestinians-as-victims" agenda, others are clearly Jewish and linked to Israel. This group includes the well-known New Israel Fund and the Naomi and Nehemia Cohen Foundation, as well as a group of radical and highly vocal anti-Israel Jews in the Netherlands known as SIVMO.

Such Jewish sponsorship has long provided cover and legitimacy for anti-Semitic propaganda that is thinly disguised as "criticism of Israeli atrocities." At least three of the other sponsors of the PHR pamphlet are Christian and church organizations, including the Global Ministries of the Uniting Churches, a group known as Diakonia (both based in the Netherlands), and a Protestant organization called EPER.

To avoid criticism that they are perpetuating European Christian anti-Semitism, even after the Holocaust, these groups can conveniently point to PHR's links with Jewish groups involved in this outrage.

Diakonia's Web site proclaims its devotion "to the service of reconciliation in the world with the word of faith and the action of love." This love apparently does not extend to the citizens of the Jewish state and does not prevent anti-Semitism.

In order to fight back against this campaign, each of its sponsors must be challenged. For more than 10 years, Israelis and Jews were silent while the Palestinians built up their propaganda machine, and the results are tragically self-evident. It will take us at least as long to undo the damage.

The Kirshner File

Van Pelt delves into the Holocaust

Would it surprise you to learn that anti-Semitism is an insufficient explanation for the Holocaust? Robert Jan van Pelt, a historian and co-author of the recently published Holocaust: A History (Penguin Books), is a proponent of this theory.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Hungary, a nation once ruled by a pro-German, anti-Semitic government, proves his point. As van Pelt writes in his latest book – which Penguin is promoting as "a groundbreaking work" and "the definitive history of one of the greatest crimes human beings ever committed" – Hungary was somewhat of a haven for Jews until Germany's invasion in 1944.

Admiral Miklos Horthy, Hungary's ruler since the early 1920s, was a committed anti-Semite who backed anti-Jewish legislation enacted by various Hungarian governments. Yet Horthy, van Pelt explains in an interview, was a traditionalist with a strong code of honour. Although he opposed the disproportionate role of Jews in the economy, he abhorred the kind of genocidal anti-Semitism practised by Germany in occupied Europe.

Consequently, he stood firm against German demands to deport Jews to death camps in Poland. Indeed, Hungarian Jews were relatively safe until the spring of 1944, when Germany occupied Hungary and proceeded to deport them to Auschwitz and other industrialized killing centres.

As van Pelt, a professor of cultural history at the University of Waterloo, puts it: "It is clear that without anti-Semitism, there would have been no Holocaust, but the Horthy case shows that anti-Semitism is not sufficient as an explanation."

Van Pelt and his co-author, Deborah Dwork, the founding director of the Strassler Family Center for Holocaust and Genocide Studies at Clark University, claim that the historical antecedent of the Holocaust was the "revolutionary utopianism" of the Catholic Inquisition in Spain and Portugal and the Reign of Terror in France.

"We consider the Holocaust as a literally revolutionary act, a violent deed undertaken by the Nazis in the hope of creating a better society, an Aryan utopia," van Pelt says. "In general, until the mid-18th century, European society honoured customs and traditions, which means that it accepted the existing situation as legitimate and necessary. And as the existence of the Jews was a given, their place in society was a priori accepted."

The onset of modernity, he notes, shattered the status quo. Revolutionary upheaval became acceptable to create a better tomorrow, even if it meant the elimination of Jews.

As a historian of the Holocaust, Van Pelt is a "functionalist" rather than an "intentionalist." He and Dwork do not believe that Adolf Hitler set out with a predetermined plan to exterminate all Jews. "Initially, he simply wanted to get rid of German Jews through emigration," van Pelt says.

But this policy was rendered obsolete by two converging factors – Germany's swift conquest of European neighbours and, with it, the placement of millions of Jews under its military administration.

"After considering the option to send these Jews to some faraway territory, such as Madagascar and the Russian Arctic, the Nazis finally concluded that murder was the only viable option."

He maintains that the entry of the United States into World War II, following Japan's bombing of Pearl Harbour on Dec. 7, 1941, hastened Hitler's decision to opt for draconian measures against Jews.

"The Germans were happily massacring Jews on the eastern front after attacking the Soviet Union in June 1941, but they had not yet decided to murder all European Jews, including those in western Europe."

Van Pelt holds that Germany's strategy hinged on using western European Jews as hostages to keep the United States out of the war.

"This assumption was based, of course, on the anti-Semitic fantasy that Jews controlled American politics and public opinion, and that these Jews would not want to jeopardize West European Jewry by declaring war on Germany. Once Hitler declared war on the U.S., the Jews of western Europe lost their value as hostages, and now could be included in the genocide already taking place in eastern Europe."

They argue that many Catholics tried to help Jews in Poland, which was home to more than three million Jews. Out of 19,141 European Righteous Gentiles who risked their lives to assist Jews, Yad Vashem recognizes 5,632 Polish citizens as Righteous Gentiles. "Poles thus comprise more than one quarter of the total number of gentiles so recognized."

In fact, a great many more Poles were actually involved in rescuing Jews. "For every Righteous Gentile, there are many who were never recognized as Righteous Gentiles, but who showed decency, charity and courage."

In Van Pelt and Dwork's view, the rescuers broke nearly all the Ten Commandments. Citing an example, van Pelt refers to a Dutch rescuer who not only stole and lied, but even killed, to save Jews. "To be a rescuer meant that one had to become an outlaw and flout the laws imposed by the Germans and the customary ways of civilized behaviour."

The authors claim that the Allies' determination to eradicate Nazism forestalled attempts to negotiate the rescue of Jews under German occupation.

As van Pelt puts it: "Any such rescue could only be undertaken on the basis of negotiations. The fact that the Allies had a principled policy of non-negotiation with the Nazis made such talks impossible. SS chief Heinrich Himmler, the very man who was in charge of the murder of Jews, sought negotiations with the Allies in 1944. He offered them one million Jews in exchange for war materiel to be used against the Soviet Union. The Allies did not even consider this offer, as it would have harmed their alliance with the Soviets."

Robert Jan van Pelt

Van Pelt and Dwork decided to write their book after concluding that there was an urgent need for a good, one-volume account about the Holocaust that would meet the needs of two types of readers: the generally educated and genuinely interested person who knows little about the Holocaust's causes and consequences but who wants to learn about it, and the high school or university student who can read it as a required text.

Van Pelt is respectful of previous studies, such as Raul Hilberg's The Destruction of European Jews and Yehuda Bauer's A Short History of the Holocaust. But the emphasis in Hilberg's book is on the German bureaucracy of destruction, while Bauer's work, he says, appears to be out of print. He dismisses Lucy Dawidowicz's The War Against the Jews as "inaccurate" and "dated" and Leni Yahil's The Holocaust as "turgid" and "useless."

"We concluded that the absence of a concise, cutting-edge and multifaceted history of the Holocaust had become a significant problem in college and high school education, especially as the subject has gained recognition as an essential part of college course offerings and school curriculum," he explains. "We hope to fill that gap."

Born in the Dutch city of Haarlem in 1955, van Pelt is a graduate of the University of Leiden. He wrote his PhD thesis on the Temple of Solomon. He moved to Canada in 1987 to take up his present position at the University of Waterloo.

He began writing about the Holocaust in the mid-1980s, when the focus of his academic interests shifted from art history and classical archeology to the crematoria of Auschwitz. Since then, he has written Auschwitz: 1270 to the Present, co-authored with Dwork; and The Case for Auschwitz: Evidence from the Irving Trial.

When David Irving, a British Holocaust revisionist, launched a civil suit against American historian Deborah Lipstadt, van Pelt was a member of her defence team. He was also a consultant in Errol Morris' documentary, Mr. Death: The Rise and Fall of Fred A. Leuchter Jr., a film about an American Holocaust denier.

Asked about such propagandists, van Pelt replies: "I don't think Holocaust denial poses much of a danger, excerpt in the Middle East, where it is very prevalent as a way to delegitimize Israel."

Van Pelt's mother, who is Jewish, survived the war in Holland on false identity papers. His father, a physician, went into hiding after facing the prospect of being a forced labourer in Germany. "My great-grandfather was not so lucky. He died in hiding because of a lack of medical attention." Van Pelt's uncle, after whom he is named, died in Auschwitz.

Van Pelt claims that North Americans have a rather "sentimental" view of Holland's attitude toward Jews during the Holocaust.

"It is true that there was very little anti-Semitism before the war, and that German propaganda had relatively little impact on the Dutch," he says. "But most Dutch people were so absorbed with their own struggle to preserve a semblance of normality that they did not care too much about what happened to the Jews."

"Absolutely!" says Bet Hayeled Vice Principal Surie Nagel. Each activity our children do is part of a curriculum. For the children it is a fun painting session mixing paints to create new colours. For us, it is a science experiment about the colour spectrum. For the children, it is the excitement of turning a flashlight on and off, beeping an electronic toy, and using a fan. For us, it is a unit on electricity, learning that a flashlight produces light, a toy produces sound, or a fan produces action. The conclusion we all agree on is that science is fun!

Eichmann captor recounts cloak-and-dagger tale

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

The man who nabbed Adolf Eichmann on a dingy Buenos Aires street 42 years ago, says he dedicates his feat to survivors of the Holocaust.

Holocaust Education Week

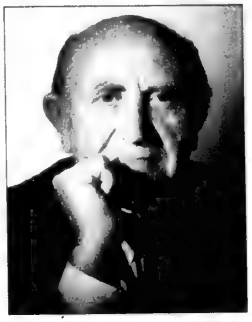
"I dedicate my capture of Eichmann to the survivors," Peter Malkin told a synagogue audience earlier this month. "For me, they are the heroes of the heroes."

Malkin, now 73, delighted a packed hall at Shaar Shalom Synagogue in Thornhill with his tales of espionage and derring-do, punctuated with light-hearted anecdotes.

But the audacious 1960 capture of Eichmann by elite Mossad agents in the broad daylight of Argentina's capital was deadly serious business, one that required careful planning.

Israel wanted Eichmann, considered the biggest Nazi who escaped Europe following World War II, even before statehood, Malkin said in a program that was part of Holocaust Education Week.

The notorious Eichmann had been head of the Department for Jewish Affairs in the Gestapo from 1941 to 1945 and was chief of operations in the deportation of three million Jews to extermination camps. He also played a key role in the 1942 Wannsee Conference, which laid out plans to deal with the "final solution to the Jewish question."



Peter Malkin

Historians regard him as an architect of the murder of six million Jews. Eichmann always maintained he was merely following orders.

Israel had long suspected he escaped to South America after the war, like many top Nazis, but could never pinpoint his whereabouts.

At the end of the war, Eichmann was arrested and confined to an American internment camp, but escaped. According to Malkin, the Americans let him go, unaware of who he was.

In any event, Malkin recounted, in 1958, the Mossad dispatched an agent to a rundown quarter of Buenos Aires called San Fernando to track a man known as Ricardo Klement. That was followed by a photographer, who secretly snapped pictures of Klement from every angle. Israel was satisfied Klement was Eichmann, and assembled an elite squad of seven Mossad agents, including Malkin, an expert in disguises and explosives and who held a black belt in karate.

The Mossad also committed 10 safe houses, eight or nine cars, a full-time doctor and cook, and a suitcase filled with $1 million in cash.

"We didn't know how long we would have to hold him," Malkin recalled. "We didn't know how long we would have to stay in Argentina."

After studying Klement's routine of coming home from work at the same time each night, the commando unit struck on May 11, 1960, at about 8 p.m. outside Eichmann's home, on the now famous Garibaldi Street. It was Malkin who physically grabbed him. "I only knew one sentence in Spanish, and I used it," he said. "It was 'Uno momentito, senor.' (One moment, sir)."

Eichmann's capture has been immortalized in the books The House on Garibaldi Street by Isser Harel, Malkin's superior officer, and in Eichmann in My Hands, by Malkin himself.

Grabbing Eichmann and stuffing him in a car "was a moment that changed my life," Malkin recalled.

The young secret agent also wondered about Eichmann's humanity. "I said to myself, what is he like, this man who murdered millions? He was not a monster. He was a family man."

Over 150 members of Malkin's own family died in the Holocaust, he said.

During the capture, Malkin's gloved hands were around Eichmann's neck. But his orders were to bring Eichmann in alive and unhurt. Malkin jokingly said his superiors told him that "if you harm him, we'll kill you."

Told he would be tried for war crimes in Jerusalem, Eichmann said he would rather go to Frankfurt. "I told him they know you in Frankfurt," Malkin said he replied. "In Jerusalem, we don't know you, but we'll get to know you better."

Eichmann's controversial and highly publicized trial lasted from April 2 to Aug. 14, 1961. He was sentenced to death and executed in Ramleh Prison on May 31, 1962.

Malkin went on to become the storied Mossad's chief of operations, and retired in 1976. "I had 200 names," he quipped. "Sometimes, I didn't remember my own name."

A particularly poignant moment for Malkin in the Eichmann affair came when the Nazi told his Israeli captor that he had learned a few words in Hebrew following a 1936 trip to Palestine, conducted to study the enemy.

"I asked him what the words were, and he said, 'Shema Yisrael...'"

Loftus predicts war will bring a better Mideast

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

In less than three weeks, the war in Iraq ends with a decisive American victory.

The incessant bombardment of Baghdad prompts an internal uprising. Nearly half of Saddam Hussein's army deserts him.

Jewish Book Fair

The chaos results in Iraq reverting back to its former rulers and the current ruling royals in Jordan – the Hashemites. Jordan and Iraq are now a consolidated kingdom.

To smooth over the change, the Shiites, Kurds and West Bank Palestinians each have their own self-rule within the kingdom.

Jewish settlers in the West Bank are granted joint Israeli-Jordanian citizenship.

Does this sound like a pipe dream?

Perhaps, but when the source of the information is John Loftus, a former American Justice Department prosecutor with access to CIA and top secret nuclear files, it may not be baseless prognostication.

In a matter-of-fact style, Loftus delivered an engaging speech entitled "The truth about terrorism" at the opening of the Jewish Book Fair at the Leah Poslun's theatre Nov. 2.

A Pulitzer Prize nominee and the first Irish-Catholic president of the Florida Holocaust Museum, Loftus has a positive outlook on the gloomy Middle East.

The author of four history books said, "I think this [war on Iraq] will be one of the best things that has ever happened to Israel."

He sees the war triggering a waning of Muslim fundamentalism in the Mideast, a trend already in motion as television and the Internet penetrate the Arab world.

"Ignorance is an essential tool for dictators," Loftus said. "Television has been able to pierce that level of ignorance."

As proof, he said opinion polls show "83 per cent of the people in Iran want the fanatical Mullahs out." And he speculated that there could be a domino effect of authoritarian Arab regimes falling.

But Loftus conceded there is a "50 per cent chance that this will work out."

Neither did he paint an entirely rosy picture, noting that Palestinians will launch terror attacks on Israel during the war and Hezbollah might fire missiles with chemical weapons into Israel.

But with Israel's population immunized and the limited potential of missile-launched biological weapons to inflict mass suffering, Loftus isn't concerned.

The kicker in this is oil, he said. He predicted that with an American-friendly merged Jordan-Iraq kingdom, Iraq's current output of one million barrels of oil a day will be boosted to three million.

That will negate the need for oil from Saudi Arabia, a country Loftus pinpointed as the main fundraiser of Islamic terrorism.

The dominant sect in Saudi Arabia are the Wahabbi's who Loftus described as a "militant, violent, puritanical sect... the Ku Klux Klan of Islam."

He said the Saudis fund 80 per cent of the mosques in the United States where clerics "teach Wahabbism as if it is mainstream Islam."

legacy of life

a presentation of the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto

Being poor never stopped Bertha and Sandor Guttmann from giving all they could to those who needed it more. Every penny counted when there were so many mouths to feed, but still they managed to teach their nine children one very important lesson. As Bertha always said, "If somebody puts out their hand, give – even if you yourself have very little."

Their son Max Guttmann took that lesson to heart and spent a lifetime giving of both his time and his hard-earned money to those in need. Max's greatest loves were the Jewish people and the land of Israel, and he took great pleasure in doing his small part to ensure they both thrived. He was an ardent supporter of and canvasser for UJA Federation and State of Israel Bonds and helped countless charities and organizations including Baycrest Centre, Reena Foundation, Dr. Abraham Shore She'arim Hebrew Day School, ORT, Beit Halochem, Ha'agudah L'Maan Hachayal and Yad Vashem.

He also supported Israeli Victims of War, which has spent the past 16 years bringing Israeli children who have lost parents in military operations to Canadian summer camps and for a week of touring in Toronto.

"When Max heard about us the first thing he said was, 'What can I do to help?'" recalls Fred Stoppel, coordinator of IVOW's Toronto branch. "That's Max. Not only did he help us financially, but he and his wife Sheila hosted a barbeque at their home. These children paid their dues and soon will be serving on the front. With Max's help, they had an experience they'll long remember."

Max didn't work alone. Rather, the gregarious man had a knack for getting people to join him. So true was his commitment that many of his friends followed suit by joining a committee or becoming philanthropic themselves. Max was always urging his fellow congregants at Toronto's Beth Emeth-Bais Yehuda Synagogue to give, often getting them to increase their pledges if he knew they could afford more.

"Max was forceful and strong but he was a real pussycat at heart, and charity was his hobby," says Sheila Guttmann of her husband of 40 years. "Through his enthusiasm, Max influenced many people to be charitable, too. He once said that if he ever retired he would go into charity work full-time."

Max was born in Czechoslovakia in 1932 and moved to Hungary with his family three years later. His parents spent the war in the ghetto while Max and several siblings were sent to an orphanage. The family was reunited in 1945.

With the war over, Max longed to go to Israel. He climbed the Austrian mountains and fled to Germany, where he lived in a Displaced Persons camp and learned the tool-and-die trade. He did make it to Israel and his family joined him there, but soon after they moved to Toronto, where Max's father took on janitorial work. Max found a job at Massey Harris (later Massey Ferguson), giving every penny he earned to his struggling parents.

Max went on to build the hugely successful Algood Casters Ltd. When his sons Mark, Craig and Sean joined him in the business, he taught them to give, too. Sheila recalls the time they were walking with one of their children through the streets of Tel Aviv when a poor man shuffled past. The man hadn't asked for anything, yet Max felt the need to help. So he turned around, ran after the man and handed him 100 shekels. Sheila quickly looked at her son and said, "Don't ever forget what your father did just now."

They haven't. Craig and Sean, who run Algood Casters, are big givers too. Among their many causes is an annual golf tournament in their father's name benefiting She'arim. They recently donated more than 200 wheelchairs to two Israeli organizations. Craig and his family are spending this year in Israel while brother Mark and his family made Aliyah eight years ago.

"Our Dad taught us tzedakah and a love of Israel at an early age," says Sean. "He said, 'That's your homeland and that's why you send them money, that's why you go and visit, and that's why you live there.' He felt we had to give to the people who are keeping it in a viable state and that we should be thanking them on a daily basis. We're trying to follow that example."

Saudi money is funneled to "charities" based in Virginia. That money, for which the Saudis receive a tax break, is eventually used to fund suicide bombers, he said.

"Israel, when they raided Arafat's compound, found evidence of the Saudi funding," but the Americans encouraged Israel to "keep quiet" as the Saudis continue to sell oil to America at a discounted rate, he said.

Indeed, keeping quiet on the truth about Saudi Arabia is a must in CIA circles, Loftus said.

"At the CIA, if you want to ruin your career, all you have to do is write up an exposé on Saudi Arabia."

He said up to $300 million in Saudi money is paid to al-Qaeda, as "the Saudis bribe al-Qaeda to stay away from Saudi Arabia."

As sinister as this all seems, Loftus said the flow of dirty money paved the way for a lawsuit.

"If I donate money to charities, I can sue them to find out where the money went."

That is precisely what Loftus told the U.S. Department of Justice he would do unless they took action.

And they did take action, shutting down several Islamic charities in the United States, including Global Relief International, which was based in Illinois.

And this past August, Loftus and a team of more than 40 lawyers filed an unprecedented $1 trillion lawsuit against the Saudi royal family on behalf of the victims of the Sept. 11 attacks.

The author of The Secret War Against the Jews and Unholy Trinity, both of which he co-authored with Mark Aarons, is coming out with another book called Prophets of Terror: Jonathan Pollard and Peace in the Middle East.

Artist uses pop culture in exhibit on Holocaust

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Art that departs from traditional methods of Holocaust expression can portray unexplored aspects of humanity at its worst, the curator of the Jewish Museum in New York told an Art Gallery of Ontario audience.

Mirroring Evil – Nazi Imagery is a collection of 19 exhibits that attempt to make the Shoah relevant to this generation by using artistic elements usually associated with pop culture, Norman Kleeblatt said.

Holocaust Education Week

Today's documentaries of interviews with Nazi-trained students remind viewers that war-era Germans were very similar to our own parents and grandparents, he said, alluding to the illusory nature of evil.

Kleeblatt, who is the Susan and Elihu Rose Curator of Fine Arts at the New York museum, was in Toronto as part of Holocaust Education Week to describe some aspects of the controversial exhibition that appeared in the United States last spring.

Holocaust Education should attempt to portray the "slippery slope" to the unfathomable. Prevention can only come by looking at all tangents of evil to get closer to its source, he said.

The exhibition, which included Zbigniew Libera's LEGO concentration camps and Christine Borland's collection of sculptures of Dr. Josef Mengele, incorporated the works of 13 younger artists, one or two generations removed from the Holocaust, Kleeblatt explained.

Efforts were made by the artists to draw participants into the contemporary exhibits by using mediums usually associated with childhood, thereby "creating a destabilizing effect on the viewer's sense of moral certainty," Kleeblatt said.

By exchanging clear war lessons with conflicting messages, the exhibit can "hold the viewer captive," and position the participant in a grey zone of moral ambiguity.

At first glance, one assumes that the art will project a sense of innocence. A second look reveals that "this is innocence gone wrong," Kleeblatt said.

As an example of this new genre, he projected images from Art Spiegelman's MAUS – a comic book representation of the Holocaust.

Spiegelman, whose father was a survivor, portrays Nazis as cats, Jews as mice and Poles as pigs. His combination of "low art" with a Holocaust narrative was a breakthrough in the way the Shoah had ever been shown, Kleeblatt explained.

"Spiegelman's fusion of text and illustration offered a thinly veiled Orwellian allegory that initially circulated in... the limited domain of underground comics" for over 10 years until it finally earned its place in"high art."

MAUS crossed a number of sacred frontiers, he added. Its low art form, the portrayal of Jews as vermin, the conflicting nature of his father's racism, coupled with an anti-heroic and often unsympathetic survivor, betrayed many 20th-century traditions.

When describing some of the works that appeared in the New York show, Kleeblatt said there was a departure from art that focused mainly on victims and relied on the imagery of "identity, politics and multiculturalism."

Mirroring Evil attempted to describe the perpetrators by conflating "cool cerebral strategies" with "emotionally loaded subject matter."

In a disturbing video titled Hebrew Lesson, created by Boaz Arad, Hitler is presented speaking Hebrew.

By splicing together documented films about the German leader, the film juxtaposes Hitler's familiar warlike movements with the dictator's voice articulating the Hebrew words, "Greetings Jerusalem, I am deeply sorry."

In another exhibit by Piotr Uklanski, 145 portraits of Hollywood actors playing Nazi characters were presented along a bare white hallway, in order to "glamorize the image of the Nazi as seen in popular culture."

Photos of Nazis as Hollywood stars and sculptures of Mengele as a handsome man are meant to shock the viewer and explore the paradox between appearance and reality, Kleeblatt said.

However, for Judy Cohen, a Holocaust survivor and audience member, attempts to depict Mengele – the sadistic doctor known for the inhuman treatment of his victims – as a dashing movie star are simply offensive.

"How will the average viewer remember Mengele as he was, if the ugliness and horror of the man isn't clearly depicted?" Cohen asked.

Is intermarriage ultimate weapon of mass destruction?

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

Who's afraid of intermarriage? Apparently not Jewish communities around North America, as, more and more, the serious problem of Jews marrying other Jews less and less fails to attract as much attention as the Holocaust and suicide bombers.

I hope the irony of that picture is not too subtle.

It is frustrating to consider the relative apathy that so many singles-- especially women – face when trying to draw attention to the lack of available matches within the Jewish community and the paucity of infrastructure available to enhance those marital prospects.

Naturally the age of technology promises an end to this as to all other problems. With the advent of Internet dating services and online promises of love, the situation would seem to be more promising than in times past, where one was often more or less limited to the local talent. But these advances should not mask the fact that Jews are still marrying out in huge numbers.

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

The great leveller of secularism beckons everyone in the West with the promise that it no longer matters if you are a Jew or a Christian, just as long as you are a good human being. And since such a thought resonates with many as just plain common sense, it should come as little surprise when your child brings home that perfectly polite someone from another faith to clinch the deal.

Which brings us to Chanukah, a holiday that must rank near the top of the Jewish irony parade. Here is a festival almost universally celebrated in some form by Jews, even those who are thoroughly disinterested in many things Jewish.

With its bright candles, built-in military heroism and bundles of booty, Chanukah is tailor-made for the American dream. Yet at its root, it commemorates the most politically incorrect act of them all: killing a fellow Jew who has assimilated into idolatry.

Although linked in the minds of many to Christmas, the holiday actually triumphantly champions intolerance and the rejection of accommodations to progress. Call it obscurantist and an enemy of universalism, but Chanukah is a testimony to the desire for survival, especially on a spiritual level. But such survival is predicated by a biological and ultimately demographic necessity. Jews must populate and, to do so, they must marry other Jews.

Two of the most creative spirits in contemporary fiction, Philip Roth and the late Mordecai Richler, both made their careers documenting the fantasy of the gentile goddess (something they were only too happy to embrace in their private lives as well). I do not know how tenacious a hold such fantasies have on the psyche of the current crop of Jewish malehood, but they bode as ill for the long-term prospects of the Jewish nation as any more overt assault using weapons of destruction.

The only difference is that intermarriage is not the subject of public rallies in shuls and high-powered events that pay speakers lots of money to prognosticate about the Middle East.

I wonder which will undermine Judaism more in the long run – the evil of Yasser Arafat and Hamas or the fundamental decency of the non-Jewish and all-too-single woman next door?

Beware of biblical revisionists

By HENRY SREBRNIK

Guest Voice

A major debate is roiling the waters in the field of biblical studies, one that may have profound implications beyond academia. It may influence how we judge contemporary, and conflicting, claims to the land of Israel.

A small group of scholars is attempting to discredit the historicity of the Bible by maintaining that there is very little archeological evidence to support biblical stories about the existence of, among others, Moses, Joshua and King David. Philip R. Davies, a professor of religious studies at the University of Sheffield in England, contends that "the figure of King David is about as historical as King Arthur."

These so-called "minimalists," few of whom are actually archeologists, regard the Bible as a worthless source of history for the periods it describes. They share the basic view that it is essentially a fictional account that created a false national history at a much later time.

They write books with titles such as Keith W. Whitelam's The Invention of Ancient Israel: The Silencing of Palestinian History. And they will expound their theories at a forthcoming Bible and Archeology Fest, to be held in Toronto Nov. 22 to 24, and featuring academics from major American, European and even Israeli universities.

"They are not biblical scholars," the University of Arizona's William Dever, who is an archeologist, has said of these revisionists. "They are social engineers manipulating the biblical text for their own goals."

Dever is right. Theirs is a political agenda: they propagate their views in order to buttress Palestinian claims to the land. But these scholarly debunkers are in for an unpleasant surprise. If they proved to be correct, they might indeed undermine the religious and cultural foundations of the modern Jewish State of Israel. However, since the faith claims of both Christianity and Islam ultimately emanate from that same Hebrew Bible, these skeptics are just as surely destroying the veracity of those religions, and therefore undermining the position of the Palestinian Arabs, whose own identity – indeed, very existence as a self-conscious nation – has been shaped by the latter two traditions, especially Islam.

If David never existed, then Jesus of Nazareth obviously could not have been descended from his royal house, and so could not have been a potential messiah – if indeed he was an actual person at all. There would then be no factual or theological basis for Christianity.

As for Islam, since it regards all the prophets of the Jewish and Christian Bible as legitimate predecessors, it too would be left with no historical precursors, nor could Mohammed be considered the final messenger of a God who had already revealed Himself to the Jewish and Christian faithful.

If Israel is not a "holy land," a status based on the biblical texts, then what makes it significant to either Christians or Muslims? If the Temple Mount had not been the site of a Jewish temple, then why would Jerusalem be any more religiously important – to Palestinians as well as Jews – than Jakarta, Johannesburg or Juneau, Alaska? Why endow the location with such symbolism? Why revere it?

If the Hebrew Bible is mainly fiction and contemporary Israeli Jews thus have no historical claim to Israel, then neither do the modern Palestinian Arab people, who are the cultural progeny of the Christian and Muslim religions that built their own foundations out of the Judaic legacy.

Not to sound too facetious about it, but if both Arab and Jewish title to the land is based on a false history, then should it not revert to the Canaanites and Philistines who inhabited the region in ancient times? But of course these nations no longer exist. The descendants of these long-extinct peoples are, thanks to the three Abrahamic religions that supplanted the ancient creeds of the region, the very Israeli Jews and Palestinian Arabs who live there now! So in terms of legitimate claimants to the country, we will, ironically, have come full circle. And both Israelis and Palestinians will continue to press their respective demands.

Henry Srebrnik is a professor of political studies at the University of Prince Edward Island.

Jewish Life

The mezuzah: spiritual home improvement

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

It is one of the most obvious signs of a Jewish home – a small, ornate box on the doorpost containing the mezuzah parchment. If you're in the middle of doing home improvements, now is the ideal time to look at a spiritual fixer-upper – your mezuzah.

The commandment for the mezuzah can be found in the Torah: "And thou shalt write them upon the door posts of thy house and upon thy gates" (Deuteronomy 6;4-9, 11:13-21) [http://shlk.com/191]. As the Jewish Virtual Library points out, "The mezuzah is not, as some suppose, a good-luck charm, nor does it have any connection with the lamb's blood placed on the doorposts in Egypt. Rather, it is a constant reminder of God's presence and God's commandments" [http://www.us-israel.org/jsource/Judaism/mezuzah1.html].

The mezuzah must be handwritten by a sofer, a trained scribe, onto parchment made from a kosher animal. Consult with the sofer if you want to double-check whether your current mezuzot are kosher. He should be able to spot a perfect mezuzah and detect one with errors. To be able to detect errors yourself, take a look a copy of an error-free mezuzah online [http://www.milknhoney.co.il/stam/mezuza.html] and then take the "mezuzah challenge." You'll find a mezuzah that, at first glance, looks pretty good. But according to the site, it has over 25 errors. (Just one error disqualifies a real mezuzah.) [http://www.campsci.com/mezuzah/mzcont.htm]

When you are ready to affix a kosher mezuzah to your doorpost, you can find the basic instructions as well as the blessing at [http://www.ahavat-israel.com/ahavat/torat/mezuza.asp] and [http://www.foreveryjew.com/childmezuza.html]. But the laws for mezuzot can get quite complicated. For example, what do you do with an irregularly shaped door or archway? What if you're entering a tiny room? What if you're afraid that your outdoor mezuzah will be stolen? The Halacha-Yomi archives offer a detailed look at the laws of mezuzot based on an English translation of the definitive Kitzur Shulchan Aruch [http://www.torah.org/learning/halacha/classes/class1.html].

Although the essence of the commandment is what goes inside the mezuzah, the Esek Web site points out that the decorative container is not unimportant. "The whole idea, which is consistent with all forms of Judaic art and practical items, is endearing God's commandments to us. We live in human forms that react to aesthetics. If something is attractive, we are more likely to give it honour or care" [http://www.esek.com/sopher/mezinfo.html].

Whether you decide to buy the mezuzah parchment at a local store or through the Internet – there are many places to buy parchments and cases online – make sure you are dealing with a reputable scribe and company. You can find a long list of commercial mezuzah links at the Mish Mash site [http://www.mish-mash.ca/mezuzot.html] and at Maven's Judaica section [http://maven.co.il/subjects.asp?S=138].

In addition to being a reminder that you are in a Jewish home, the mezuzah has long been viewed as having protective qualities. The Jerusalem Talmud tells the story of the Persian king Artvon who sends Rabbi Yehuda HaNasi an expensive stone and requests that the rabbi give him back something of equal value. So the rabbi wrote a mezuzah and sent it to him. When Artvon received the mezuzah, he said, confused, "I sent you something of great value, and you send me a cheap piece of parchment in return." The rabbi answered, "You sent me something for which I will have to hire a watchman to protect it, whereby I sent you something that will offer you protection" [http://www.campsci.com/mezuzah/].

Many remarkable stories have been told about people who have recovered from illnesses after a faulty mezuzah was replaced with a kosher one. In one case, someone suffering from eye problems discovered that the Hebrew word for "your eyes" – "aynaychem" – had been misspelled in his bedroom mezuzah. When the mezuzah was replaced, the medical problem reportedly disappeared [http://www.campsci.com/mezuzah/mzpart1.htm].

But I particularly like one rabbi's mezuzah story. The rabbi was approached by a neighbour who was concerned that his kids were becoming very religious. The neighbour didn't know what to do. When a local rabbi heard of the problem, he had this piece of advice for him: "Check your mezuzot. Maybe they're kosher!" [http://www.ohr.org.il/ask/ask090.htm].

Exploring a columnist's view of the post-9/11 world

Longitudes & Attitudes: Exploring the World After September 11*, by Thomas Friedman, Farrar Straus Giroux, $37.00.

About 20 years ago, I attended a rabbinical conference in Israel at which Pulitzer Prize-winning author Thomas Friedman was a guest speaker. He was impressively clear and logical in his presentation, knowledgeable about all aspects of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and concerned about the great divide between the western and Arab worlds.

Friedman is a longtime columnist for the New York Times and his roving beat permits him to travel wherever he wishes in order to find an important story. This book is made up of the columns he published about Sept. 11, as well as a diary of his experiences and reflections thereafter, as he travelled from Afghanistan to Israel and from Europe and Indonesia to Saudi Arabia.

Sept. 11, writes Friedman, was shocking to most Americans and civilized people around the world because it breached a fundamental principle – the sudden, wholesale destruction of human-beings.

"If it is possible to recruit 19 educated young men to hijack four planes and commit suicide by flying them into the Pentagon and the World Trade Center, and thereby kill close to 3,000 totally innocent people who kissed their spouses goodbye that morning and a few hours later were phoning home to their loved ones (if they were lucky) and telling them they were about to die, then anything is possible," he writes.

For those who find some justification for terrorism in American foreign policy or unseemly behaviour, Friedman has a quick answer.

"America has done more to make this world a better, more liveable place for more people than any other country in history. Some people don't like that. They detest the freedom, the pluralism, the religious toleration, the secularism, the gender equality, the democracy, the faith, the free markets and the multiethnicity with which we have built our society, and which we urge others to emulate…

"There really are people who hate Christians, hate Jews, hate secularism, hate the equality of women. At some point you have to either kill those people or be killed by them. This is not a misunderstanding that can be cleared up by a few courses in multiculturalism."

Friedman projects a Palestinian majority in Israel, the West Bank, Gaza and eastern Jerusalem by 2010, and maintains that Israel will then be forced to rule in a manner similar to the way South African whites ruled blacks under apartheid. This would be a mortal blow to Israel as a democratic state. He asserts that the only hope for Israel is to get out of the territories – in any orderly way it can – and minimize its friction with the Arab world as the Arabs go through a wrenching internal adjustment to modernization.

"I applaud [U.S.] President [George W.] Bush's call for Mr. [Yasser] Arafat to be replaced. But it is a travesty that Mr. Bush did not act to 'reaccredit' Israel too, as a peace partner for a two-state solution with the Palestinians, by insisting that Israel begin pulling back from some of its far-flung settlements in Gaza and the West Bank."

Longitudes and Attitudes is essential reading – stimulating, controversial and eye-opening.

Ontario Tories change rules on Shabbat ballots

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Ontario's Progressive Conservative party has amended its constitution to allow observant Jews to vote in leadership races, which typically fall on Saturdays.

The two amendments passed at the party's annual convention held here recently will require the Tories to establish advance polls so Sabbath observant party members – Orthodox Jews and Seventh-day Adventists – can take part in leadership contests.

The move came as a reaction to last spring's leadership vote that saw Ernie Eves replace Mike Harris as leader and premier. Observant Jews were shut out from casting ballots because voting took place on Saturday.

Prior to the leadership race, the party's executive voted to reject advance polls, opting instead for proxy voting. But that was a non-starter for the Orthodox after it was determined that proxy voting is un-halachic.

Last March, The CJN consulted three rabbis, two of them Orthodox, all of whom ruled that Jews could not take advantage of proxy voting because it is counter to Jewish law to appoint someone – even a non-Jew – to perform a task that is prohibited to Jews on the Sabbath.

In one riding, York Centre, proxy voting was untenable anyway because the number of Sabbath-observant party members far outnumbered the non-observant, making a proxy vote mathematically impossible.

The inability to cast ballots angered many Orthodox party members in at least three Toronto-area ridings, who said they were being disenfranchised, just as the Tories were aggressively courting the Jewish community, particularly the Orthodox. Jewish Conservatives complained they were unable to reward the Tories for the Equity in Education Tax Credit, which provides tax relief for parents of children in religious schools.

One of the changes to the party's constitution takes the old provision – that in the event of a leadership race, an election "shall respect the principle that each member of the party has the right to one vote," and adds the following: "…and that the executive shall ensure that the right to vote of each party member is respected in any rules governing the leadership election."

The second amendment states that the party's executive "is required" (changed from "is authorized") to make provisions in the leadership election rules for an advanced poll and/or preferential ballot, or other means, in order to ensure that the voting process is accessible and respects the rights of all members to cast their votes."

A preferential ballot will allow a voter to choose more than one candidate should voting go beyond one ballot.

Both amendments passed with well more than the two-thirds majority required.

A driving force behind the amendments was Bruce Gilboord, an Orthodox Jew and member of the York Centre PC riding association.

Gilboord, who lashed out at his party last spring, welcomed the changes. "This party has come out leading the pack on religious liberty," he said.

"In general, it's a positive move," said Jeff Bangs, executive director of the Ontario PC party. "The party was hamstrung by its own constitution."

Also favouring the amendments was onetime leadership hopeful Jim Flaherty, who insiders said had the most to lose without the Jewish vote. Of the five contenders, he was said to be the biggest booster of the education tax credit.

Ironically, the debate on the amendments took place on a Saturday, and Gilboord was forced to present his briefing via videotape. In the end, Gilboord said delegates went beyond his expectations, strengthening the language of the amendment to an even stronger degree.

SHIMON OHANA: DETERMINED TO SUCCEED

At 18, I followed in my father's footsteps and chose to do my military service as a border policeman. Within six weeks, my life changed forever.

While on duty in a Jerusalem neighborhood, shooting began from nearby Baet Jalah village. Bullets punctured my heart and vital organs, rupturing my spleen, liver and intestines.

I lay unconscious. A Druze doctor arrived with the intensive care ambulance. He tried to save me by opening my chest and stitching my heart on the spot. I was declared clinically dead and put into a body bag. Miraculously, the doctor discovered a faint heartbeat and rushed me to Hadassah Hospital. Hovering between life and death for 21 days, I received 138 blood transfusions. Of that fateful day, I only remember being put into the body bag.

My first time at Beit Halochem, I stood at the swimming pool, embarrassed to take off my shirt revealing my scar-covered body. Around me were people without limbs, burned, blind; but happy to be alive. This gave me the strength I needed to start living again.

At Beit Halochem I swim, work out, play tennis and ping pong for therapy. I also go horseback riding weekly.

I personally thank you for funding the Beit Halochem Centres in Israel. We need you and appreciate your support.

והתאוצה שיצרו רבין, חוסיין, קלינטון ופרקי הנובל נעצרה כליל. אורח עצרת הזיכרון הוא איתן הַבר, יד ימינו של רבין לאורך שנים רבות, והאיש שהודיע באומה על מותו והראה את הפתק עם מילות "שיר לשלום" מגואל בדם ליבו של רבין.

שמעתי את הבר מדבר על רבין. אלה הם דברים מרגשים עד דמעות, ואסור לאף ישראלי להחמיצם.

האירוע יתקיים בבית הכנסת "בית דויד בני ישראל" (מערבית לְבָּרְסָט ודרומית לְשָׁפַרד) בחסות הקונסול ותנועות הנוער.

Responding to the needs of Ethiopian olim

The 70,000-strong Ethiopian Israeli community consists in large part of immigrants who came from an agricultural society which did not prepare them for life in the hi-tech nation of Israel. A recent Israeli report found that 75% of 15,000 Ethiopian olim who were airlifted to Israel 18 years ago in Operation Moses remain unable to write Hebrew.

UJA Federation, along with other North American communities, recognizes the tough challenges facing Ethiopian Israelis and is providing direct assistance above and beyond that provided through the Jewish Agency for Israel and the Joint Distribution Committee, UJA Federation's overseas partners.

In the community of Kiryat Moshe, a neighbourhood of Rehovot, near Tel Aviv, UJA Federation funds The B'Ma'ale progam which provides students and youth in distress with Ethiopian counselors who help them integrate better into the Israeli school system. The counselors work with the schools, children, and families to improve student participation, motivation and achievement, and to prevent them from dropping out.

Kiryat Moshe community members

An improved learning centre, projected to serve 400 students, is well underway to significantly raise student standards in Hebrew and English. For youth in distress, there is a unique intervention program to address the needs of 30 young people. A new Teenage Girls Club will offer a warm atmosphere, enrichment workshops and social skills development. At the same time, the mobilization and organization of the larger Kiryat Moshe community has also been initiated.

UJA Federation supports the Ethiopian community in Kiryat Moshe

Canadian Jewish Congress fighting antisemitism in Ontario schools

Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario Region, (CJCONT) the advocacy arm of UJA Federation, is working hard these days to combat antisemitic incidences in the public school system.

Here are some of the cases with which CJC is dealing:

- A grade 10 teacher turns to a student in the midst of a classroom discussion on the high cost of university education and says, "Joseph doesn't have to worry about this. His parents will pay for his education. Everything is handed to him on a silver platter. He's Jewish."
- A grade eight geography teacher makes use of a school board-approved resource citing Jewish persecution of Christians as an example of a "push factor," leading to emigration.
- A high school teacher facilitates the arrangement of an in-school symposium on the Middle East. Three speakers present their perspectives. The Israeli position is ignored because, in the opinion of the presenters, they do not agree with that position and do not care to express it.

CJC has resolved some of these problems to the satisfaction of all parties while others are in the process of resolution. According to Len Rudner, Director of Community Relations for CJC Ontario Region, the role of CJC in these situations is two-fold.

"We advocate on behalf of our community members, while at the same time, we educate the educators and encourage them to take concrete steps to improve the quality of the school environment," says Rudner.

Congress works closely with UJA Federation and its Board of Jewish Education on cultural and diversity training for students.

"Working in unison with UJA Federation has proven to be an effective way to put the community's position forward on a range of issues on the province's political and social agenda, in particular, in the field of education policy," says Ed Morgan, Chair of CJCONT.

Seniors go high tech at Bernard Betel

As technological advances continue, it's easy for senior citizens to feel more alienated and out of touch.

However, following up on seniors' wishes, the Betel Centre for Creative Living is doing something to keep them connected.

Brian Prosserman, instructor of Bernard Betel's "Access to the Internet" program, surfs the net with Bella Tatoff.

Construction recently began on a new on-site, senior-friendly, state-of-the-art Computer Learning and Resource Centre, scheduled to open early in the new year.

The centre, funded in part by UJA Federation, which will include 12 workstations, will be open six days a week with comprehensive training and access to the Internet and e-mail. Instruction will be geared specifically to seniors at the introductory and intermediate levels.

"Computer technology has eliminated distances and is a useful tool for seniors to enhance their independence and their lives," says Esta Wall, Executive Director of the Bernard Betel Centre. "Our computer learning and resource centre will be unlike any other of its kind. Seniors told us this is the program they most desire in terms of recreation and education, and we are excited about our ability to meet this need."

For seniors Marion Greenberg and Sadie Rose, the new centre is a welcome change.

"I'm really excited by the ability I'll have to contact my friends the easiest way possible, by e-mail," says Rose, 89.

Adds Greenberg, 78, "I welcome the opportunity to better myself on the use of the computer, especially the Internet."

Dershowitz dialogues with Toronto students

Internationally renowned law professor Alan Dershowitz left a strong impression on students during his visit to Toronto last week.

In town for UJA Federation's Campaign 2003 celebration, Dershowitz addressed close to 1200 students at both Upper Canada College and Hart House at the University of Toronto.

"Terrorism is the defining act of our age in many parts of the world; it's all around us," said Dershowitz. "Many people think that terrorism is a function of poverty, or being oppressed. None of these factors are why terrorism is prevalent. The people of Tibet, for instance, are occupied by China, but they don't use terrorism."

Students at both venues were enthusiastic about Dershowitz's appearance, especially in the wake of comments made by Canada's Foreign Affairs Minister Bill Graham, who distinguished between the social service work of the terrorist organization Hezbollah, and its acts of terror. Hezbollah was reportedly behind the 1994 bombing of the Jewish community services building in Buenos Aires, which killed 86 people and injured at least 300.

"It does not show respect for the victims of terrorism for the spokesman of this great country to praise Hezbollah in any respect," said Dershowitz of Graham's remarks.

The students at U of T and UCC came well prepared with questions for the man described by Time Magazine as one of the most distinguished defenders of individual rights. Dershowitz not only answered their questions, but sometimes turned the tables on them with questions of his own.

At U of T, Dershowitz expressed his strong opposition to divestiture campaigns on North American campuses - attempts by universities to break all ties with Israel.

"Nobody expects these campaigns to succeed," he said. "The goal is to create the impression that of all the grievous human rights violators in the world, Israel is the worst country of all."

Following his address at U of T's Hart House, he held a private briefing for student leaders involved in on-campus advocacy.

The U of T event was sponsored by Jewish Campus Services and UJA Federation.

Miles Nadal JCC lays out welcome "Mats" for Maple Leafs

Two of Toronto's longest-standing and most popular institutions are pooling their efforts this Sunday for a common goal – the youth of Toronto.

The Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre, formerly the Bloor JCC, located on the southwest corner of Bloor and Spadina, has been a cornerstone of Toronto's downtown Jewish core for almost 50 years, while the Toronto Maple Leafs recently celebrated their 75th anniversary.

On Sunday, November 17 at 2:00 p.m., led by Leaf captain Mats Sundin, these two venerable pieces of Toronto's mosaic will meet.

On that day, Sundin will bring the Esso NHL Street Buds program to the new centre. Street Buds is an initiative enabling more than 3,500 boys and girls between the ages of 6 and 16 to play organized hockey at various Toronto parks and recreation centres.

"I think that this program is a spectacular opportunity to expand the reach of the JCC to a broader target audience," says Miles Nadal, benefactor of the 65,000-square-foot building which – upon completion – will replace the aging Bloor JCC. "Obviously athletics is an important part of the JCC's programming, and this unique relationship between us and the Toronto Maple Leafs is a win-win situation. It's great for us, great for the Leafs, but most importantly, it's great for the young children of Toronto, both Jews and non-Jews alike, who will benefit strongly from this."

The Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre – a project of UJA Federation's Jewish Toronto Tomorrow initiative – will also house a myriad of daily activities: athletics, health and wellness, culture and art, religion and education.

"We believe it's important to get involved in programs that recognize the value of positive reinforcement in youth skill development," says Sundin. "This program gives boys and girls a chance to participate in an outstanding initiative that encourages them to enjoy the game and have fun, while promoting the importance of teamwork and exercise."

Mats Sundin, Maple Leafs' Captain, will be on hand at the new Miles Nadal JCC on Sunday, November 17 for the Street Buds program.

Negev honorees are children of the Holocaust

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

The Jewish National Fund of Toronto's 2002 Negev Dinner will honour Saul and Toby Feldberg, children of the Holocaust who became role models in business and communal leaders in Canada and Israel.

The dinner will take place Sunday, Dec. 1, at the Sheraton Centre Hotel.

Sitting in the boardroom of Global Upholstery, surrounded by numerous framed awards and photos of the Feldbergs with world leaders – including the Pope, Prime Minister Jean Chrétien, former Israeli prime minister Yitzchak Shamir and former prime minister Pierre Trudeau – the quiet-spoken and modest couple speak with humility about their childhoods during the war, their rise in business, their community commitments and, above all, their gratitude for their four children, David, Bernie, Janice, and Joel, and their five grandchildren.

When asked why they accepted the JNF honour when they believe in contributing quietly, Saul replied: "We felt that it was time to step forward and do something greater for Israel, for a worthy cause of JNF and to establish Halochem Park for disabled war veterans and victims of terror in the Haruvit Forest.

"In this way, we can show our solidarity with our brethren in Israel."

Saul, 67, was born in the town of Skarzysko, Poland, where he says the mortality rate during the war was higher than in Birkenau.

"I remember the Germans putting a yellow star on my arm and the fear in the eyes of my parents and grandparents," he says. "As a child, I cried myself to sleep."

He tells of a night when his father brought him a crust of bread. "When I finished it, I pleaded with him for more. He moved away from me and I could distinctly hear him crying."

These haunting memories, he says, remind him of his Jewishness and reinforce his determination to strengthen the State of Israel and the Jewish people.

Toby's family lived in Lodz, Poland. Her mother was four months pregnant with Toby when the war broke out. Her father was in the Polish army when Poland surrendered.

"We became fugitives," she says. "We lived by our wits alone. Our family survived by miracles running from place to place until the war ended."

Their stories of survival – through chaos, pain, death and injustice – have been converted to dedication, respect, self-worth and love.

Looking back, Saul whispers, "I was an old man before I became old."

While Saul was in a displaced persons camp in Berlin for three years, he attended a modern Hebrew school set up by the Zionist Organization. "I realized that the only way the Jewish people could survive as a people was to have an independent state."

Saul's family spent four years in Israel and arrived in Toronto in 1953.

Toby's family, the Elsners, returned to Lodz after the war, but Toby says when her parents found only ruins and lists of the dead, they left. They spent a few months in Israel and joined the rest of the family in Toronto.

Saul and Toby met in Toronto in 1955 at the Israeli Palmah Club, which, Toby says happily, "I crashed." Two years later, they were married.

She says that to this day, she and Saul still share their day-to-day lives.

In 1966, they established Global Upholstery, which manufactures office furniture such as chairs, desks, filing and wall systems. Over the years, the company expanded to become a worldwide organization with more than 2,000 employees.

The Feldbergs speak of the great satisfaction they had in establishing factories in Israel in 1995. Teknion is a plant in Haifa and Global Tzora is located in a kibbutz near Jerusalem. Global has more than 400 employees in Israel, mostly from the former Soviet Union. Half of the company's products are exported to Europe.

JNF Negev Dinner honorees

"I always had a dream," says Saul, "to contribute in an active way to the State of Israel – active in helping to employ new immigrants who are struggling to make a living. It gives us great satisfaction to be participating in the building of a stronger economy and a stronger Israel."

The Feldbergs work for many charitable organizations, including hospitals, and schools, as well as groups that serve the underprivileged and Holocaust survivors.

Toby is active with the Reena Foundation, is president of the Haifa Foundation and is president of Beit Halochem Canada: Aid to Disabled Veterans of Israel.

She says it was Bernie Weinstein, a former Negev Dinner honoree, who first introduced her to some visiting Israeli veterans from Beit Halochem.

"I realized that these people were willing to give their lives for all of us. That is one of the reasons we agreed to accept this honour – to bring awareness of Beit Halochem. Halochem Park in the Haruvit Forest will bring great joy to the physically challenged veterans and their families for generations to come – JNF and Beit Halochem go hand-in-hand."

Saul and Toby Feldberg, JNF Negev dinner honorees.

Toby adds that "it is very important to let them know that we are fully involved in helping them survive. And it is important that everyone of us visits Israel to show our solidarity."

He speaks with passion about visiting Israel. "When you are in Israel, you don't watch CNN and you don't feel you are in Israel – you feel safer there than in New York, Miami, Los Angeles or the Washington area."

This year's JNF campaign co-chairs are Brent Belzberg, Jeff Blidner, David Koschitzky, and Edward Sonshine.

The Israeli Free Way

Visiting Israel is not only less expensive than most other overseas destinations, there's also a lot to do for the best possible price. Absolutely free. For those in the know, Israel is packed with "on-the-house" opportunities. So read on and consider yourself in the know.

Baha'i Gardens, Haifa – Waterfalls, marble staircases and 19 dazzling garden terraces highlight this world-renowned attraction atop Mount Carmel. It took 10 years and over $250 million U.S. to construct the terraces which account for this site's unofficial designation as the eighth wonder of the world. Although the Baha'i Gardens are open to the public year-round, reservations are recommended through the Haifa Tourist Board, at 011.972.4.831.3131.

The Tayelet, Tel Aviv – Tayelet is the Hebrew word for promenade, but Tel Aviv's tayelet is much more than that. It's an 11-kilometre ocean walkway, starting in the city's downtown core and ending in the neighbouring port of Jaffa. Whether walking or jogging, the view is inspirational and you're sure to find fellow tayelet travellers any time of the day or night.

Ramat Hanadiv Memorial Gardens – Just outside the historic, quaint community of Zichron Ya'akov, south of Haifa, are 1100 acres hosting the dazzling Ramat Hanadiv Gardens, dedicated to the memory of Baron de Rothschild. Many exciting archaeological discoveries add a deeper dimension to the reserve route.

Whether touring for free or spending money, the value of visiting Israel has never been greater. It's a wonderful time to see our magnificent country, knowing how much the people of Israel appreciate your presence and the positive impact of your trip on Israel's struggling economy.

After all, Israel is yours. So please say I care and I'm going.

Ringelblum Archives recalls life in Warsaw Ghetto

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Ration cards. Work permits. Candy wrappers. Tram tickets. The ephemera of daily life.

This is what was left of the life of those interned in the Warsaw Ghetto. The items were collected between November 1940 and early spring of 1943, and, in an attempt to save them from certain destruction, hidden in caches in the ghetto.

Holocaust Education Week

The remarkable collection is called the Ringelblum Archives, after Emanuel Ringelblum, a teacher in a girls' school, who spearheaded the project. Ringelblum himself was shot in the ruins of the Warsaw Ghetto in May 1944.

The archives are stored at the Jewish Historical Institute in Warsaw. Eleonora Bergman, the institute's deputy director and curator, told their fascinating story at the Lipa Green building, as part of this year's Holocaust Education Week.

Ringelblum and a number of writers, teachers, social workers and a rabbi, formed themselves into an organization called Oneg Shabbos, since they met on Friday nights.

They decided to make a record of life in the ghetto, of what was happening to the Jews of Poland, and to somehow show the richness of Jewish life, even in the horrendous conditions they had to endure.

It must be said, Bergman stressed, that the group was not only working for posterity, although "they felt a free society would appreciate their efforts." Rather, "they planned to use the material for their own research and writings after the war." Most, however, died, either in the ghetto or in Treblinka.

Among other things, they collected statistics: what parts of Poland the Jews in the ghetto were brought from, how many died of hunger, lists of deportees to Treblinka.

Research was carried out especially for the project, Bergman said, using questionnaires, interviews with intellectuals and school curricula. It showed ghetto life existing on two levels, she said. People went to schools, social and cultural organizations and concerts, while stepping over the dying.

People were asked about their plans for the future and the possibility of a Jewish state. Some were even asked to consider what positive aspects there might be about their incarceration.

"There wasn't much positive," Bergman said wryly, although some spoke about strong friendships and the help people gave each other.

Ringelblum himself, Bergman said, made copious notes, commenting on events in the ghetto, jokes and gossip, and drafts of books he wanted to write after the war.

By 1942, she said, Oneg Shabbos began to recognize the truth about the destruction of the Jews, and members wrote about the massacres in Chelmna, Lublin and Poniar. They realized that the Germans had changed tactics from murdering groups of Jews to a policy of total extermination. With the help of the Polish underground, in March 1942, they sent reports of what was happening to the Polish government in exile and then to the Allies.

In August, the underground told the ghetto inhabitants of the Germans' lethal intentions. Members of Oneg Shabbos decided that the material must be hidden for safekeeping. In January and February 1943, and on April 18, the night before the Warsaw Ghetto uprising began, everything that had been packed into milk cartons and boxes was hidden under a school building and under a house.

At the same time, the organization was preparing for the armed resistance. What was probably the last material added to the second cache was a flyer exhorting Jews not to go quietly to their deaths, but to fight against their oppressors.

On Sept. 18, 1946, Bergman said, 10 metal boxes were retrieved from the rubble of a tenement house. Most of the contents were mildewed and had to be dried and repaired. More boxes were found on Dec. 1, 1950, but this material had sustained almost no damage.

Everything has been cared for and preserved according to proper archival techniques, Bergman said, adding that much of the paper conservation was carried out with the help of the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum.

Cataloguing has been a real problem, she said, since the material was found in the order in which it was packed, rather than by any recognizable structure. However, she said, they have been able to piece together much of the order, and a preliminary catalogue came out in the early 1950s. A new one is expected to come out next year, with the help of computer technology. Eventually, she said, the Jewish Historical Institute hopes to publish the whole Ringelblum Archives.

The collection now comprises 1,700 archival files.

In 1999, she said, UNESCO put the Ringelblum Archives on its Memory of the World List, considering it a significant item for the history of the world.

12 Concordia students charged for roles in protest

MONTREAL – Twelve Concordia University students will be charged under the university's Code of Rights and Responsibilities for their roles in the violent protest that led to the cancellation of a speech by former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu on Sept. 9.

The students, who include the two arrested on the day of the demonstration, will be disciplined under the code as it existed on Sept. 9, the university said. The code, which is currently being reviewed, provides for a range of sanctions, from written reprimand to suspension or expulsion.

Most of those to be charged under the code broke through the security perimeter in the Hall Building and occupied the mezzanine and escalators near its entrance.

"It was these actions that directly led to the cancellation of Mr. Netanyahu's speech. As outlined in Article 16 of the code, they created an 'intimidating and hostile atmosphere.' Every individual present on the mezzanine and escalator who has been identified at the time has been charged," the university said in a press release.

Concordia said it is not releasing the names of those charged because of confidentiality regulations.

As for "several" complaints of assault, intimidation and spitting that allegedly occurred outside the Hall Building on Sept. 9, the university said it "vigorously deplores" such behaviour, but said none of these incidents was captured on videotape. "As a result, with one exception, the individuals involved could not be identified," it said.

The university said it has identified a total of 19 individuals involved in the violence and related incidents.

Of the non-students, four will be barred from the Concordia campus and will not be permitted to register at the university for a period of five years, the university said. One of these four individuals has been identified as being among those who broke the large front window of the Hall Building, a scene that was featured in much of the media coverage of the Sept. 9 event.

"A careful, exhaustive and time-consuming study of available videotape footage and other evidence has led to the current set of charges. The investigation is continuing and further charges will be laid as individuals are identified," the university said.

The five who were arrested, who include three non-students, have been charged under the Criminal Code or municipal bylaws, for such offences as obstruction of a police officer and illegal assembly.

The university said additional complaints have been filed with police against seven other individuals and the investigations continue.

"Concordia University will continue to enforce its policy of zero tolerance for violent and intimidating behaviour. Whatever the supposed justification, the disgraceful actions taken to prevent the speech of former prime minister Netanyahu must not be repeated. Violence and intimidation have no place on campus," the university stated.

Betar-Tagar, the youth wing of Herut Likud, has a shaliach from Israel for the first time in three years.

Itay Gadot, 32, said in a recent interview that his main goal is to establish young leadership trained in Israel advocacy, on university campuses in and around Toronto, beginning with York University and the University of Toronto.

BETAR

Itay Gadot

He said he's not here to compete with Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto, which has increased its focus on the same issue in the past two years of increasing terrorism in Israel and increasing anti-Israel sentiment on campus. Gadot sees himself as a resource for the campus umbrella organization, he said.

"I don't see Tagar [the campus wing] as one player," said Gadot, who arrived here last month. "It's a mosaic. It's beautiful only when all the parts are combined together. We consider ourselves as a few stones in the mosaic."

If students don't stand up for Israel on campus, he said, "only one voice will be heard and that will be the Palestinian side."

Although Betar (for high school students) and Tagar – which in Israel are affiliated with the ruling political party, Likud – are "skewed to the right wing," Israel's survival and security is not a matter of right or left, Gadot said. On campus, he said, the Palestinians are regarded as "the good guys." Sometimes, he added, Jewish students are "swept" to the other side which is "more persuasive," because they are not well-informed.

With a background in advertising and communications – he worked on an award-winning campaign for Proctor & Gamble in Israel – Gadot says, "We have so many messages. As an advertiser I know I should focus each time on only one message and be coherent about it. Once you establish a message and deliver it, then you can move on to the next one."

When Gadot was three months old, his father Gideon, who later became a Member of Knesset, began his own Betar shlichut in Johannesburg. "I was born into shlichut," said Gadot, who was named in part for his great-uncle Aryeh Ben-Eliezer, his father's mentor and an early Betar member as well as a member of Israel's first Knesset.

Despite his political roots, Gadot laments the decline of the left in Israel. "Don't think I'm happy about it," he said. "Of course I would like the right to be in government, but I think it's a healthier thing for democracy if there are two strong parties around the centre."

Gadot is one of a handful of Betar-Tagar shlichim in North America. He has one counterpart in Canada, based in Winnipeg.

In addition to working with Jewish university students directly on pro-active Israel advocacy, Gadot would like to bring Israeli movies here. A longtime film buff who attributes his English vocabulary to the fact that he decided at a young age not to read subtitles, Gadot said that Israeli films show an aspect of Israel that does not appear in the news. "It's very important for me to share this with other people."

Ever since Gadot's predecessor, Baruch Liverant, finished his Toronto shlichut three years ago, Tagar has not been active here. "It's like a car that's stuck in the snow, and now we have to warm it up," said Gadot. "I believe that in a few weeks we'll be back on the highway."

Ottawa cantor honoured

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

Cantor Daniel Benlolo

OTTAWA — Cantor and choir director Daniel Benlolo of Congregation Beth Shalom West is the recipient of this year's Elaine Rabin Social Service Award in recognition of his service to the community.

The award, which was presented at the recent 22nd annual general meeting of Jewish Family Services of Ottawa-Carleton (JFS), is named in honour of Elaine Rabin, who was executive director of JFS from its inception in 1980 until 1996.

In addition to his duties as cantor, Benlolo is known around the city for his solo performances at community events and for his work with the Shira Ottawa Choir, of which he is founder and director.

The youngest in a Moroccan family of 12 children who settled in Quebec, Benlolo became cantor of the Spanish and Portuguese Synagogue in Montreal at the age of 20. He studied Ashkenazi, Yemenite, Syrian and other Sephardi cantorial styles at the Belz School of Jewish Music, an affiliate of Yeshiva University in New York.

Benlolo started his own bar/bat mitzvah preparation school at the Hillel Lodge seniors' residence, using its chapel in return for teaching seniors at the lodge for their own bar and bat mitzvahs. Soon after, he added a bat mitzvah class at the Tamir Foundation's group home for the developmentally disabled adults across the street.

"I believe strongly that working with children, the disabled, the elderly and the disadvantaged has made me grow stronger," Benlolo said. "What my late mother instilled in me was the love of people, to make sure that you don't see a difference in people, regardless of where they come from."

In his speech, he thanked his wife, Muriel, and jokingly thanked HaShem.

On a more serious note, he said, "I accept the award in the name of all the children, the disadvantaged, the disabled and the elderly, and hope that we all learn that because of them we learn what chesed is, what kindness is. Because of them, we are better people.

"I strongly believe that one who believes in something or does something with unconditional love should not expect to be rewarded for it," he said, "but it does feel great!"

Christian minister leads Inuit tours to Israel

The Inuit are particularly interested though in connecting with ordinary Israelis and sharing their culture, Rev. Armbruster says.

"At least once a day," he says, "we stop at a kibbutz or a school or a hospital and the Inuit perform traditional songs and dances. We also bring gifts such as traditional carvings and T-shirts we have had made that have printed on the front 'From the Land of the North Star to the Land of the Star of David.'

"We printed over 500 of the T-shirts. Inuit are proudly wearing them all over the north. We just have a few left."

Rev. Armbruster says the Inuit feel a close affinity with the Jewish people and their exile, abandonment and successful quest for self-determination and a Jewish homeland. (There are only 27,500 Inuit, he notes, a people small in number like the Jews.)

In turn, Israelis are fascinated to meet people whose ancestors have survived for thousands of years in a harsh, cold climate, he said.

On the January tour, one of the participants will be Tagak Curley, whom Rev. Armbruster describes as "the founding father" of the Inuit Brotherhood – also known as the Inuit Tapirisat of Canada, the Inuit's first collective voice when it began in 1971 – and the founding father of Nunavut itself.

Rev. Armbruster says 32 people went on the first tour, and both the second and third had about 20 participants each. He expects about 30 on the upcoming trip.

Participants pay $2,800 and, Rev. Armbruster says, they are enthusiastic shoppers in Israel.

"They spent hundreds of dollars on necklaces, rings with Stars of David and other mementoes," he says. "They patronize the souvenir shops at every hotel we stay at and spend close to the maximum amount they are allowed."

Hamilton CMDA chapter buys ambulance for Israel

By PHYLLIS SHRAGGE
Hamilton Correspondent

HAMILTON — The local chapter of Canadian Magen David Adom (CMDA) raised more than enough funds to purchase an ambulance for Israel, says Hilda Rosen, who led the campaign.

With the acceleration of suicide bombings, the need for ambulances has been strikingly apparent, Rosen said in an interview. As people witness the aftermath of the bombings on television, they want to help in a concrete way.

"People were excited to contribute. During the entire campaign, very few people said no."

More than $85,000 was raised in the 2002 campaign, Rosen said. An ambulance was purchased for $81,500, and the balance will go towards emergency medical equipment.

"I want people to know how much we appreciate the outpouring of support during the ambulance campaign," Rosen said.

Edna Miller of Hamilton donated funds to purchase a second ambulance on her own, in memory of her parents and her brother.

Rosen praised those who participated in the UJA Federation's walkathon, which raised more than $17,800, all of which was passed on to the CMDA ambulance campaign. She pointed out that funds donated directly to UJA during the regular and emergency campaigns were not diverted to CMDA.

She also praised former Hamilton resident, Jane Willinger, who single-handedly campaigned in St. Catharines, raising $8,759.

Among those who donated to the ambulance campaign were teenage brothers, Sam and Jason Charvet of Burlington, who donated $500 out of their tzedakah gelt, Rosen said.

In addition, she said, "non-Jews were very generous. One person gave $5,000."

This is the third ambulance Rosen has worked to help purchase. Her commitment to raising funds for this purpose began in the early 1980s when she was a volunteer for Hamilton Supporters of Israel. In consecutive years, the organization purchased an ambulance and then a blood mobile.

Two years ago, she received a call from Israel pleading for her assistance in raising funds for another ambulance. She canvassed entirely on her own, and in three weeks, raised sufficient funds.

"My phone was ringing morning, noon and night during that time," Rosen said.

Then in January, she received a call from Toronto asking her to begin another ambulance campaign. "They begged me for help."

As chair of the Hamilton branch of CMDA, she and about eight volunteers worked tirelessly canvassing people in the community.

"I made a rule for myself that not one night would go by, other than Friday and Saturday, without raising money."

The ambulance was purchased in the United States and shipped to Montreal. From there, it will be shipped to Israel. On the doors of the ambulance are the words: "Presented by the people of Hamilton and area with much love to the people of Israel."

Rosen said the ambulance donated by Hamilton in the 1980s was seen on television news in Canada.

"When this one gets to Israel, they will let us know where it is stationed, its licence number and the ambulance number. Hopefully if we see it, it will be in service for peace, not war."

An honest assessment of terrorism

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

"The people who carry out suicide bombings are not martyrs, they're war criminals, and so are the people who help to plan such attacks. The scale and systematic nature of these attacks set them apart from other abuses committed in times of conflict. They clearly fall under the category of crimes against humanity."

Kenneth Roth, the executive director of Human Rights Watch, made this pronouncement as part of a 170-page Human Rights Watch report called, "Erased in a Moment: Suicide Bombing Attacks against Israeli Civilians," (Nov. 1). The report attracted substantial Canadian media attention. Michael Colton (CBC Radio), Paul Workman (CBC "The National"), Mitch Potter (Toronto Star), and Peter Goodspeed (National Post) all commented.

Mitch Potter (Nov. 1) called the report "scathing" in its indictment of those who plan and direct the massacres of Israel civilians, citing Sheikh Ahmed Yassin and Khalid Mish'al, the leaders of Hamas and Islamic Jihad respectively, as well as the leaders of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP).

However, while noting that Palestinian Authority (PA) President Yasser Arafat and senior PA leaders bear political and moral responsibility for not preventing terrorist attacks against Israelis, Human Rights Watch stopped short of acknowledging mounting evidence of their direct involvement in planning, funding and ordering such attacks. For example, the story of Arafat's responsibility for the attempted smuggling of thousands of tons of heavy weapons aboard the ship Karine-A remains to be told.

Some Israelis complained about this, yet many Israelis were relieved that a respected human rights organization finally spoke at length about the heinous criminality of suicide bombings.

Other Israeli analysts asked whether the Human Rights Watch report might affect how the media deal with the phenomenon of suicide bombings. The practice of having Hamas officials justify terrorist attacks as "resistance to occupation" each time terrorists strike should be laid to rest, they said. These assertions are lies on two levels. First, when Israel's opponents use the term "occupation," they are not referring to the West Bank and Gaza Strip (as audiences might assume) but to all of Israel, which they want to see destroyed. Second, slaughtering innocent men, women and children as a matter of predetermined policy can never be described as resistance.

While the Globe and Mail did not deal with the Human Rights Watch study, its Mideast correspondent Paul Adams reported on Nov. 5 about a 76-page Amnesty International study, "Shielded from Scrutiny: IDF violations in Jenin and Nablus." Amnesty charges that the Israeli army committed war crimes during its Operation Defensive Shield last spring. Israeli officials angrily denied the allegation, charging in turn that Amnesty ignored the reasons for the military response – a horrific wave of terrorist attacks – and also ignored how much the army put its own soldiers at risk (with 23 fatalities in Jenin) so as to minimize the loss of innocent Palestinian civilians.

In contrast to Amnesty's one-sidedness, the Human Rights Watch report, whatever its shortcomings, is forthright in at long last coming to terms with the unrelenting terrorism Israelis face.

Paul Michaels is director of communications of the Canada-Israel Committee.

Dr. Perlmutter puts down drill after more than 50 years

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

After more than 50 years in dentistry, Dr. Gordon Perlmutter is putting away his drill, scaler and syringes.

"But not quite," says his daughter Dr. Sharon Perlmutter, who is also a dentist and a community volunteer.

"My father still comes into the office every day when he is in town. He checks the mail and does some administrative tasks."

Born in Sarny, Poland, Gordon came with his family to Canada when he was three month old. As a student at Harbord Collegiate Institute, he worked in his parents' bakery, Home Bread Bakery at 630 College St., decorating cakes and delivering the baked goods on his bicycle.

In 1948, Gordon's parents sold Home Bread and bought the Flip Glen Bakery at Dufferin Street and Glencairn Avenue. Gordon continued to work part time in the bakery while attending University of Toronto's dental school.

After graduation in 1950, he established a practice above his father's bakery and continued his studies at U of T, University of Michigan and Tufts University in Boston. He received fellowships and awards in both Canada and the United States.

He worked in the area for more than 40 years. When Sharon graduated dentistry 13 years ago, father and daughter moved to larger facilities at Glencairn and Bathurst.

Throughout his career, Gordon has served as a volunteer dental practitioner. After graduation, he treated children at the residence of the Loyal True Blue and Orange Home for Orphans. He has also volunteered at Mount Sinai Hospital for two years, the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care for 30 years and treated public school children at North York's Public Health Dental Department for eight years.

Along with his practice, Gordon has served in the community for many years. To name but a few positions he has held, he served as president of the North Toronto District Dental Society, president of the Toronto Academy of Dentistry, president of the Toronto alumni chapter of Alpha Omega Dental Fraternity and president of Alpha Omega International Dental Fraternity, a position only four other Canadians have held.

Gordon has also volunteered for United Jewish Appeal, going on missions to Washington, D.C., and Israel, and raised funds for dental schools in the Jewish state.

Today, he and his wife Estelle spend four months in Florida each winter. When in Toronto, he attends services at Beth Tzedec Synagogue, where he has been a member for more than 40 years.

In an interview, Gordon said, "I am grateful for the many friends who shared my activities over the years. I've had 19 associates, and they have all remained friends. Sharon is my 20th."

> 'Everything he did for community was like doing it for his extended family'

In a separate interview, Sharon said her father was very committed to his profession. He was so committed, in fact, that "as kids, we often complained that our father was too busy."

But she said she is realizing more and more how loved and admired her father is by his patients and members of the community.

"Now, when we see his accomplishments, we realize that everything he did for the community was like doing it for his extended family.

"The greatest compliment to me is when former patients of my father tell me that I must be good because my father, who has high standards, allowed me to take care of his patients.

"And wherever I travel throughout the world, when they hear the name Dr. Gordon Perlmutter of Toronto, they welcome me with open arms and tell me how my father touched them.

"[Their] only complaint is that I don't tell jokes the way my father does – particularly in Yiddish," Sharon said with a chuckle.

Today, the Perlmutters have three children – Phillip, Sharon and Nanci (Soicher), and four grandchildren.

Of all his lifetime achievements, Gordon says his family is most important.

JNF mission to Israel

Twenty-nine participants from across Canada recently returned from a Jewish National Fund of Canada President's Solidarity Mission to Israel. As well as visiting locations around the country that have been the object of recent terrorist activities, visits took place with victims of terror and their families. The lonely task of individuals in Israel's armed forces was highlighted by the border patrol officer who requested photos to post in their barracks. He expressed gratitude to the Canadian group for taking the time to come to visit with them. Seen here are mission participants with Natan Sharansky (front right of centre).

Rabbi's new book shows Midrash still relevant today

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Wilfred Shuchat, who has taught Midrash to hundreds of people at Congregation Shaar Hashomayim over a career that has spanned more than 56 years, has just published what may rightfully be called his magnum opus.

The Creation According to the Midrash Rabbah (Devorah Publishing) is a volume that makes the Midrash accessible to both laypeople and clergy. It combines the original Hebrew text, a comprehensive translation in contemporary English, a summary of traditional commentaries from divergent texts and Rabbi Shuchat's own "seed thoughts," or reinterpretations.

The 82-year-old rabbi, who is now rabbi emeritus of his synagogue, can count among his former students Washington Post columnist Charles Krauthammer and real estate and publishing magnate Mortimer Zuckerman.

Former student Zuckerman, editor-in-chief of U.S. News & World Report and chair of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, has provided this endorsement of the book: "This is a brilliant and humane book that speaks to new generations that seek Judaism to add meaning and significance to their lives. If, as the author, Rabbi Shuchat says, 'The spiritual appetite grows with spiritual eating' then this book is a feast that will add spiritual weight to its readers."

Rabbi Shuchat says he became interested in Midrash very early in his rabbinic career, which began after his ordination from the Jewish Theological Seminary in 1945.

About 20 years ago, he began to look at the Midrash in a systematic way, studying the Midrash Rabbah on a daily basis.

"The experience with Midrash has been for me the greatest form of spiritual enjoyment," he says.

But he realized that, to be broadly accessible, Midrash requires much more than translation.

As he says in the introduction, it "requires rendering so that the arguments flow gently and meaningfully from one sage to another," as well as interpretation.

Midrash is as relevant to Jews today as it was at the time it was written, he says. "The rabbis tried to show that Judaism spoke to their generation. That is how I understand Midrash. We should try to do the same thing for ourselves."

He says his "seed thoughts," after every section of Midrash, are an attempt to do this.

Most midrashic passages are somewhat of a riddle, Rabbi Shuchat says. They usually contain an implied question, to which the interpretation responds. A verse is then cited that contains the answer, but normally, the Midrash does not proceed immediately there.

"Having brought forward the verse, it will then, en passant, draw certain conclusions from it, or certain teaching values, that may or may not be related to the immediate question," the rabbi says. "Only after this is done does the midrash then conclude with the answer to its question."

Rabbi Schuchat says Midrash is an important element of Jewish teaching because it is less interested in solving the "problem" of the biblical text and more interested in solving the problem of life. Even the sometimes "fanciful flights" the Midrash takes in interpreting the Bible are a legitimate part of study and, more importantly, a valid approach in the search for meaning in life, Rabbi Shuchat says.

Israel said readying retaliation for attack on Kibbutz Metzer

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Israel Defence Forces will soon respond to Sunday night's terror attack at Kibbutz Metzer in which five people were killed, Israel Radio quoted a senior security official as saying Monday.

The radio report said Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz met early Monday with the heads of all security arms, formulating initial plans for a military response to the attack. Mofaz will bring the plans to Prime Minister Ariel Sharon for review.

Meanwhile, security forces were on high alert Monday afternoon in the Sharon region after receiving a warning that terrorists were planning to penetrate the area and carry out an attack there. Police and Border Police forces were increased on the 1967 Green Line border and roadblocks were set up around the Sharon area and in some towns.

Revital Ohayoun

At Kibbutz Metzer, the five were killed and three people injured late Sunday, when a terrorist infiltrated the kibbutz, just on the Israeli side of the pre-1967 border with the West Bank. The gunman killed two small children in their beds, as well as their mother and two other adults.

The Al Aqsa Brigades of Yasser Arafat's Fatah movement claimed responsibility for the attack in which the terrorist cut through the security fence, gunned down a woman strolling nearby and traded fire with and killed the secretary of the kibbutz, the communal village's most senior official.

The attacker then slipped into a house, killing the children and their mother.

The victims were identified Monday as Revital Ohayoun, 34, her sons Matan, 5, and Noam, 4, Yitzhak Dori, 44, who served as the secretary of the kibbutz, and Tirza Damari, 42, of Eliachin, who had come to the kibbutz for a visit.

The kibbutz, founded by the leftist Hashomer Hatzair movement, was known for its vigorous advocacy of reconciliation with its Arab neighbours and its support for a future peace including an Israeli withdrawal from the West Bank.

The killings came amid reports that the Fatah movement, officials of which had foresworn attacks within Israel proper, was holding meetings with militant Hamas figures for a wider ceasefire within the pre-1967 war borders, known as the Green Line.

Security forces ordered kibbutz residents to remain in their homes all night, with a total blackout imposed as police searched for the attacker. Only after 7 a.m. were residents allowed to leave their homes, after police announced that the gunman had apparently fled the area of the kibbutz, located on the Israeli side of the Green Line, north of the Palestinian city of Tul Karm.

First-aid teams who rushed to the scene of the attack were barred from entering Metzer for more than an hour, by security forces who feared that the terrorists might still be inside the kibbutz.

During the attack, which lasted some 20 minutes, the security co-ordinator at the kibbutz spotted the terrorist and opened fire, but failed to hit him.

Israel police chief Shlomo Aharonisky said Monday that there had been countless warnings of the possibility of such an attack in the area, which is close to a favoured entry point for terrorists en route to attacks in Israel.

Large numbers of police and Border Police, who used flares to light up the area, searched the kibbutz through the night with the help of a helicopter, but by first light, it had been determined that the terrorist or terrorists had escaped.

Defence officials suspect that the shooting may have been carried out by members of the same cell that tried to penetrate Israel near Kibbutz Metzer earlier in the day, in order to carry out a suicide attack.

In that incident, two Palestinians were killed when their car exploded after they were stopped by a Border Police patrol.

"The Palestinian terror machine doesn't miss a beat," said David Baker, an official in Sharon's office, after troops had foiled the attack.

Also Sunday, the army said it arrested a 15-year-old youth from the West Bank city of Nablus on his way to carry out a suicide attack and a senior Hamas member from the West Bank town of Hebron.

The same day, Border Police sappers defused two 160-kilogram explosive devices found in hothouses in the Gaza Strip settlement of Morag.

Early Monday, IDF helicopters fired rockets into a large metal workshop in downtown Gaza City. Israel Radio reported that the workshop was used to manufacture mortar shells. The helicopters shot at least eight rockets into the workshop, which was believed to be empty when the attack took place shortly before 2 a.m.

The IDF has frequently targeted such workshops in the past, which have been used by Palestinian militants to manufacture weapons.

During the initial phase of the two-year-old Palestinian uprising, Israel responded to Palestinian attacks with air strikes. However, under Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, Israel has largely halted the practice and has relied on troops who have reoccupied Palestinian cities and towns in the West Bank for the past several months, carrying out daily arrests of militants.

Zimbabwe Jews consider aliyah

By MOIRA SCHNEIDER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

CAPE TOWN — Zimbabwe's shrinking and mostly elderly Jewish community has been heartened by an offer from the mayor of Ashkelon to assist those who settle in the Israeli coastal city.

Michael Mensky, who heads South Africa's Israel Center, which is associated with the Jewish Agency for Israel and the World Zionist Organization, conveyed the offer and other aliyah options at community gatherings last week in the Zimbabwean cities of Harare and Bulawayo.

Ashkelon Mayor Benny Vaknin learned of the plight of the Zimbabwe community while attending an aliyah fair in South Africa last Passover.

"He said he would take their plight as his own and work as a mayor to enhance their coming to Ashkelon," Mensky said.

Mensky told community leaders that Israel historically has demonstrated its concern for threatened Jewish communities, such as those in Syria, Iraq, Iran, Yemen and Ethiopia, and that Zimbabwe's 600 Jews would be similarly helped.

Over the past several years, black "war veterans" have invaded white-owned farms in Zimbabwe and turned out their owners. Hundreds of thousands of black farm workers and their families also have been thrown out of their homes.

The country's economy has deteriorated into massive unemployment and runaway inflation, and more than 80 per cent of the black population now lives below the poverty line. A long-standing drought has increased the risk of hunger.

Zimbabwean Jews who move to Israel will receive an "absorption basket" of financial benefits, Mensky said. He is lobbying for special recognition for them so that housing allowances, particularly for retirees, may be granted.

"The situation in Zimbabwe seems to be deteriorating, and we suggested to the community that if and when it's time, Israel will be there for them," Mensky said.

It's not clear how many will take Vaknin up on his offer. Some Zimbabwe Jews do not see Israel as a viable option, while others are looking at other destinations and some believe the situation at home will improve, Mensky said.

While most are taking a wait-and-see approach, "in light of what's happening in [Zimbabwe], I think many are taking this offer very seriously,"

Mensky said. "They feel comforted to know that there is some sort of a back-up plan lined up."

An elderly member of the Zimbabwean community, who did not wish to be identified, said Jews in Zimbabwe indeed were considering their options.

"We don't know what's happening. We're in an awkward position – after all, we've been here all our lives and it's not something that we enjoy," he said.

Community members "certainly showed more interest than usual" in the Israeli offer, the man noted. "And although the elderly are the last to want to move, it will be taken up if necessary."

Ivor Davis, past president of the Harare Hebrew Congregation, said Vaknin's offer "went down extremely well.

"For many of us this country has been" a great place "with its splendid climate, friendly people and its opportunities," he said. "For those of us who will leave the country, we shall miss it desperately."

But, he noted, "what has happened to the white farmers and, indeed, to the million of their black farm workers, is perhaps the proverbial writing on the wall."

Mervyn Smith, chairman of the African Jewish Congress, said the Israeli offer was "very generous and very helpful. There's no doubt that the economy and infrastructure has collapsed in Zimbabwe and if we can help Jews settle in Israel, where they will live in safety and comfort, certainly it's to be encouraged in all respects."

Mensky said he had been shocked to see long lines for bread and gasoline in Zimbabwe.

"Jewish homes I went to had no milk or bread," he said. "Basic ingredients" are "very hard to come by."

The many elderly members of the community seem particularly likely candidates for aliyah, Mensky said.

"Those who are of pension age and know that their prospects of growing old in Zimbabwe are very dim would look very seriously at relocating to Israel," he said. "A lot of those I met have children in Israel, and for them to go and spend time near their families is very appealing."

But he acknowledged the difficulties.

"These people come from very large homes, and it basically means giving up everything," he said.

Technology in Israel tries to rebound

By BUZZY GORDON
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

TEL AVIV — In the "good old days" – just two years ago – venture capital conferences were commonplace.

Such conferences were held nearly every month in Silicon Valley in California or Silicon Alley in New York City, and four to six times a year in Israel.

Then came the Nasdaq stock market crash in the fall of 2000, and the outbreak of the Palestinian intifadah in September of the same year.

In Israel, these prolonged parallel crises became known as the "Nasdaq-Nablus effect," and not even the best technology companies in Silicon Wadi, as Israel's technology belt is called, were spared the devastating effects.

Thus, last month's Capital Summit: The Forum on Technology Fundraising at the Tel Aviv Fairgrounds, was, in the vernacular of many of the speakers, an attempt at B2N – back to normal.

But the conference, which was organized by Garage Technology Ventures (GTV) in Silicon Valley, emphasized that even in the current depressed climate, venture capital investment continues – albeit within more rational parameters.

Four hundred people registered for the event, most of whom were entrepreneurs, in a multi-ethnic audience with large numbers of Asians, particularly Indians and Israelis, who have left indelible impressions on the Silicon Valley landscape.

GTV itself is a true reflection of its larger environment: the top executives of the company formerly called Garage.com are of Japanese-American, Israeli and Sikh origin.

One of GTV's Israeli imports is general manager Gideon Marks, who organized a conference panel on international capital.

One surprising conclusion that emerged from that panel is that Israel remains popular among U.S. and global venture capital funds, in spite of the violence that plagues the region.

"I am bullish on Israel," declared Lip-Bu Tan, chair of Walden International, a leading venture capital firm, which maintains a permanent office in Herzliya.

Similar sentiments were echoed by Tim Wilson of Partech International, and Bruce Crocker, who is the Silicon Valley representative of Israel's largest venture capital fund, Pitango (formerly Polaris), which has invested in local companies that have expanded to the North American market.

"Israel, with its tight network formed in the military, is still quite entrepreneurial, and we continue to invest – although now we are seeing more repeat entrepreneurs than before," Crocker said.

Crocker is one of a number of California representatives of leading Israeli venture capital funds.

The latest figures from Israel bear out the experts' assessments. An Israel Venture Capital survey shows that 92 private Israeli companies raised a total of $266 million (US) in the third quarter of this year from local and foreign investors. Moreover, more than half of this sum, $148 million (US), was raised from entities that were not Israeli venture capital funds.

Most importantly, the $1.2 billion (US) invested in Israeli high-tech companies to date in 2002 is higher than the amount invested in 1999. Software and the life sciences have become the most attractive sectors for investment, displacing the Internet.

And while it is no secret that Israel has suffered from the reluctance of foreign business representatives to visit – especially in view of the U.S. State Department's travel advisory – there are signs of a thaw on that front.

For example, Israeli media reported, a delegation from Korea's largest cellular provider, SK Teletech, recently came to identify joint venture and investment opportunities.

Egypt airs TV series based on Protocols

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

CAIRO — Ignoring a U.S. request to block its broadcast, Egypt aired on state television last Thursday the first episode of a TV series based on an anti-Semitic tract, the Protocols of the Elders of Zion.

The Protocols, from the early 20th century, purport to be the plot of a secret group of Jewish leaders to take over the world. But historians have long dismissed the writings as a forgery concocted by Czar Nicholas II's secret police to blame Russia's problems on the Jews.

In the Egyptian TV series, Horseman Without a Horse, the serial's hero, a journalist played by Mohammed Sobhi, tries to find out if the Protocols are true.

The U.S. State Department asked Egypt not to telecast the series. "At a time when the Egyptian government is working to promote peace in the region, a program that promotes hatred would be extremely unfortunate and counterproductive," said Anne Marks, a State Department spokesperson.

But Egypt's Information Minister Safwat el-Sherif denied that the series contained anti-Semitic material, and government spokesman Nabil Osman said in a statement that the program should not be judged before it's aired.

"Prejudging a work of art, a dramatic series, before seeing the actual production is simply an immature, unintelligent attitude," Osman said. Any criticism before that, he added, "amounts to a kind of intellectual and emotional terrorism."

The first episode of the 40-part series began with a narration by Sobhi as he and scores of others, looking dishevelled and exhausted, walked through a desert in the aftermath of Israel's 1948 creation on what was once Palestine.

"The armies of the free have been defeated by treachery," he said in a deep and sombre voice. "Beloved Palestine is lost, grabbed by Zion's sons through organized plundering."

Diaspora Jewish groups have also condemned Horseman Without a Horse, calling it anti-Semitic. Forty-six members of the U.S. Congress sent a letter last Monday to Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak expressing their concern about the program.

Sobhi, the show's star and producer, said last Monday he agreed that the protocols were a forgery and argued that only a small portion of the series is based on the work. The series is based on the diaries of real-life Egyptian journalist Hafez Neguib, played by Sobhi – though biographers of Naguib say the diaries never deal with the Protocols.

The series is running on Dream TV, which is owned by a private Egyptian television company, and on government-owned Egypt-TV during the holy month of Ramadan.

After expressing its concern about the airing of the show, the U.S. State Department said it will monitor it to determine whether it contains anti-Semitic material.

U.S. officials will be "conveying our disappointment to the Egyptian government" if content deemed anti-Semitic is found, State Department Gregg Sullivan spokesperson said.

SEARCH for HEAD OF SCHOOL
Greenfield Hebrew Academy - Atlanta, Georgia

The Katherine and Jacob Greenfield Hebrew Academy, a 50-year-old, PK-8, Jewish community day school in north Atlanta, seeks a head of school to begin work July 1, 2003. The head of school reports to the board of trustees and oversees the work of some 100 faculty and staff and the education of 550 students.

As Atlanta's first day school, it has a long tradition of educational excellence and of service to Atlanta's entire Jewish community. Within recent years, GHA has been awarded the Jerusalem Prize by the World Zionist Organization and also twice named a Blue Ribbon School of Excellence.

GHA's mission is to provide Jewish students an outstanding Jewish day school education, integrating Judaic and general studies in a traditional curriculum that is both challenging and stimulating.

GHA's handsome and secure 18-acre campus in north Atlanta includes athletic fields, terraces, playgrounds, and 118,000 square feet under roof, all dramatically built into and around a series of ravines. Facilities are outstanding.

Currently, GHA is poised to move to its next level, at which the school's many strengths can be consolidated into a focused, highly effective, and well-established institution of education (both general and Judaic). The school's next head will have the pleasure and privilege of working the transformation, in the context of the school's rich traditions.

The Academy requests both applications and nominations, which may be sent to:

Eliot Arnovitz and Shelley Cooper
GHA Search Committee Co-chairs
c/o Fitzgerald + CO.
3060 Peachtree Road
Atlanta, GA 30305

Applications consist of a resume and a letter of interest explaining how the individual's experience, skills and interests correspond to the leadership statement (available in response to e-mail request). Applications received after December 18, 2002, when the search committee begins its candidate review, cannot be guaranteed full attention. The search is confidential.

Nominations may be sent by e-mail to eliot@arnovitz.com or rscooper@attbi.com

Israel must exploit positive military trends

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Commentary

In his first year in office, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon did not present the annual National Security Council assessment to his cabinet ministers or hold a discussion on it because he found its recommendations unacceptable.

But this year, Sharon found the time to present the intelligence assessment. The custom is for the prime minister to go through the document with the army's chief of staff and discuss it with the defence minister before the head of the research division in military intelligence presents it to the cabinet. Afterward, the director of military intelligence sums up. In the second stage, the representatives of the Mossad espionage agency and of the Shin Bet security service present the position of their organizations, and a discussion is held.

On the eve of the current political crisis, the ministers heard the surveys of the research division and of the director of military intelligence. But there was no discussion and it is doubtful that one will occur in the wake of the decision to call early elections.

Usually, the assessment focuses mainly on the list of threats and dangers facing Israel. This year's appraisal is balanced between the negative elements and positive trends. The research division spoke of five factors that could shape the future of the region. The main threats are: a network of rockets in the north that Hezbollah established with the aid of Syria and Iran, the nuclearization of the region combined with a growing number of missiles, and projected severe demographic and economic trends.

> 'Israel is not alone in the struggle against terrorism and weapons of mass destruction'

The attempt to establish a Palestinian state as part of the Oslo process, called the "old order," failed. The way to a Palestinian state is through outside assistance, mainly from the United States, within the framework of the "new order." Although this is not stated explicitly, it is clear the military believes bringing about the collapse of the Palestinian Authority will generate heightened terrorism.

What was different about this year's assessment was the approach of the director of military intelligence, Maj.- Gen. Aharon Farkash-Ze'evi, who chose to concentrate on the positive aspects as though to tell the ministers that despite the current difficulties, we should not ignore developments that are in Israel's favour. Ten positive aspects at the strategic level were noted:

• Egypt and Jordan continue to view the peace agreements with Israel as a strategic asset.

• There is no military coalition threatening Israel and the Arab states are aware of Israel's military superiority.

• The United States' friendship with Israel is unshaken and Americans are unequivocally committed to Israel's security.

• Israel is not alone in the struggle against terrorism and weapons of mass destruction, and if the United States succeeds in its war against Iraq, these positive trends will be intensified.

• Pragmatic states in the region understand that terrorism is a threat to their regimes and to the stability of the entire region.

• There is a thrust toward change in the Arab world – as reflected in the Saudi peace initiative – which is inclined to recognize the State of Israel.

• There is a growing trend in Europe to impose restrictions on organizations that support terrorism.

• There is growing opposition in the Arab world, including among clerics, to suicide bombers.

• The pragmatists in Iran, while not opposed to their country's development of nuclear weapons, are demanding an end to the export of the "Iranian revolution."

• There is growing recognition among the Palestinians that the current confrontation is not a popular uprising but an armed struggle that they have lost and that they must assume responsibility for a change of direction.

Maj.-Gen. Farkash provides a comprehensive look at the landscape that is visible from the Israeli window. But rather than lull Israel into complacency, this assessment must be seen as an opportunity to exploit these positive trends.

The Week in Israel

Nov. 4

• Two people were killed and scores injured by a Palestinian suicide bomber at a shopping centre in Kfar Saba.

• Amnesty International released a report accusing Israel of committing war crimes in Jenin and Nablus during its anti-terrorist campaign last spring. Israel rejected the accusations, saying its actions there were in self-defence against a terrorist infrastructure that had deliberately embedded itself in the heart of a civilian population.

Nov. 5

• Police nabbed a suspected Palestinian suicide bomber near Ben-Gurion Airport. Several Palestinians suspected of aiding him were also arrested.

Nov. 6

• Former prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu was sworn in as foreign minister in the Sharon-led minority government.

• A Palestinian worker shot and killed Amos Sa'adah, 52, and Asaf Tsafira, 18, of Rafah Yam in southern Gaza.

Nov. 7

• The Israeli army conducted a successful test of a Patriot anti-missile system in the southern Negev.

• Jerusalem mayor Ehud Olmert said he would be seeking a place on the Likud list of candidates for the 16th Knesset and that he would soon announce which of the two candidates for party leader he intends to support.

Nov. 8

• For the first time in months, Palestinian worshippers were given free access to the Temple Mount, with no limitations placed on the age of those allowed to enter the mosque compound. Some 135,000 worshippers were at prayers as Jerusalem police deployed throughout the capital. After the prayers ended, the crowd dispersed without incident.

Bea Arthur onstage: a shock of entertainment

By CARRIE BRODI
Special to The CJN

By the time Jewish sitcom legend Bea Arthur left the hit show Golden Girls in 1992, she'd had enough.

"I started Maude in 1972; I finished Golden Girls in 1992. I really felt as though I had spent the majority of my adult life in that little box," she says.

Before tackling television, Arthur had worked on the New York stage in such major productions as Three Penny Opera, Fiddler on the Roof and Mame. Now in her late-70s, the Tony and Emmy-award winning actress has returned to her roots in a one-woman show that opens in Toronto later this month called Bea Arthur On Broadway: Just Between Friends.

Bea Arthur

Part-career retrospective, part-autobiography, her show, a collaboration with pianist Billy Goldenberg, is a mixture of Broadway songs, personal anecdotes, recipes and comedic bits.

In Toronto to promote the show before a three-week run in Australia, Arthur looks exactly as one might expect: pristine black pantsuit, full makeup and a shock of perfectly teased white hair. Though gently getting older, she hasn't lost her baritone pipes or lofty stance. Nor her candour.

"Tell me about this publication," she asks. Then she adds, "I have absolutely no background [in Judaism]. I don't observe anything at all."

Growing up in a small town outside of New York City during the Depression, Arthur attended a Moravian church school.

"I didn't know anything about anything except that occasionally they'd call me 'Jew baby' or something," she says.

Though she admits she has a respect for Jewish liberalism, study, ethics and morality, her lifelong faith is a dedication to animal rights. As an activist with People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals (PETA), Arthur and other PETA members recently led a demonstration outside of Harrod's in London for the removal of foie gras from their shelves because it is made from the livers of cruelly force-fed ducks and geese. She also wrote a letter to Spanish actor Antonio Banderas asking that he "do something about that terrible bull-fighting."

"Finally I can use my celebrity to do something," she says, "as opposed to Maude who was this political activist that I never was."

Known in the industry as the Joan of Arc of prime-time, Arthur fell into her sitcom role as the sharp-tongued Maude Findlay in 1971, when friend Norman Lear convinced her to do a guest spot on All in the Family, opposite the bigoted Archie Bunker, as Edith's liberal cousin from back east.

Maude was an instant hit and Lear immediately created a show for her that dealt with taboo issues of the day, such as abortion, women's liberation, pornography, political campaigning, race relations and marijuana laws. But at the time, Arthur had no idea of Maude's impact.

"I was thrown into it not realizing the fact that we were breaking ground," she says. "We just took it for granted that everything Norman had us do had to do with social issues."

But her trial-blazing work came at the cost of two failed marriages (one to Jewish director Gene Saks), and less time spent with her two sons, both of whom are adopted.

"I didn't just get the script and go home and learn my lines. I was really trying to turn the sitcom into some kind of an artform," she says. "My God, it was so rewarding, creatively as well as financially. I just wish I'd spent more time with my family, with my husband."

Today's television shows hold little interest for Arthur, though she thinks comedian John Stewart has gotten it right.

"The Daily Show is extraordinary," she says. "It tackles politics and current events in such a brilliant way."

Issues such as censorship – reportedly the reason for the recent firing of talk-show host Bill Maher of Politically Incorrect, who spoke out against U.S. President George W. Bush after Sept. 11 – outrage Arthur.

"You can take what he [Maher] was saying anyway you want," she says. "I mean what Bush says sometimes – I think, wait a minute, this man is in the White House?"

Expect a free-firing, very funny Arthur onstage at the Winter Garden Theatre.

"The show is 90 minutes of something I'm very proud of. It's very entertaining. That's all I ask – that it entertains."

Bea Arthur On Broadway: Just Between Friends runs from Wednesday, Nov. 20 until Sunday, Dec. 8 at the Winter Garden Theatre. For tickets, call TicketMaster at 416-872-5555, or buy them in person at the Elgin-Winter Garden Theatre Box Office at 189 Yonge St.

Luboml Remembered: A trove of photos and artifacts that document the former Jewish community of Luboml, Poland, has been donated to the Library of Congress, where it will be housed permanently as an exhibit in the library's American Folklife Centre.

Aaron Ziegelman, a 74-year-old New York real estate magnate and Luboml native, spent years gathering the photographs, letters, Judaica, maps and other materials. The Library's James Billington praised him for having "kept alive a memory that others sought to destroy."

Michael Grunberger, who heads the Library's Hebraic section, said the Library is working on developing collections about life in eastern Europe. "This is a window into how Jews lived – not how they died, but how they lived," he said.

The materials were also used for a travelling exhibit and a documentary film, Luboml: My Heart Remembers.

BY BILL GLADSTONE

A GOAT FARM NEAR JERUSALEM

Shai Zeltzer, wearing a long, white beard and white apron, brings a sampling of goat cheese to our table at his goat farm in Sataf in the Judean hills, a few kilometres south of Jerusalem.

Many Israelis regularly make the drive through the region's winding hills to buy Zeltzer's cheeses, which have won acclaim in Israel and Europe.

As some members of our party begin tasting his wares, Zeltzer tells us about the special breed of goats he uses on his farm and the various bacterial cultures that give the cheese its epicurean taste. Having received a graduate degree in wild-plant ecology from Hebrew University, the 57-year-old Israeli native collects bacterial strains the way other people collect stamps, coins and baseball cards.

He moved here after the 1973 war, with a herd of goats he had imported from America. "Slowly, we started to make cheese. Nobody knew about making cheese from goats' milk then. Only Arabs used to raise goats, but they didn't really care about them. Goats for them were only a symbol of wealth. It wasn't the production, it was only the prestige."

Zeltzer, who has gone on long treks in search of suitable mating partners for his flock, recounts the history of his distinctive "Anglo-Nubian" goats that are daily taken to graze on the nearby hills. The breed started 4,000 years ago in central Africa, he says, and was exported to Bengal Bay, India, from which it spread throughout Asia.

"In Syria, they called it the Damascus goat. The mark of the goat is the long ears. And it spread through North Africa, where it was called the Nubian goat."

Two hundred years ago, the British zoo acquired some of the goats, and some were taken from England to British Columbia by settlers who began describing them as "Anglo-Nubian." Zeltzer has gone to North America numerous times in search of kids by which to "renew the blood" of his flock, which includes about 150 mothers who are milked twice a day.

"To milk about 150 goats takes about 1½ to two hours," he says. "It's very hard work."

Connoisseurs from around the world visit Zeltzer's farm to procure his cheeses, which are mostly unavailable in local shops and which he does not ship. He purposely keeps production low to maintain a high standard of quality. His farm is part of a growing cottage industry of local fine food production in Israel.

Children especially enjoy visiting the goats in their outdoor pens. The goats, too, seem to display a friendly curiosity towards humans. There is also a nature reserve in the area.

The ancient agricultural village of Sataf is several kilometres south of the Hadassah Medical Centre. Visitors to Zeltzer's farm may notice the large hatbox-shaped Yad Kennedy, the memorial to John F. Kennedy, visible on the crest of a nearby hill, a testament to the enduring friendship between the United States and Israel.

Domaine du Castel Winery: Seventeen kilometres west of Jerusalem is Ramat Raziel, home of the Domaine du Castel Winery, which produces about 100,000 bottles of fine wine each year from grapes grown on 13 hectares of mountainous land. At an average of 700 metres high, the terrain and climate are ideal for grapes, as is the limestone and terra rosa ground.

Since producing its first 50 cases of wine only 10 years ago, this boutique winery has received rave reviews in international wine journals for making a bordeaux wine whose quality is considered very good – surprisingly so for the Middle East.

The wine sells for about $45 a bottle in the United States but is not yet available in Canada. "We're working on it," says a company spokesperson.

On the day I visited, a special crew was dumping crates of grapes into a portable crushing machine to make a kosher wine to be sold in France in three years. As one might expect, the procedure requires specially cleaned machinery and vats, and every step is conducted under close religious supervision.

Winemaking is an ancient pastime in Israel. Its modern revival began at the end of the 19th century, when Baron Edmund de Rothschild established wineries in Zichron Yaakov and Rishon Lezion. Many Israeli wineries welcome visitors in season; for details, visit the Web site www.goisrael.com or contact the Israel Government Tourist Office, 416-964-3784.

90 years of Kash music

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

For Eugene Kash, performing and teaching music are synonymous.

Recognized by many as one of Canada's finest violinists, Kash, 90, says he has learned as much from the great performers as from his teachers.

As a student, he realized the importance of trying "to emulate... the tone and interpretations of the great artists he grew up with, such as Fritz Kreisler and Tascha Heifetz.

"What we learned from observing great artists was that you must always have the technique thoroughly well-established so that you can give free expression to your musical intentions," Kash said in an interview.

Now the Toronto-born violinist, conductor, teacher and broadcaster is being honoured with a concert and reception called Eugene Kash: 90 Years of Music at The Royal Conservatory of Music (RCM) on Nov. 20.

As a child, he said, he first attempted to play the mandolin with a ruler because he had seen klezmer musicians at Toronto weddings performing on violins.

At five-years-old, when he began studying with klezmerist Moshe Spielman, Toronto was another world filled with talented artists and many venues for performers, Kash said.

Six months later, Luigi von Kunits became Kash's mentor for 10 years until he moved to the Curtis Insititute in Philadelphia.

By 1933, Kash was in Europe studying with Otakr Sevcik in Czechoslovakia and Bronislaw Hubermann at the Vienna State Academy of Music.

Kash had no idea Hubermann, who later helped found the Israel Philharmonic, was secretly smuggling musicians out of Europe into Israel.

While abroad, Kash travelled to Pinczow, Poland, to meet his father's parents, brothers and sister. They all died in the Holocaust soon after Kash returned to Canada.

Kash continued his solo career, playing with CBC Orchestras and the Toronto Symphony Orchestra, where several other Jewish violinists were already performing.

In 1942, Kash moved to Ottawa where he produced a series of children's concerts, titled the Magic of Music, which later won the Ohio State Music Award.

In Ottawa, he met Maureen Forrester, considered to be Canada's grande dame of music. They soon married and had five children. Even though the couple later divorced, Kash said that "one of my greatest achievements is my family."

His five children, Paula, Gina, Linda, Suzie and Daniel, are actors and teachers. They all had their bar and bat mitzvahs at Holy Blossom Temple where Kash played his violin on Yom Kippur for many years. The family still gets together often to celebrate holidays and festivities, Kash said.

Throughout the years, the bow-tied musical maestro has never stopped teaching or studying.

The life of a serious musician is always one of sharing what he knows and continuous learning, Kash said.

The organizers of Eugene Kash: 90 Years of Music are asking all former students of the violinist to attend the event, which will feature Kash along with violinist Angelo Calcafuoco, violist Jonathan Craig (a former Kash student) oboist Senya Trubashnik and pianists James Anagnoson and Leslie Kinton. The concert will also feature the chamber group Classical Steel, a trio comprising Denise Williams, soprano; Andre Rouse, steel pan and Nina Shapilsky, piano.

The concert is sponsored by The International Resource Centre for Performing Artists, in collaboration with RCM. For information and tickets, call 416-362-1422.

Selma Hayek plays Frida in one of the finest biopics in years

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Frida Kahlo, the Mexican painter whose talents were belatedly recognized only after her death in 1954, is the subject of Julie Taymor's vibrant, engaging and visually stunning feature film, Frida, now playing at Cineplex Odeon theatres.

Kahlo was a ball of fire, an eccentric, flighty, outspoken and sexually liberated woman whose libertarian views and unconventional behaviour shocked and confounded the deeply conservative Catholic society in which she lived.

The movie, one of the finest biopics in years, traces the trajectory of Kahlo's life from adolescence to womanhood, and from her marriage to left-wing muralist Diego Rivera to her brief affair with Russian revolutionary Leon Trotsky (played by Geoffrey Rush).

In the role of her career, Salma Hayek, the Mexican actress, portrays Kahlo with intelligence, wit and empathy.

As Kahlo aficionados know, a bus accident left her in a body cast and in pain for the rest of her days. Confined to a bed, she found an outlet for self-expression in art, an avocation that drew her into the vortex of Mexico City's bohemian circles.

Kahlo, who inherited an artistic temperament from her father, a German Jewish photographer who settled in Mexico at the turn of the last century, first encountered Rivera when she was a budding artist and brashly asked him for a professional appraisal of her work.

Kahlo being Kahlo, Rivera was immediately struck by her painterly style and enchanted by her natural vivacity.

Taymor portrays Rivera (played brilliantly by the underrated Alfred Molina) as a man with a voracious appetite for life's passions, a person who was the best of friends but the worst of husbands, a hopeless womanizer whose infidelities drove Kahlo to distraction.

Wounded by his philandering, Kahlo sought the company of other men. Yet Kahlo never really left, or stopped loving, Rivera, an altogether charming rascal who aptly described her weird, tortured paintings as "agonized poetry on canvas."

Frida, which evokes the bright colours, lively music and bold architecture of Mexico with effortless ease, is essentially a film about a courageous woman's struggle to overcome a mountain of adversity.

Surmounting physical infirmities, repeated betrayals and a devastating miscarriage, she evolved into a person of significance, a woman in her own right.

Some of the best scenes of this wonderful film take place in New York City, where Rivera works on a Rockefeller Centre commission until it is pulled from under his feet by no less a personage than Nelson Rockefeller (played by Edward Norton).

In Manhattan, Kahlo meekly defers to Rivera, but not without a Kahloesque flourish. When an inquiring reporter asks whether she is a painter, she answers insouciantly, "No, just killing time."

Hayek's effervescent performance, truly a sight to behold, never flags. She is the heart and soul of Frida.

Taymor's direction is faultless, and her stylized use of Kahlo's paintings and of sensual dance routines, puppets and King Kong footage adds much to Frida's mood and texture.

Frida, in short, is the kind of film you revel in and identify with as it magnificently unfolds.

Anti-Semitism greater fear than sexism among women

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Jewish women fear anti-Semitism more than sexism, says a new study by a visiting scholar at the Ontario Institute of Studies in Education (OISE) at the University of Toronto.

Nora Gold, a women's studies professor, writer and former social work professor at McMaster University, undertook the three-year study of Canadian women's experiences with anti-Semitism and sexism with funding from a grant from the Social Science and Humanities Research Council of Canada.

She interviewed a random sample of Canadian Jewish women, she said, who were "clearly frightened by anti-Semitism, and told painful, terrible stories. I was not prepared for how deeply disturbed they would be."

The women found their experiences with sexism and anti-Semitism "alike in the sense that both were insulting, degrading, and painful, and that anyone who challenged sexist or anti-Semitic remarks was made to feel oversensitive," Gold said.

"The difference, however, is that the women felt that sexism, unlike anti-Semitism, is recognized, and to some degree acknowledged within the society at large."

One woman, said Gold, "put sexism and anti-Semitism quite a way apart. She said she could deal with sexism. 'We have a handle on it, a little bit of a handle. It's being discussed in the media, it's out in the open. But anti-Semitism, we're still cowering, we're still afraid.'"

Another woman said she felt different emotions when faced with anti-Semitism and sexism. "With anti-Semitism, you feel hurt; it's painful. With a sexist remark, you feel angry.

"There are intellectual arguments you can bring to the table about being a woman. For example, [when competing] for a promotion you can say 'I put in just as many hours. I am just as smart, if not smarter than the man.' You can bring the facts. With anti-Semites, you can't bring the facts," the woman said.

Gold said the women found anti-Semitism to be associated with feelings of helplessness and hopelessness.

"It has been around for thousands of years, and some people think that no matter what, it will continue to be around. It is persistent. They did not feel the same way about sexism."

Sexism is damaging, Gold said. "It is about being exploited and denigrated, but it is not about killing you. The feeling about anti-Semitism is that they want you dead. There has never been a culture that wanted the world free of women. Anti-Semitism can be deeply terrifying."

The implication of the study, she said, is that "we have to fight anti-Semitism with every tool at our disposal, especially if we work with other diverse groups in mainstream culture.

"We have to work together to fight the hate. Social education is important. Anti-Semitism must be put on the anti-racist, anti-oppression agenda."

We are living in bad times, she said, "and certainly what is happening in Israel tends to be an excuse. It fuels anti-Semitism around the world."

In Canada, said Gold, anti-Semitism is subtle, "but it is real and just as pernicious. There are no barriers, but the feelings are still there."

Gold, one of the founders of the New Israel Fund of Canada and the Canadian Friends of Givat Haviva, was brought up on what she calls the "Zionist left" and lived in Israel for six years. She still maintains an apartment there.

"Israel bashing has become a pastime. It is fashionable to be anti-Israel. It's a hard time to be a Jewish student on campus, and it's a frightening time for many Jews around the world," she said.

Gold said she found the study very depressing, adding that one day "I was so furious I came home and smashed my hand into the wall... but I am an optimist and I believe anti-Semitism will be a thing of the past. However, we are nowhere near that. We still have to fight and struggle."

Her way to fight is to get the word out, she said. "We have to develop arguments for when we are encountered [by anti-Semitism]."

330 OBITUARIES

GOLDBERG ABRAHAM "ABE"
Suddenly at Guelph General Hospital on Monday, November 4th, 2002. Abe Goldberg in his 90th year. Beloved husband of Eleanor (Kraus) Goldberg. Loved father of Louise Goldberg (Don Roebuck) of Toronto, Nancy Goldberg (Walter Gabrielson) of Santa Barbara, California and the late Elissa Goldberg. Dear brother of the late Rose, Saul and Ben Goldberg. Abe will be remembered as an athlete having participated in boxing, lacrosse, baseball, basketball, cross-country skiing, golf and curling, fine woodworker of furniture, a tremendous volunteer, a prolific gardener and a wonderful story teller. He served the duration of World War II with the Canadian Army, following which he assisted with federal trade missions in the textile industry. Abe was a charter member and Past-President of the Wellington Men's Club. He was a member of Waverley Lodge No. 361 A.F. & A.M. G.R.C., a 32 Degree member of the Scottish Rite and the Guelph & District Shrine Club.
Services were held at Beth Isaiah Synagogue (Dublin & Surrey Streets), Guelph on Wednesday November 6th at 1:30 p.m., with Cantor Haskell Bahar officiating. Interment Beth Isaiah Section of Woodlawn Cemetery. Memorial contributions to the Canadian Cancer Society, Heart & Stroke Foundation or the charity of your choice would be appreciated. Arrangements entrusted to the GILCHRIST CHAPEL-McIntyre & Wilkie Funeral Home, One Delhi St., Guelph (519-824-0031).

Beth Torah celebrates 40th anniversary

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Beth Torah Congregation recently celebrated its 40th anniversary with a gala dinner at the synagogue, near Lawrence Avenue and Dufferin Street.

The celebration honoured its founding members and welcomed its new members.

Jack Hauer, founding president of the congregation, said that as he looks back to the humble beginnings of the congregation, he is "overwhelmed by our great accomplishments."

The first High Holy Day services were held in 1962 in a vacant factory on Lawrence Avenue, and an active brotherhood and sisterhood were formed.

The congregation set up a temporary sanctuary and meeting room in a portable, and the synagogue building was constructed in 1965.

"It is only with the enthusiasm, the understanding spirit, and the confidence that our founders entrusted in our neighbours, members and friends, that our congregation progressed in spite of great financial hardships. We are now able to enjoy the comfort and warmth of our beautiful synagogue."

Over the years, many of the original members moved away from the area "but very few have left our synagogue," he said.

Speaking of the influx of young families, Hauer said, "It is gratifying to me to see so many of our young members involved in the leadership of the congregation because without youth there can be no continuity, and all the efforts of our founders would be lost."

Synagogue president, Shawn Goldenberg, son of founding members, Esther and Mark Goldenberg who served as the second president, announced that the congregation has gained 113 new members in the past two years.

"Today, we welcome third and fourth generations of the founding members," he says.

MC for the evening, Gordon Fenwick, whose parents Reuben and Florence Fenwick were also founding members, had a little story about each of the founding members at the dinner.

Rabbi Yossi Sapirman told the founders, "We stand in awe of your vision, dedication and commitment."

He added that the enthusiasm and energy of youth is blended with the wisdom and accomplishments of the past."They will forge the Jewish personality of the future."

Donna Goldenberg, second vice- president of the congregation, chaired the dinner committee.

Other executive members include first vice president, Eva Zimmerman, secretary, Nathan Naymark, and treasurer, Isaac Lallouz.

History, golf, trains or canoes – your choice in Virginia

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Historic northern Virginia's Prince William County – a 30-minute drive from Washington, D.C., off Interstate 95 – is a mecca for golfers.

The county, with its three major towns, Manassas, Occoquan and Woodbridge, has 10 public championship golf courses of 18 holes or more on beautiful landscapes, some overlooking the Potomac River or the Bull Run Mountains; one overlooks a former dairy farm.

At Broad Run Country Club, novices and golf enthusiasts alike can try their hand at the nine-hole course, practise at the driving range or play miniature golf.

If golf isn't for you, there is plenty of sightseeing to do in the unique county's towns.

Old Town Manassas, once known as Manassas Junction was a small hamlet where rail lines crossed, making it a strategic area during the Civil War. The Confederate Army of the South and the Union Army of the North met in Manassas for the first major Civil War battle on July 21, 1861. The Union's soldiers marched into battle, whereas the Confederates took advantage of the railway – which could be why they won!

A second battle took place in Manassas on Aug. 28, 1862, when 24,000 soldiers were wounded or killed.

Visitors can go to Manassas National Battlefield Park and have a historic guided tour. On view at the visitors' centre, is a gut-wrenching documentary, Manassas – The End of Innocence, narrated by actor Richard Dreyfuss.

There are a number of galleries and museums in Manassas including the Manassas Museum.

Next door is the Old Southern Railway Station Depot, which transports commuters aboard Amtrak and the Virginia Railway Express. Riding the rails is still important in Manassas. In fact, the town celebrates its railway heritage with an annual festival held in June that attracts 50,000 train buffs.

The downtown area has had a facelift in recent years, and many attractive storefronts house antique and gift shops.

Vietnam War photographer Chuck Colgan Jr. founded The Freedom Museum at Manassas Regional Airport, where the memorabilia and photo galleries tell the story of America's 20th-century wars and the country's current war on terror.

Occoquan is a former mill town. Its sad past includes a fire at the turn of the 20th century and an earthquake in the 1970s that destroyed many of the town's structures, tragedies that have led many to believe the buildings that are now mostly gift and antique shops are haunted. Capitalising on this, the Occoquan Merchants Association offers evening candlelight ghost tours.

Occoquan's history dating back to 1734 can be learned at tiny Mill House Museum.

The town also plays host to the historic Occoquan Arts and Crafts Show, held annually in June and September.

If are in Occoquan during morning rush hour, you'll come across "slug lines" – lines of people standing on street corners, waiting for a free ride from a stranger who wants to have an extra person in the car, in order to take advantage of the faster carpool lanes of the area's freeways.

Not far from Occoquan is Woodbridge, home to Virginia's biggest attraction – the Potomac Mills Value-Outlet Mall, with 220 boutiques and department stores, including Royal Doultoun, Disney and Off 5th – Saks, 5th Avenue, to name a few.

There are several moderately priced standard American hotel and motel chains in Woodbridge, in addition to Virginia's own small hotel chain, the Wytestone Suites – each with a spacious living room, bedroom and kitchenette.

Another attraction in the county is Leesylvania State Park across the Potomac River from Maryland. Henry Lee, father of Revolutionary War hero Light Horse Harry Lee and grandfather of Civil War Confederate general Robert E. Lee, built a plantation home there 240 years ago. Unfortunately, it has long since been destroyed, but it is great place to hike or walk on the beach. Guided group canoe trips can be booked at the park.

For more information, call the Prince William County/Manassas Convention & Visitors Bureau at 1-800-432-1792 or online at www.visitpwc.com.

Here's a one-question quiz to test your knowledge of the land down under.

The favourite sport in Australia is: soccer, swimming, cricket, football, crocodile wrestling.

With apologies to Steve Irwin, the khaki-wearing, reptile-wrestling guy, the most popular sport in the land o' plenty is Australian rules football, by a country mile.

Melbourne alone supports eight professional teams, half the complement of the Pro League, and there are numerous minor leagues and amateur teams throughout the country, says Joshua Sharp, a 24-year-old Australian working in Canada.

When rivals from Melbourne meet in a big game, crowds of 80,000 are common. The Grand Final championship attracts as many as 100,000 spectators, says Sharp.

More than a mere football dilettante who talks a good game, Sharp is a player, a member of Ajax, a Jewish club in Melbourne that sports a Star of David on its "jumper" and has won the championship in D Division of Australian club football.

Sharp has been living in Toronto for a little over four months, holding a working visa and toiling for TD Securities in the area of finance. He's also been playing Australian rules football in the Ontario Australian Football League, an eight-team southern Ontario circuit that recently wrapped up its season. Sharp, a defensive player, helped propel the Toronto Downtown Dingos to a spot in the title game versus the perennial champions, the Toronto Eagles.

Unfortunately, the Dingos started slowly and watched as the unbeaten (in regular season play) Eagles humbled the downtown upstarts. The final score: Eagles 15.11.101; Dingos 5.9.39.

Translated into Canadian, that reads 15 six-point "goals" for the Eagles plus 11 one-point "behinds" for a total of 101, versus Dingos' five goals and nine singles for 39 points. Goals are scored by kicking the ball through the other team's uprights. Behinds are scored by kicking the ball over the behind posts in the corners of the field.

The loss was an emotional come-down for the second-place Dingos, which had beaten the Eagles in the first playoff round. But in the rematch, the Eagles clicked on all cylinders and were so far ahead of the Dingos by half-time that their 39-point second half offensive outburst could not narrow the gap.

Sharp could not explain why the Dingos were so flat in the final game, but he admits "it was very disappointing."

Teammate Jacob Steinberg, 38, thinks the Dingos might have caught the Eagles by surprise in the semi-final. "We just stunned them. The team was so motivated, so pumped."

Having beaten their season-long nemesis in the semi-final, the thinking goes, the Dingos were a little in awe in the title match.

Teammates who enjoyed the weekly practices and the post-practice shmoozefest at the Sport Cafe, Sharp and Steinberg come to the sport from very different backgrounds. Sharp, of course, grew up with the game. Steinberg, for his part, adopted it only recently. Steinberg, who describes himself as half Dutch and half Israeli, lived in Australia for a time and used to attend the home games of West Freemantle, a team near Perth. "It's the game in town. I used to like it," he said.

Soccer was his game while growing up in Israel, but in recent years he turned to Aussie football because "I wanted to play something I never played."

Teammates Joshua Sharp (left) and Jacob Steinberg were members of the Downtown Dingos, which advanced to the finals of the Aussie rules football league.

He called the Dingos and they invited him to a tryout. Steinberg began a running program to get himself back into shape and he practised with the team for a month and a half during pre-season at their field near St. Clair and Yonge. He fully expected that as a rookie, he'd ride the bench, but was pleasantly surprised to get the call to play in almost all games.

Steinberg loves the sport. Played on an oval field that's generally 150 metres long and 100 metres wide, "it's hard, hard, hard," he says. "I love the contact, the fitness, the camaraderie, the team effort. It's special."

What's more, the fitness level needed to compete goes far beyond that required of soccer players. Although there are 18 guys on the field for each team, "it's all sprints, up and down. There's no end to it" and there's plenty of physical tackling, he said.

Resembling something of a cross between rugby and North American football, the Aussie game allows teams to advance the ball by running (ball carriers must bounce it once every 10 metres), throwing the ball or kicking it to a teammate.

Sharp said he wasn't expecting much when he tried out with the Dingos. "But I've been quite impressed by the competition here. I was expecting something terrible, but it was decent."

Canadians, who've been brought up on hockey, take to Aussie football because "it's a good team sport. It's something new that's a contact sport, and I know Canadians like contact sport."

Sharp, who moved to Toronto in mid season, played in the last six regular season games and the two playoff matches. A third Jewish player, Richard Mintz, played for the Broadview Hawks.

Fighting anti-Semitism: a personal agenda

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

Peruse the following Web site: www.wcotc.com. It is "dedicated to the survival, expansion and advancement of the white race" and is sponsored by the "World Church of the Creator."

Included within the Web site's dollar-store content is a "humour section" with such jokes as: What's the best thing to do before a visit to a Jewish dentist? Count your money before he gives you the gas.

How wicked can people be? How did we learn to torture one another?

The reality that armies of Jew-haters have successfully drafted sufficient support to finance and operate a plethora of Web sites dedicated to verbal slush is not surprising. Those who spew hatred find a multitude of comrades lurking in the smoky alleys of insecurity, waiting to be drafted into their pitiful ranks. How do people get so low?

What the Jewish community needs to consider is, if it is so simple to access such a vast body of anti-Semitism, why don't most Jews try to stem the proliferation of its destructiveness? Would it not be wiser and more responsible to set about collectively fighting this ill, especially in light of our acute awareness of the harm anti-Semitism can cause?

Indeed, Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), B'nai Brith, the Simon Wiesenthal Center, Holocaust centres and some mighty Jewish warriors have fought arduously to battle anti-Semitism on the World Wide Web, in the media and in the political arena. Their task has become far too big, however, and they cannot and should not battle anti-Semitism on their own.

Instead, organizations such as these should also mull over innovative options in which every Jew can play a role, in sync with Maimonides' statement that "it is wrong to consider personal danger when the public welfare is at stake."

One approach might be to develop and facilitate hundreds of grassroots community teams run by small groups with different areas of expertise. The mandate of these teams would be to go into the broader community and fight anti-Semitism and racism through the establishment of grassroots relationships with other minority groups and the development of programs that would ensure a collective response when any minority is attacked.

Our community professionals could develop a blueprint for this operation, but ultimately, as in a franchise, the members would carry out the mission statement and incorporate their task into their personal Jewish agenda.

Teams could include an individual who is adept at inter-community relationships, communications and perhaps administration. Synagogue, day-school and organizational offices could facilitate the team's work, although this could be the shared task of Jewishly owned corporations and businesses.

Some teams may choose to work with local Muslims and Christians to create greater understanding. Others may want to be activists in their own neighbourhood, fighting inequities levelled at their neighbours through anti-Semitic or racist bullying.

Oliver Wendell Holmes once said, "The mind of the bigot is like the pupil of the eye; the more light you pour upon it, the more it will contract."

Hatred seems to be indigenous to creation. Sadly, we have to dedicate much of our energy to fighting it.

Jewish soldiers and activists before us fought long and hard to ensure our freedoms. It is now important that all Jews who are not paralyzed by pain use their assets to change the perception of those on the periphery of hatred and tolerance. We need to do this for our children and for our own self-respect.

The alternative is to allow evil to be cultivated. The blossoms of that flora are ugly and droop agonizingly in our history. No good Jews can be afraid to fight.

About Life

Dear Ella,

My dear friend Melissa is getting more and more crotchety as she gets older.

I first started to notice the negative vibes a few years ago, when she lost her job. At that time, I felt she had a reason to be down, and I was there for her, listening and offering a shoulder to lean on.

That was more than five years ago and she is still leaning! I find myself avoiding her calls. I feel very guilty when I see her number on my call display and don't answer. I'm really not that kind of person. Melissa hates where she lives. She hates where she works and the people she works with. She is sorry she didn't pursue a different career. She's sorry she didn't give her last boyfriend another chance. She hates the way she looks and so on. You get the idea. How can I handle this? I can't go on the way I have been.

Negative Friend

Dear Negative Friend

Letting a close friend lean on you is part of what friendship is all about. However, if there is no good along with the bad, then you've lost the healthy balance that is the key to a successful relationship.

Sometimes people get into a slump, but they are usually able to pull themselves out. However, a five-year slump is a bit excessive. Listening and being there for her week after week and year after year is more than anyone could ask, and you have nothing to feel guilty about.

Melissa may not even realize the burden she has placed on you. Make her aware of how negative your conversations are. Tell her your friendship cannot continue in this fashion and that she has to try to do something to help herself. Be gentle and caring, as she may already be quite fragile. Offer to accompany her to her doctor for an evaluation; she may be depressed, but this is not a diagnosis you or I can make.

In the meantime, you don't have to go on this way. You can feel comfortable knowing that you have taken her as far as you can.

Melissa has to want to feel better and it's up to her to take the steps to get there.

MOUNT SINAI HOSPITAL

The Best Medicine

YOUR HOSPITAL, YOUR NEWS

Making History at Mount Sinai Hospital

Mount Sinai Hospital has received one of the largest private donations in the Hospital's 79-year history from one of Toronto's largest builders and developers. An unrestricted $10 million donation has been made by Joseph and Wolf Lebovic.

"I support many hospitals throughout Toronto," said Joseph Lebovic. "This gift to Mount Sinai is in recognition of its role as a major academic leader providing healthcare to people not only in the GTA but also across southern Ontario and the country. Mount Sinai is both a symbol of excellence in healthcare in this province and also a symbol of the strength of the Jewish community." Mr. Lebovic, who resides in both Stouffville and Toronto, is a former president of the Urban Development Institute of Canada and its Ontario division.

"This is a significant gift toward our Best Medicine campaign," says Lawrence Bloomberg, Chair of Mount Sinai Hospital. "In honour of the Lebovics' support, we will be naming the recently acquired Murray/Orde Street building the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Building."

The Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Building will house patient care centres that will integrate ambulatory clinics with research and translate the findings into enhanced prevention and treatment for patients.

"This $10 million gift is especially important to Mount Sinai because it is instrumental in furthering our vision for world-class excellence in our core program areas," says Hospital President and CEO Joseph Mapa. "This gift has catapulted the Hospital's Best Medicine campaign to $184 million, which is part of a $400 million investment program that will fund the modernization and enhancement of clinical programs and research capabilities at the Hospital."

"The Lebovics have been dedicated supporters of Mount Sinai for more than 18 years," says Mount Sinai Hospital Foundation's President Nicholas Offord. "In 1997, the Hospital opened The Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Centre for Molecular Medicine at the Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute. Capital campaigns with support from donors like the Lebovics, complement government funding and is essential in our quest for delivering the best medicine."

Mr. Lebovic with his father, Harry, and brother, Wolf, established Lebovic Enterprises, which now comprises subsidiary companies involved in residential, commercial, and industrial and housing land development and construction, primarily in the Greater Toronto Area. The Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Foundation has made significant financial contributions to numerous charities including the United Jewish Appeal and University of Waterloo.

Holiday Season Ideas

The Mount Sinai Hospital Auxiliary once again has come up with some great gift giving ideas!

Holiday Greeting Card Program These cards are great for corporations and individuals to send out as Christmas Card greetings, Chanukah greetings, and Holiday good wishes. There are several verses you can select from or you can create your own message. You may imprint your company name and logo or personalize the cards for your private use.

Sharing Secrets Cookbook is the compilation of more than 200 recipes from members of Mount Sinai Hospital Auxiliary and their mothers, daughters, family, and friends. These "secrets" are sure to make any holiday meal a success and are a perfect gift!

The Galaxy of Hope Pins, designed in partnership with Birks Jewelers, is a collection of 18K gold and sterling silver pins in a star shape. These pins are ideal for recognition of achievement, birthdays, Bar and Bat Mitzvahs, Chanukah, Christmas, a token of friendship, and more.

For more information on how to order any of these fantastic holiday ideas contact the Auxiliary at auxiliary@mtsinai.on.ca or 416-586-8290 or order online at www.mtsinai.on.ca/auxiliary

Party gifts in all shapes and sizes

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

There's no danger of running out of gift ideas for all ages. Here are just a few.

Incredible Novelties Inc., says Dan Jankelow (905-881-9900; Web site www.incrediblenovelties.com), are North America's only novelty consultants.

Their mission is to find the most interesting novelties and prizes for you, at the best prices. Jankelow has 350 products online, and about 5,000 at his fingertips.

Incredible Novelties is not a store, with stock they have to sell. Selecting your prizes should be fun, but someone trying to push you to buy an item might make it less so. Moreover, not all store owners will tell you that a competitor might have just the thing you want, even if they know it's true.

Instead, says Jankelow, his company sells quality items directly to you, at competitive prices. They deal with designers and manufacturers, so that they're not beholden to any one supplier. Their business thus depends on offering you the maximum possible variety.

The owners started as DJs and still are, doing bar and bat mitzvahs and some corporate and promotional work. This keeps them in the party circuit, so that along with knowing the supply side of the business, they know what's in demand.

To make things easier, they will come to your home to consult with you. They also have a delivery service to bring your prizes to your party – which not only makes life easier for you, but also lightens the workload of your DJ or MC.

Mirvish Productions (416-872-1212 or 1-800-461-3333), says Young Turner, sell tickets as gifts. They also sell theatre subscriptions, which are like a season ticket, but more expensive. A Mirvish Productions subscription is one way to give long-term support, not just to a particular theatre, but to the theatrical community.

Mirvish Productions owns and represents the Princess of Wales Theatre, where The Lion King is a long-running show, and the Royal Alexandra Theatre, where Mamma Mia is also enjoying a long run. However, the subscription is not for these theatres. The Elgin and Winter Garden Theatre Centre is one venue, the Cannon Theatre another, and there may be others as well.

A subscription covers six shows. Each year in February, there's a campaign to renew subscriptions or acquire new ones for all six, but you can subscribe at any time. The first show, quick-change artist Arturo Bracchetti, has recently finished, so you would now be purchasing tickets for five shows.

Too often these days, nothing gets done unless we specify a time and place. We say to a friend, "Let's get together sometime," then never follow up because we have no set date. Buying a subscription is a great way to set up such a date. And live theatre is always more fun with a friend.

Baron Bedesky describes the mission of Be A Player Authentix (416-961-0976; Web site www.bapauthentix.com) as making authentic hockey memorabilia available to sports fans.

Autograph collecting started among fans who knew and trusted each other. As more and more fans got involved, however, anonymity made trust harder to maintain, and as autographs grew more costly, money tempted people to fake them.

Collectors who make a study of memorabilia, ask the right questions and know whom to trust can often avoid being taken in. Not so the occasional or one-time buyer.

Here's where Be A Player Authentix enters the picture. It's a joint venture with the NHL Players' Association (www.nhlpa.com), which supplies the memorabilia and guarantees their authenticity. Such a guarantee is good for the buyer and the recipient of the gift, and for the good name of the players and the game.

Memorabilia include game-model jerseys not worn in a game, autographed replica jerseys, unsigned jerseys, and framed autographed photos, pucks and gloves. Participating players include Mario Lemieux, Joe Sakic and Mats Sundin, as well as former players like Mike Gartner.

Proceeds from sales go to a charitable organization, Goals and Dreams, which is providing $15 million over five years to grassroots hockey programs across the world – in Canada, Europe, Russia, and even Costa Rica. Funds may be used for anything from used equipment to a new arena.

PARTY PLANNER

Web site offers one-stop party planning

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN

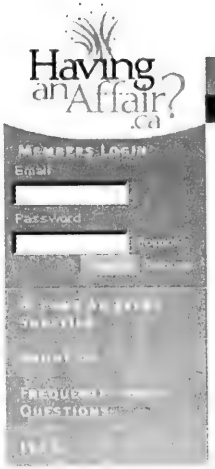
With www.HavingAnAffair.ca, planning an entire party is just a simple click away.

Visitors to the Web site supply the details of their event, such as date, budget, and type of entertainment, facilities and services needed, and HavingAnAffair.ca takes the details to a network of suppliers who then contact them directly.

"It's a total role reversal," says Mark Silver, 28, who founded the site with Aviva Barth and Matthew Shuber.

"Instead of spending hours and hours researching names, calling, and waiting for return calls, they come right to you," he says.



Having An Affair's homepage.

Silver, who has a master of business administration degree from the Schulich School of Business at York University, said he conceived the idea for the site last year while trying to find a restaurant online.

"There wasn't a site to contact where I could find a variety of restaurants. Having been a disc jockey with Universal Sound and Mandell Entertainment, I realized people would also appreciate one site that gave them access to a variety of party planning professionals."

Picking a DJ is a key decision

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

There are many talented, reliable and experienced DJs out there. Picking one for your party isn't a matter of just finding one – you need the one who's right for your special event.

Jordan Zwicker of Beyond Sound Entertainment (416-468-3681; www.beyondsound.ca), and Hershey Glass of Incredible Party Productions (905-770-8184), have some suggestions about how to find your DJ.

Their credentials lend weight to their advice.

Glass was hot on the scene from 1995 to 1998, then left it for a few years. He came back this past August because he missed it, and because his friends asked him to. Zwicker, after 10 years working in Toronto, is expanding Beyond Sound to tap the Vancouver market.

Jordan Zwicker of Beyond Sound Entertainment.

When you call a prospective DJ, Zwicker advises, look for a prompt reply, factual answers to questions, and a professional attitude. If this is the DJ for you, a good rapport should start with the first phone conversation.

Does he guarantee his work, and does he keep his promises? Ask for references and testimonials – Zwicker and Glass both recommend talking to former clients.

Glass suggests making a short list of DJs you think you might like. Then get some dates of events they're working, and go watch them for a half-hour or so each to see how they work.

Go to a function similar to yours, Glass continues. If you're having a bar mitzvah, for example, don't go to a corporate function. A bar mitzvah is more challenging – young people have fewer inhibitions about letting entertainers know they're not cool – and a bar mitzvah has a religious aspect that a DJ must respect.

And, Glass adds, pay close attention to the crowd. It's not mainly a matter of you liking the DJ, but of how well the guests like him.

It will save you time and work, Zwicker says, if your DJ offers a range of services – say, if he has good contacts among live entertainers, or can also work as an MC. However, Zwicker warns against anyone who promises a lot, then fails to deliver. They don't save you any trouble, and they disrupt your planning.

Honesty is crucial, insist both Zwicker and Glass. "It's better to hire a professional who says an honest 'No' to something you want, then delivers on what he says 'Yes' to," Zwicker says. Both DJs also place high value on being well organized.

Rapport is not simply a matter of pleasing your guests, they say. It also means the ability to work well with other professionals working at your party, such as the videographer and party planner.

And from your first phone conversation on, Zwicker says, look for someone who's passionate about what he does: playing music, working with other party professionals and showing your guests a good time.

Find out how many years a DJ has been in business, Zwicker suggests. This is not to put down the newcomer: after all, everyone has to start somewhere. But someone who has been around for a few years will have experience in his favour, and he'll have a reputation, both with clients and colleagues.

But a reputation, says Zwicker, can be lost quickly, as the old cliché holds true: "you're only as good as your last gig." This may be harsh, but it helps keep a professional on his toes.

Book eight to 12 months ahead, Glass urges, just to play it safe. Zwicker recommends eight to 14 months.

Meet face to face soon after you talk on the phone, Zwicker advises. Then have another face-to-face consultation about three months before your party, with interested parties present (say, the bar mitzvah boy), to go over details such as candlelighting.

Glass also recommends at least two face-to-face meetings. The first, soon after you talk on the phone, should lay the groundwork (e.g., about the type of event, time, place, number of guests, and age groups) and establish general expectations. And yes, bring the bar or bat mitzvah along. The second meeting, about two weeks to a month ahead, is to nail down details of speakers, dinner time, candlelighting, etc.

Event organizers, who use the service free of charge, complete a booking request that is then sent to a network of suppliers. If a supplier is interested, they furnish the event organizer with an offer, and the organizer then chooses the offer that interests them.

"It's simple, it's time saving and it's free. What could be better?" says Silver.

The site lets party organizers access about 500 services, including restaurants, disc jockeys, bands, florists and photographers, and requests go out to all of them, says Silver.

"We've already had about 500 people use our services, and at least 100,000 people have accessed the site since it has been launched.

"We have it all: the time-saving advantages of an online service and the personal attention that your event requires. Best of all, there is no obligation to book.

"It's a great entry point to the planning world. People planning their first event get a chance to gauge what is available, and they are able to create a short-list."

Superfly DJs electric

By CARRIE BRODI
Special to The CJN

The key to a good party is the entertainment, say performers and party planners Noah Katz and Ira Pettle.

Both business partners and best friends, Katz and Pettle met at Camp Winnebago 15 years ago, and have been entertaining people ever since.

Now in their mid-twenties, and with six years' experience apprenticing with well-known DJ outfit Mandell Entertainment, they've launched their own company called Superfly Entertainment, which they describe as "dinner theatre meets Studio 54."

Although the company is only two months old, they already have bookings as far in advance as 2005.

What's different about Superfly Entertainment is that it departs from the cookie-cutter DJ fare, they say. Pettle and Katz offer a highly charged, interactive evening of customized entertainment that combines professional dancers, special effects and a female DJ. Her addition leaves Katz and Pettle free to do what they love best – work the room and get everyone onto the dance floor.

The concept is a break from the traditional one person spinning the tunes and interacting with the crowd from behind a set of turntables, or the tired-but-well-loved dances such as Y-M-C-A and the Time Warp. Though there's still some of the familiar in Superfly's repertoire, they work hard to offer people the unexpected and to provide a performance along with the music.

"We're premium entertainers," Pettle says. "We've studied theatre, we're actors in the business, working, rehearsing and putting together a true performance," Katz says.

Even though partygoers loved their work with Mandell Entertainment, Pettle and Katz say they were not creatively fulfilled working there.

"Just because people are happy doesn't mean that you should stop trying to take it to the next level," Pettle says.

Taking it to the next level has meant working with the client months in advance and getting to know the bar or bat mitzvah boy or girl or wedding couple in order to fashion a program specific to the individual/s.

Katz and Pettle have done theme parties about shopping, credit cards, X-Files, Star Trek and Grease. For a recent basketball-themed bar mitzvah, Superfly dancers dressed up as cheerleaders and the bar mitzvah boy and his friends had a dunk-off with a net Pettle and Katz provided. For another party, they concocted a mad scientist storyline to announce the bar mitzvah boy at the top of the night. The response has been electric.

"Everybody is clamouring for something new," Katz says. "The kids and the adults have been to 30 parties a year. They've seen it all before. When something new comes along, it's a breath of fresh air."

Not to say there isn't the expected in a Superfly show; Katz specializes in music popular with the kids, such as rap, hip hop, rhythm and blues and grunge, and Pettle specializes in a more old-school area, appealing to the adults in the room.

"Our goal at every party is to have everybody, from the little kids to the big little kids to the old women with their walkers, shakin' it up!"

If you're interested in booking Superfly, act quickly. Their schedule for 2003 is already 50 per cent full, with calls coming in all the time.

Noah Katz and Ira Pettle of Superfly.

"We're anticipating that in the next three months, our schedule will fill up," Katz says. "If you don't call and book, someone else will."

Both Katz and Pettle have aspirations of being on stage, television and film, so for them, their job is a serious opportunity to get noticed.

"Why not take that moment and make it a serious performance?" Pettle says. "Why not make it an Oscar moment? That's what we do."

You can reach Superfly Entertainment at 416-652-2232.

Ketubot express vibrancy & joy

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
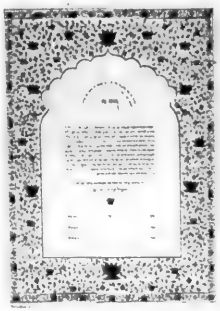
Special to The CJN

Each ketubah (marriage certificate) created by calligraphy artist Karny Rivlin Vorona is infused with grace and strength.

Tel Aviv-born Vorona, who has studied architecture, says her initial experiences in presenting designs for architects sparked her interest in calligraphy. She also credits architecture with training her to pay attention to structure and detail. The beauty springs from within.



She offers clients an extensive selection of traditional and contemporary ketubot.

Working in such media as opaque watercolour, touches of gold leaf, dry pigment and egg yolk mixture, she fashions intricate patterns with which she can express vibrancy, dignity and joy.

She likes to modify white backgrounds, noting, "There is something I do myself to give the appearance of old parchment."

The ketubah is personalized with appropriate symbols such as a Magen David, a menorah, a lion, doves or the seven species with which the land of Israel is blessed — grapes, figs, dates, pomegranates, olives, wheat and barley. She generally inscribes the text in colour to give warmth.

The original ketubot are one-of-a-kind, but the artist is introducing limited edition ketubot that are more affordable yet allow for certain individual options — names of the bridal couple in Hebrew or English, additional gold leaf, text in colour of choice.

Vorona also produces bar and bat mitzvah haftorot. The first was conceived as a surprise for her son.

"The children have studied so long and so hard; they go in front of the congregation with fear and anticipation," she says. "I wanted to give special recognition. It's very meaningful to them. They keep the haftorah in their own room and take it with them when they build their own nest."

A naming certificate by Vorona can be used to welcome a newborn baby.

There are requests, too, for family trees, and here Vorona delves deep into the past. On her wall is an extraordinary example. A sheltering tree, its foliage formed by lettering in shades of green, depicts her lineage dating back to Spain in the year 1572.

Her works have been included in AlphaMark, the association for the Calligraphic Arts juried exhibition that is travelling around the world for two years; The Art of the Book, the Canadian Book Artists and Book Binders Guild juried exhibition, which travelled across Canada; Vision of The Spirit II at the Washington National Cathedral in Washington D.C. and in other solo and group shows.

Make-up and hair for that special occasion

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Many women apply make-up every day. But if you're hosting a simchah or you're the guest of honour at a party, you may want to consider working with a professional make-up artist to look extra special on that special day.

Sherry Michaels (416-449-2188) of Face It is a professional make-up artist who applies make-up for all kinds of occasions. She generally works on location, she says.

"I go to people's houses, synagogues, hair salons. I travel to wherever they have to be."

She begins the make-up process with a consultation several weeks or months before the event.

"People look through my portfolio to see what they like," Michaels says. "It's not about what I like, it's about the type of look they want."

When choosing colours, it's important to match the make-up with the skin tone, she says.

"Not everybody can get away with the colours that they see in a magazine or a picture."

Michaels generally does not try to match the make-up's colours with a specific outfit, except in the case of weddings.

"I'll match up the eye-shadow if the bride is looking for a certain look."

Brides often have to get ready early in the day for pictures, so Michaels will touch up the bride before the ceremony, she says.

Michaels explains that there are various "make-up looks," from sleek and subtle to dramatic. The time of day and type of the simchah generally determines the type of look. She recommends a subtle look for the day and more dramatic make-up for the evening.

For a bat mitzvah, she'll often put on one application for the synagogue celebration and a different look for the evening party. But she stresses that make-up for the bat-mitzvah girl is always subtle and very natural looking.

Face It's make-up stays on all day because of the special foundation they use. In addition to being hypoallergic, their eye make-up is waterproof and can easily withstand the shedding of a few tears, Michaels says.

The only item that must be reapplied is the lipstick. Generally, clients purchase their own. Sometimes Michaels will order the lipstick for them.

She says all her brushes and make-up are sanitized thoroughly between clients.

Aside from simchahs and photo shoots, Michaels also does make-up demonstrations for parties.

"I teach people make-up techniques. It's usually a lot of fun. It's a great thing to do for a shower."

She loves applying make-up for simchahs, she says. "It's always a happy occasion."

There's no question that the make-up for the stars of a simchah has to be fabulous, but so does the hair, one's crowning glory.

Dani Tayfour of Dani's Hair Studio (416-787-4322) will make sure you don't have a bad hair day on the big day – or any other day, for that matter.

"We do a trial hairstyle with brides," Tayfour says. "We get everyone ready for all special occasions. So far, we've scored 10 out of 10. Not one person has been unhappy."

Tayfour opened Dani's Hair Studio at 3381 Bathurst St. (between Lawrence and Wilson Avenues) last winter after working in the vicinity for a number of years.

"Here it's like a family. Everybody's happy, the employees and the customers. We work with all age groups, both men and women. We do everything from colour to perms to cuts and blow-dries."

Make-up by Face It.

Tayfour says bright hair colour is more popular in the summer while people prefer darker hair colour in the fall and winter.

"I do a lot more streaks in the summer. Streaks tend to be more seasonal."

Many people with curly hair prefer straight hair for a special event, Tayfour says.

"You can give people with very curly hair straight hair for that special occasion. We guarantee straight hair the night of the affair, but it has been known to stay straight for up to 10 days."

He stresses that curling irons, which are very safe, should not be confused with flat irons.

"We do it with a blow-drier. We don't use flat irons. A flat iron dries the hair and burns the cuticles."

Up-dos are extremely popular for weddings and bar mitzvahs, Tayfour says.

"For the bat mitzvah girl, we can add curls, beads and sparkles."

Hair by Dani's Hair Studio.

He notes that spiral curls are also very popular for younger girls.

"We curl the hair piece by piece. We use seven different types of curling irons."

He advises older women to consider fancy "up-dos," but he says up-dos are very becoming for both young and older women.

Though perms are not particularly popular these days, Tayfour recommends a body wave for people with fine straight hair to give it some texture and fullness. He also says that fine hair has more texture and volume when it's shorter.

He recommends that people with coarse hair keep it long and well-shaped to avoid a frizzy look.

"The right cut and product will enhance the curl by defining the curl better and giving it a better bounce."

But Tayfour says that these days, the rules for hairstyles, like fashion, are not that rigid.

"Whatever suits you best is fashionable. There are no fast and hard rules for haircuts or colour." Dani's Hair Studio offers one stop shopping for a variety of in-house beauty services, including make-up by make-up artist Marla Baker.

The contemporary bar mitzvah: Or, no you can't wear a red zoot suit

By JANE ULMAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

"No, Jeremy, you cannot wear liberty spikes to your bar mitzvah party," I say, referring to the hairstyle that transforms my son's head into the Statue of Liberty's crown.

"Mom, you don't understand," he says. "Even when I'm 50, I'll be spiking my hair."

Oh, to be adolescent and all-knowing (and optimistic about retaining a full head of hair). And to be burdened with such an antediluvian for a mother.

"OK," he counters, "what if instead of liberty spikes, I wear a red zoot suit?"

Most people think the bar mitzvah is a religious ceremony in which the 13-year-old assumes adult responsibilities according to Jewish law and tradition.

It is.

But it is also a negotiation over liberty spikes and red zoot suits, an opportunity to push the limits and push one's parents' buttons, a struggle from dependence to increasing independence.

In short, it is a rite of passage, a term coined by the Belgian anthropologist Arnold van Gennep in 1909 to mark the tumultuous and crucial transition from childhood to adulthood. A transition which, according to van Gennep, encompasses a separation from society, a transformation and a return to society in a new role.

Clearly, as most parents today would attest, any 13-year-old worth his extra-hold gel should be separated from society. At least until he turns 20.

But instead of banishing our 13-year-old to boot camp, or, even better, the Bermuda Triangle, we Jews induct him into the community with a ritual that is significant and transformative. We confer on him full adult responsibilities as a member of the tribe and shower him with love, acceptance and checks in multiples of $18.

Because, as Judah ben Tema, a second-century rabbi, tells us, "At 13, one is ready for mitzvot."

And because, since the 16th century, rabbis have been calling 13-year-old boys to the bimah to read the Torah.

Last spring, interestingly, all of my sons were engaged in some rite of passage, propelling them closer to manhood and sending the testosterone levels in our home soaring.

Danny, 11, is moving from elementary school to middle school, where he will have his own locker and schedule of classes. Gabe, 15, recently received his driving permit, the first step on the road to mobility. And Zack, 18, is graduating high school, leaving for college in Massachusetts in a few months.

But none of these events, including the high school graduation, is as meaningful and as substantial as the bar mitzvah. For Jeremy is not only moving into the future, he is also affirming his solid footing in the past, in a heritage thousands of years old that provides him with values, morals and a structure for dealing with life's questions and confusion.

Take his drashah, or commentary on the Torah, for instance, which he will present to the congregation.

In this portion, Pinchas, the grandson of Aaron, murders an Israelite man and a Midianite woman who have been behaving immorally. In return, God awards Pinchas and all his descendants with permanent priesthood in Israel.

"That's not right," Jeremy says. "In the Torah, God tells us not to commit murder."

Also in this portion, God tells Moses to climb the mountains of Avarim to see the land that has been given to the Israelites. As punishment, Moses is to prepare to die there and not enter the Promised Land.

"That's also not right," Jeremy says. "All Moses did was hit the rock instead of talking to it. He was getting water for the Israelites.

"How come God rewards a murder and punishes a misdemeanor?" Jeremy asks. "What kind of God is this?"

As a 13-year-old, Jeremy wrestles with right and wrong, with justice and injustice, with good and evil, on a daily basis. In the world, he sees terrorists murder innocent victims. At school, he feels unfairly blamed for the actions and outbursts of his classmates. And at home, he is not allowed to wear liberty spikes or a red zoot suit to his bar mitzvah party.

"Life's not fair," he complains, repeating the mantra of every teenager.

But he says this with the increasing awareness of an adult.

Because, as the cantor at the University Synagogue, Jay Frailich, says, "The most important part of the bar mitzvah is not the ceremony but the process."

For Jeremy, this process began at his brit milah, or circumcision, where he was initiated into the covenant of Judaism and where my husband Larry and I promised to bring him to a life of gemilut chasadim (acts of kindness), Torah and chupah (the wedding canopy).

And this has continued through 11 years of Jewish preschool and day school, through celebrations of Jewish holidays and life-cycle events, through attendance at Jewish day camp, dances and b'nai mitzvah.

Yes, Jeremy can chant his Torah portion and his Haftorah like a pro. He can recite prayers such as the Shema and the G'vurot. He can lead the entire morning service.

But even more important, Jeremy can face fundamental and difficult ethical issues that are not only embedded in the Torah but that also manifest themselves in "real life." He can determine what kind of human being he wants to be in this seemingly unfair world.

Ideally, Jeremy knows not to wear liberty spikes and red zoot suits, not to tattoo his body or join a cult.

Ideally, he has the courage and confidence and tools to act on his convictions.

But, of course, and not always ideally, Jeremy is still only 13.

"Mom," he says, "do you think I could spike just the front of my hair? And maybe wear a navy blue zoot suit?"

GIFT REGISTRIES SERVE BOTH GUESTS AND HOSTS

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

When buying a gift for a wedding or other special occasion, you don't really have to use a registry. You may have a gift idea in mind that you don't need to consult anyone about, one you know the bridal couple will be thrilled to receive. And there are some people who still make gifts, rather than buy them.

For many people, however, a registry is the way to go.

Besides outlining the advantages a registry offers to both hosts and guests, Jackie Chiesa of William Ashley China (416-964-2900) explains her company's special gift notification service, in which a gift card is mailed to the recipient advising them of who the guest is and what they have selected.

A good registry is very particular. For a wedding, for example, it lets the bride and groom specify exactly the patterns and designs they want. This will minimize duplications: there will be no instances, say, of three guests each buying a toaster.

For this reason, a registry also gives guests the satisfaction of knowing their gift will be gladly received. They no longer have to guess, or make time-consuming inquiries with other guests.

Chiesa also advises the bridal couple to register with a company that offers discounts all year round. And she recommends registering six to eight months ahead – even a year, if you want to include the engagement party.

For many people, a registry is the way to go

A registry offers a large selection, all posted in one location. Even before the days of the Internet, this meant that the bridal couple could keep track of what had been bought by making a phone call.

The Internet has expanded the range of choices available to retailers. In effect, it offers a huge catalogue of gifts that is constantly updated. This gives the bridal couple a much larger range to choose from.

But this range is so large that without a registry, it could be overwhelming. Having dozens of patterns to choose from can be confusing and time-consuming – but tens of thousands of patterns can be downright bewildering.

A good bridal consultant knows what's available – for example, the difference between bone china and porcelain – and can sort through it to focus on what's appropriate for you. She can also help you put your look together, making sure that your silver, china, tableware, flatware and other accessories form a harmonious whole. And she can advise your guests.

Of course, the Internet will never replace the pleasure of seeing fine fabrics and housewares up close, not to mention being able to touch them, which is a pleasure both for the bridal couple when they choose what they want and for guests when they buy their gifts. A good registry goes with a well-stocked showroom.

Also, to carry the idea of convenience further, a good registry offers related services such as gift boxing and delivery (although you won't always need a delivery service: to a shower, a guest would bring the gift in person. Often, however, the bride and groom will not want the guests to bring gifts to the actual wedding).

At William Ashley China, guests are welcome to take gifts with them, or opt for gift notification. The latter allows the couple to accumulate gift cards and arrange for a single delivery at their convenience.

Body Doodles bring a party to life with safe artwork

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Marcos Benaim and the artistic staff of Body Doodles can add a new dimension to any simchah through the visual arts.

In addition to temporary tattoos, such as henna, Swarovski crystals and air brushing, Body Doodles also does face painting and caricature portraits.

"Body Doodles is an art-related company dedicated to bringing an event to life with safe and fun artwork," says Benaim, the company's founder.

An actor, musician and children's book author and illustrator, Benaim started Body Doodles (416-889-1208) a little over two years ago following a trip he made to Europe with his family.

"A lot of people were doing temporary tattoos in the streets of Europe," he says. "It's an enticing art fad. I'm one of the first people to do it in Toronto. I believe I introduced it to the Jewish community here."

He says he called the company Body Doodles to avoid using the word tattoo.

"Even though they're temporary, the word 'tattoo' has a stigma. The body paint dries instantaneously and the doodles come off with nail polish remover or alcohol."

Benaim, whose roots are Moroccan, says henna painting the night before the bride and groom get married is a popular Moroccan custom.

"The noche de novia, [which means] night of the wife, is a huge party. Everybody gets henna on the hand."

He says traditional henna takes longer to dry than the body paint he uses, which dries immediately and is "100 per cent safe." Both types of body art last couple of weeks, he adds.

Tiny Swarovski crystals – imported from Europe – can be added to the henna art to embellish the design, Benaim explains.

"The children come to the booth to get a henna tattoo," he says. "Later on in the night, they come back to get the crystals to accent the henna tattoo. Mini-crystals are glued with a safe skin glue. They stay on for a couple of days."

Benaim's artists do not use stencils as part of the design process, he says.

"Each design is completely individualized. It's a very versatile service."

Body Doodles also makes custom tattoos for themed events, says Benaim.

"I am not aware of anyone else who does this kind of customized work. For instance, for a hockey theme for one bar mitzvah, I drew a board full of hockey sports designs so that there were a variety of tattoos."

Body Doodles appeals to all age groups, he says.

"It's so popular with the kids and adults we already have bookings well into 2003."

Benaim says that Body Doodles gives partygoers "a memory that people can share.

"It gives children who don't dance or who are shy an activity that they can partake in. Children of all ages love it."

No matter what the venue, the Body Doodles booth is always busy, he says.

"I did the UJA Walk, the Baycrest Fun Run and some other community fund-raisers. The response was unbelievable. At the Walk for Israel, we did 1,500 tattoos. At one point, there were 100 children waiting in line to get painted."

He recalls working at a school spring fair where a six-year-old girl kept coming back for more tattoos.

"She had tattoos of the names of everyone in her family – her mother, father, brother, sister, even her dog."

Benaim says Body Doodles' entire staff all have backgrounds in art and are lots of fun.

"They're terrific and outgoing and they love what they do as well. I love training them and I'm always on the lookout for new talent."

Prices for Body Doodles vary according to the time and number of children at a function. Party packages start at $125. For 80 kids, Benaim recommends booking two artists for three hours. People wanting to find out more about Body Doodles can also visit the Web site at www.body-doodles.com.

Benaim says he feels fortunate to be in a business that's so gratifying. "My passion is art and I've been able to capitalize on this passion. I love what I do."

Marcos Benaim does his magic on Natalie Soberano at a recent UJA Funwalk.

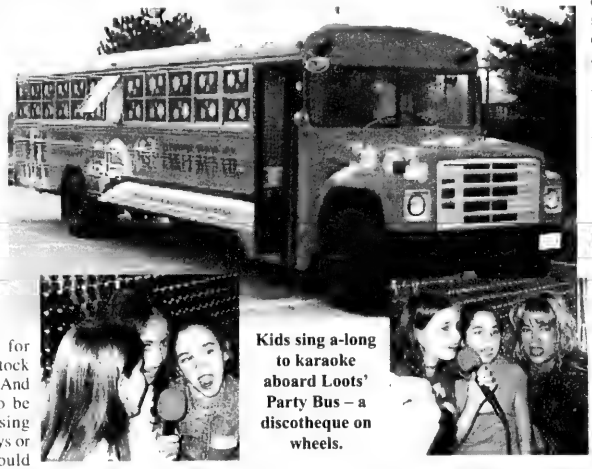
FOR FUN GIFT SHOPPING, TRY ONE-STOPPING

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Norene Norris of Tyme to Party (905-737-2789) and Teri Leese of Loots Party Bus (416-787-5668) both agree on the major advantage that a one-stop gift store offers to someone planning a party. It's as simple as the phrase "one stop": save time and effort by getting as many things as you can at one location.

A store that caters to kids should be appropriately stocked. Tyme to Party, for example, doesn't stock anything breakable. And since kids want to be involved in choosing things like giveaways or loot bags, they should be welcome, says Norris.

Look for comprehensiveness when you choose a gift store, Norris advises. A company that supplies what you need for an occasion like Purim should be able to supply you for another, like Chanukah or a birthday. Its stock should be large enough and diverse enough that it doesn't have to order what you want.



Kids sing a-long to karaoke aboard Loots' Party Bus – a discotheque on wheels.

Tyme to Party, for example, specializes in loot bags, and many parents look to it for bar and bat mitzvah giveaways. But it also carries costumes all year round and has a wide range of balloons and paper products. It can also supply bar and bat mitzvah invitations.

Loots' store is also built on being comprehensive in stock and welcoming both kids and their parents. Besides doing loot bags and bar/bat mitzvah giveaways, it also provides custom gifts and free gift wrapping.

Look for a store that covers the whole market, advises Norris, whether you want to exercise your own creativity or get everything in finished form. If consultants order from it, as they do from Tyme to Party, or if a store ships all over the world as Loots does, that tells you a store has a good name in its field.

Lees and Norris agree that a good one-stop party store will be up to date on the latest novelties. Among the newer ideas Norris mentions are cups that kids can etch their name into with their fingernails, and confetti with a kid's name on the individual pieces for birthday parties.

Norris suggests that you come in to the store two or three weeks ahead, to give yourself time to choose.

Loots Party Bus offers the novel idea of a discotheque on wheels – Leese calls it the "no muss, no fuss, Loots disco party bus." You may have seen it on Citytv's Breakfast Television. Loots is also planning video game and fairy princess fantasy buses.

The bus comes to your location – for stationary use only – with its own generator, heating and air conditioning, as well as prismatic walls, furry ceiling, electronic disco ball, and lots of glitz and glitter.

There are two entertainers, and a sound system and two flatscreen TVs set up for karaoke. You can eat there – staff will feed your guests and clean up, making it great for breakfast and pyjama parties, or disco dancing at a birthday party. And staff will bring a cake and loot bags from the store.

Custom-made evening wear – and not just in black

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

When women envision themselves in evening wear, whether in a cocktail dress or a full-length gown, many see themselves in black, in spite of the trend-setters who have declared, several times over the past few years, that colours are in.

"Most ladies are very into black," says Manijeh Fanaian, who owns Stefania Gracile Couture Inc. (416-789-4111) with her partner Stefania Gracile.

"They think black makes them look slim. But it's not the colour that makes them look slim; it's the style," Fanaian says. "And some colours can make them look slim."

Stefania Gracile Couture carries many types of fabrics in a wide range of colours and Fanaian's black-obsessed customers are often pleasantly surprised at the way coloured fabric looks draped against them.

"I try to match colours with their eyes and their skin tones," Fanaian says. "That way we work out what colour is best for that individual."

The store specializes in custom-made evening wear and party wear, including full-length gowns, cocktail dresses and suits for evening events and less formal suits for bar and bat mitzvahs.

They also carry wedding gowns, dresses for bridesmaids and the mother of the bride.

But, Fanaian says, "The difference between a wedding gown and an evening gown is its colour. We don't do traditional wedding gowns."

They once made a classic fairy-tale-princess-style wedding dress for a customer, but "it wasn't really traditional looking," Fanaian says.

What distinguishes Stefania Gracile dresses and suits is their elegance.

"If someone is looking for something elegant, we do it for them," she says.

The fabrics Stefania Gracile uses, which include beaded material and lots of lace, don't change much with the seasons – Fanaian points out that most women wear jackets over their gowns in the evening anyway – but the colours do change.

Spring, she says, is their busiest time, with some brides and bridesmaids starting to look a year ahead of the wedding day to keep the stress level down just before the wedding.

Stefania Gracile makes a dress or a suit in one week, sometimes two, depending on the time of year. Two fittings are usually required. The owners also recommend other stores where their customers can purchase appropriate undergarments and shoes.

Fanaian and Gracile opened Stefania Gracile Couture Inc. on Avenue Road two years ago, but the Stefania Gracile label goes back almost 20 years. Gracile is a pianist who studied music at university and went on to do fashion studies after graduation. Nearly 20 ago, she began wholesaling ready-to-wear evening, party and bridal fashion.

RENTALS ARE PART OF YOUR PARTY AMBIENCE

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

If chosen with care, linens, china and furniture can add a lot to the atmosphere of your party.

So, advise John Higgins of Higgins Party Rentals (416-252-4050, ext. 22), and Alan Cramer of Micki's (905-738-1161; www.mickis.ca), you should choose a rental company with care.

Before you choose, Higgins urges, research what's out there, since there's plenty of competition.

With styles changing faster than they used to, it's harder to keep up to date. Fashion affects things like linens and china, not just clothes.

This year, for example, square china is trendy, Higgins says. There are even odder shapes, like triangular plates, and one new line of crystal includes an oversized 18-inch wine goblet.

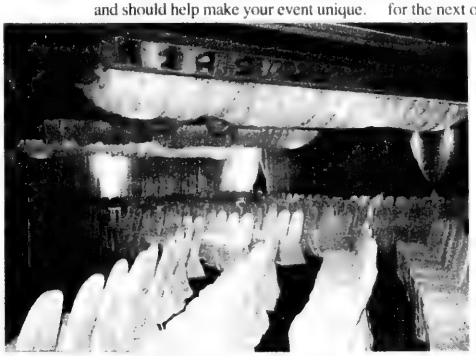
Some offerings are more elegant. There's a fine Italian line of ivory-handled cutlery, and white Chiavari chairs are very popular at weddings.

One major advantage of a good rental house, says Higgins, is that selection will be much bigger than in a hall or hotel. It will have a wide range of things for every event, be it chairs or linen, glasses or cutlery. And a rental house will offer better quality, Cramer adds.

For some parties, you might choose a house that carries specialized items like tents and staging. Higgins, for example, specializes in smaller-scale tents for house parties. Or you might want more common items in unusual designs, such as cocktail tables with frosted glass tops.

Cramer, whose company only rents fabrics, says that specializing in one kind of product lets a company serve you better, because it has the contacts to stay better informed about trends than a non-specialist and can get items faster. As well, by buying in larger quantities, it can pass savings on to you.

It's an accepted maxim that your caterer and event planner should like working with people, but the same, Higgins and Cramer assert, also applies to a rental house. It too offers a service, and should help make your event unique.



Its staff should be knowledgeable and enjoy working with you. Your rental supplier should contribute to the peace of mind that lets you relax and enjoy your party, Cramer maintains. It should be ready to accommodate a range of budgets and representatives should show up at your event in person to check that everything is all right.

Cramer makes a point of praising his competitors. "They give the industry a good name," he says. They have high standards of service; the items they rent are of good quality, and clean; and they deliver on time. Some linen rental houses, he says, have employees who do nothing but inspect and clean.

And they network among themselves, Cramer continues. If one supplier can't offer you what you want, they will refer you to someone who can.

Think ahead, Higgins advises: choose a house that can supply not only your current event, but ones down the road. You may be planning a birthday party now, but the rental company that serves you well for this event will likely do so for the next one.

Your lead time, Higgins estimates, ranges from a week to several months, depending on the event and how particular you are. Do you just want a comfortable chair, say, or a specific design? If you want a specific design, in case there's a large demand for it, allow more time to make sure you get it.

In any case, Higgins says, coming in as early as possible is a good way to avoid last-minute jitters. Cramer agrees that sooner is better, but in an emergency, you should be able to come in the week of your event.

Keep an open mind, Cramer advises. Have a general idea of what you want, but be ready to mix textures and colours and to think outside the box – say, by choosing brocade chair covers and organza tablecloths. A touch like this will help make your party an occasion to remember. [Picture supplied by Micki's.]

Re-invent your Chanukah party

By LINDA MOREL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Entertaining is a lot like gardening, Linda Burghardt says. "You can't make mistakes." In other words, no matter what you do, it's OK.

Just as each combination of flowers produces a different garden, each approach to party planning results in a unique gathering. Through these suggestions, hosts can re-invent Chanukah parties or weave in new ideas with established traditions:

1. Make a guest list of family and friends who light up your life. Celebrating the holiday with friends is fun for people with small families.
2. Using construction paper, show children how to cut out dreidels or candles and create one-of-a-kind invitations by filling in the time and date.
3. If you want to do something fancier, buy plastic dreidels with removable tops and put a note inside each one, explaining the party details.
4. Make a centerpiece by turning a large cardboard box into a dreidel and letting children decorate it. Fill the dreidel with party favours wrapped in blue and white paper, taping mesh bags of Chanukah gelt or real money on top. Attach long ribbons, so it's easy for children to pull party favours from the centerpiece.
5. If you enjoy loot bags, purchase, make gifts yourself, or ask guests to bring something to exchange. Organize two loot bags – one for children and one for adults. Set a price range to ensure fairness.
6. Plan a manageable menu and prepare as many dishes ahead of time as possible.
7. Experiment by making latkes out of sweet potatoes or vegetables such as carrots, zucchini or turnips.
8. For extra crunchy results, drain latkes on brown paper bags from grocery stores rather than on paper towels.
9. Make Chanukah gelt by melting chocolate and spooning it into rounds on aluminum foil coated with a no-stick spray. When they've cooled, wrap individually in silver or gold foil.
10. Create a lovely ceremony by asking guests to bring menorahs from home. Provide candles in a variety of colours, sizes and shapes, including some from Israel.
11. Place menorahs around the dining room table at the appropriate guest's place. Say the blessing and light the shammashes – the central candles – together, followed by the other candles. Prepare to be dazzled.
12. Explain each step for guests who've grown fuzzy about Jewish customs or who are learning about Judaism for the first time.
13. After dinner, read Isaac Beshevis Singer's delightful Zlatch the Goat from his collection of stories by the same name. Young and old alike will be entertained by this charming tale.
14. Before the party, take a long bath. Allow 45 minutes to relax. Remember your role as host is to extend warmth and welcome people into your home. Forget perfectionism -- it has no place at Chanukah.

Proceeds from hospitality bags go to kosher shelter

By CARRIE BRODI
Special to The CJN

Out-of-town guests attending a wedding or bar/bat mitzvah are often overlooked in the flurry of last minute details, says Freda Gottesman-Brender, longtime member of Jewish Women International, Canada (JWI).

Along with the 35 members of the Golda Meir Chapter in Toronto, Gottesman-Brender helps make comfortable your travel-weary loved ones with healthy, delicious hospitality bags delivered right to their hotel room door. What's more, all of the proceeds go to support a one-of-a-kind kosher shelter in Toronto for abused Jewish women called Alternative Short-Term Emergency Housing (ASEH).

"It's a double mitzvah"

"It's a double mitzvah," Gottesman-Brender says. "Not only are you greeting your guests, you're also supporting the charities of JWI."

For between $18 and $25, guests receive a beautifully decorated gift bag that contains two bottles of water, fresh and dried fruits, hard candies, a chocolate bar, almonds, raisons and assorted health bars. Any other items requested can be added for an additional cost. All products are kosher, and everything comes wrapped, with fruits purchased no later than one day before delivery. A personalized note from celebrant to guest is encouraged, as are maps, directions and a pre-simchah itinerary.

Freda Gottesman-Brender and Lilli Gillman display the hospitality bags at a party planner's boutique show.

A small detail, maybe, but anyone who has travelled between cities for a celebration can appreciate how taxing and expensive it can be, says Gottesman-Brender, a retired math teacher who came up with the hospitality bag idea when planning her own children's weddings.

"At the end of my third daughter getting married, I was really so proficient at it," she says. "I thought, I could do this as a fund-raiser. It's a nice thing, it's really quite easy and it's a lot of fun."

What began out of necessity has magnified three-fold. Three years later, the women of Golda Meir Chapter are still enjoying the venture; celebrants and their guests are grateful for the service; and countless women and children in need benefit from the profits.

Along with the women's shelter, which JWI developed alongside Jewish Family and Child Services, the women of Golda Meir Chapter also developed and distributed (in four languages) 150,000 copies of the pamphlet, Protect Yourself: Stop the Violence, an educational resource for victims of domestic violence.

"Domestic violence in the Jewish community does exist," Gottesman-Brender says. "You like to think it doesn't happen, but it does."

Other charitable work done by JWI includes a warm clothing drive for underprivileged children called Mountains of Mittens and financial support for The Residential Treatment Centre in Jerusalem, a medication-free home for emotionally disturbed children.

Schlepping all over Toronto to deliver hospitality bags to various hotels could also be classified as charitable, yet Gottesman-Brender and her chapter are happy to do it (deliveries are free). Gottesman-Brender asks for at least two weeks' notice so that the bags can be shopped for and prepared. The earlier, the better, she says.

"We say, avoid last minute stress," she says. "Do a double mitzvah, show them that you care."

Caricature a memorable keepsake from any party

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

Sometimes it can feel as though attending parties has become part of a routine. There are so many simchahs covering the calendar that after a while, they begin to seem monotonous. If you are looking to spice up your event, look no further than a caricaturist.

Caricaturists such as Chris Klein (416-391-3774) add an element of fun to even the most mature of events.

Klein has been in the business for 11 years. He studied illustration at the Ontario College of Art and Design (OCAD). When he started drawing caricatures on the side, he found that he liked it.

"Caricature drawing gives me a lot of freedom of expression and interpretation," Klein says.

Klein has done many kinds of events, from bar and bat mitzvahs to corporate events to fiscal parties.

Although he is always busy, Klein says Chanukah and summer are the busiest times of the year. He advises booking in advance to avoid disappointment.

So what is so special about caricaturists, you ask?

"Caricatures are unique because it's both entertainment and product," says Klein. "After the party, people have something to keep and even frame.

"People have a blast with my drawings. It really gets the party going and sometimes I even gather a crowd watching me draw."

It takes Klein between four to five minutes to create one drawing.

"People misunderstand at first because they think that you will make fun of them. But everything I do is complimentary."

Klein is a crowd-pleaser. He always makes sure to take requests. "At first, I ask people what they like to do and I try to incorporate it somehow."

Klein enjoys his job,which to him is of supreme importance.

"I love that caricatures are fun for people of all ages. My style progresses as time goes on, and I always have a blast."

So next time you're organizing a party, make sure to give Chris Klein a ring. Without question, he'll make your party something to remember.

How do today's photography trends affect your simchah?

By STACEY STEIN
Special to The CJN

More people are now choosing photographers based on their style and personality, according to Sam Sciarrino, owner of Horvath Photography.

Sciarrino says this is one of the trends he has observed during his nearly 20 years in the business. Another major trend, he says, is the industry's move towards digital photography.

"We're seeing a drastic change in the digital world," said Sciarrino. "We're 70 per cent digital right now, and we'll probably be filmless in about one year." He added that Horvath Photography is now shooting all of its party events in digital.

Florian Surghe, owner of Florian Photography, also noted the move towards digital: The technology has "changed dramatically," he said. While Florian Photography uses film, they digitize all of their work.

Both Horvath Photography (416-487-3443) and Florian Photography (905-832-9576) shoot events such as weddings and bar mitzvahs while also maintaining a presence in the child and family portrait market. Horvath has only two photographers on staff.

"We're a more personal operation," said Sciarrino. "That way, we can keep our quality up."

Located in an antique home in Maple, Florian Photography also emphasizes its high quality as well as its uniqueness. Surghe's wife, who is an artist, incorporates artistic touches into the finished product.

Clients planning events such as weddings or bar mitzvahs must ensure they book their photographer well in advance. Sciarrino recommends customers book their photographer about a year in advance, keeping in mind that certain months such as June tend to be particularly busy for photographers.

"It's not uncommon for some people to book two or three years in advance," said Sciarrino, adding that these are usually repeat customers. Meanwhile, Surghe of Florian Photography recommends booking a year-to-two years in advance of the event.

While many people are now using videographers at their affairs, both Sciarrino and Surghe maintain that this has not had an impact on the demand for photographers.

"The videographer and photographer cover different aspects of the affair," said Surghe.

Sciarrino said people tend to use both photographers and videographers at their events.

"I don't think video has affected the photography market at all. Videography will never take photography's place and photography can't replace videography," he said.

When choosing a photographer, both Surghe and Sciarrino said the photographer's personality is a key factor.

"It doesn't matter how good the photographer is. If there's no chemistry [between the photographer and his/her subjects], the photography will be without a soul," Surghe said, adding that "it is important to know exactly who the photographer is and to make sure you get a good feeling from them."

Sciarrino said clients should also look at the quality and style of the photography. While Horvath has its own distinct style, the photographers are also adaptable to their clients' requests.

Using weddings as an example, Sciarrino said Horvath's style tends to be "in-between."

"We do something that will satisfy the bride and groom and the parents at the same time. We do a little bit of everything to satisfy everybody," he said.

Surghe said he doesn't believe in adopting a specific style.

Pictures by Horvath Photography

"My style is the people's style," he said, adding his photos range from the "super-classic" to "craziness."

"People are different," he said. "How can you put everybody in the same box?"

Timeless beauty of flowers

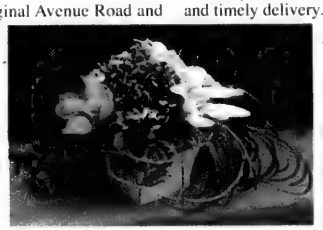
By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

Bob and Doug Hatcher are third-generation florists, still operating the business their grandfather opened in Toronto in 1909.

The Hatcher brothers' grandfather, George Henry Hatcher, included among his clientele prominent figure Lady Eaton and war hero Billy Bishop.

"We have a letter from the York Club dated Nov. 3, 1924, stating, 'Flowers admired by all at the Function for H.R.H. the Prince of Wales,'" Bob Hatcher says.

Nearly eight decades later, Hatcher Florist (416-221-5557), which moved from the original Avenue Road and Dupont location to 5455 Yonge Street in 1957, has kept up with the times. Customers can order floral arrangements, gift baskets and plants through their Web site, www.hatcherflorist.com.



They've also kept up with the latest floral colour trends. A recent wedding show Hatcher attended focused on warm colours, and to reflect that trend, the brothers have painted their shop a rich burgundy.

Warm shades such as reds, burgundys and hot pinks, Hatcher says, are coming back strong, with cool colours such as mauve, lavender and blue taking a back seat.

All-white flowers are still popular for bridal bouquets, he says, but "for the bride who wants something more trend-setting," he suggests hot-pink and light-pink gerbera in miniature.

Hatcher says he consults with a bride once, twice or three times before the wedding day, depending "on how definite the bride-to-be is about her vision," and he comes on the wedding day to set up and oversee the flowers.

His party centrepieces are innovative arrangements of quality flowers and foliage, with "no huge CD, chocolate bar or Pokémon add-ons," he says.

"We pride ourselves on fresh flowers, innovative design and timely delivery."

Sandra Raffa, a co-owner of The Toronto Florist Shop (905-764-6332; toll free 800-303-0092; www.torontofloristshop.com) says she creates colourful and funky raised centrepieces for bar and bat mitzvahs.

Preferred bar mitzvah flower colours are blue, yellow, orange and purple, while the most popular bat mitzvah colours are hot pink, purple, red and yellow, Raffa says.

KEEP THE MEMORY FRESH WITH A MOUNT 'N SEAL POSTER

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

It's often said that photographs preserve memories, and some photos make good posters. Think of the classic baseball shots of Babe Ruth blown up to poster size.

If it works for sports, why not make posters out of photos taken at family occasions? A poster of your son at his bar mitzvah, for example, could find a place in your home.

Like photos, though, posters are subject to wear over time, so how can you preserve them? Neil Flagg of Mount 'N Seal and Sports Poster Warehouse (416-423-9975; www.puresportsart.com) has a way to keep them looking new.

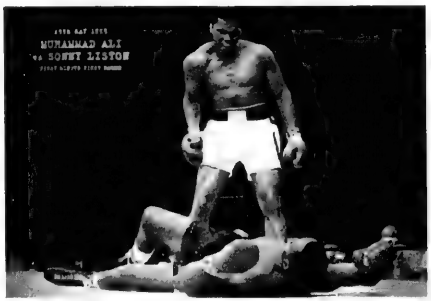
Flagg bought Mount 'N Seal 25 years ago from its founder, Louise Joseph, who brought this poster framing concept from New York. Museum mount framing, as it's often called, can be used on posters, signing boards, or the picture on an easel at the entrance to, say, a bar mitzvah celebration.

First, the picture or poster is mounted on a sturdy, half-inch thick corrugate board. It's then given a border, with 30 colours to choose from, then it's shrink wrapped, which gives it a light gloss. Finally, a hanger is fitted to the back.

Mounted this way, your picture or poster is lighter than it would be in a conventional frame and easier to move. It's durable and not easily damaged. All you have to do is dust it or, for a smudge or fingerprints, wipe it with a damp cloth. (Don't use a very hot or wet cloth or abrasive chemicals.)

It's also much less expensive than conventional framing. The average poster, 2 by 3 feet in size, costs $29.95. The price is proportionate to the size, making this a cost-effective preservation method, especially for large posters. Mount 'N Seal can mount anything, from a snapshot up to the size of poster you would see in a subway station.

Sports Poster Warehouse is Flagg's own business, which he started in 1997. An enthusiastic sports fan, Flagg originally intended to get the rights to publish posters of great moments in sports. But for the handful of titles he had rights to, printing a catalogue was a daunting expense. He had dozens of competitors with rights to publish posters, and unlike his competitors, he had no distribution network.



Instead, he made his competitors his suppliers, selling for them. Now, he no longer has to go door to door to all the little shops and galleries. And Sports Poster Warehouse sells thousands of posters a week, 95 per cent of them to customers in the United States.

You can visit the Mount 'N Seal showroom at Laird Drive and Eglinton Avenue. He has a full range of posters of all kinds, including some vintage shots of Babe Ruth.

Colourful floral trends

"[We make] both with lots of branches and cascading grasses to give them a young and fun feeling," she says.

Raffa agrees with Hatcher that floral colour trends are "more colourful" this year and expects that to continue into 2003.

Brides are being a little more adventurous with their colour choices, she says.

The most popular bridal bouquet is a simple hand-tied flower cluster usually made of roses, or a combination of roses and other delicate flowers, she says.

"The colours of a lot of bouquets I've done are still white or in pastel tones, but I've done many bold-colour bridal bouquets this year."

The bridesmaids' dress colour is usually the basis for choosing the wedding colour scheme, she says, "so the dress colour is always taken into account when deciding on the colours and types of flowers."

Also for weddings, The Toronto Florist Shop offers a choice of two chuppahs, one a standard size of 6'x6'x8' and the other an adjustable one that's a minimum of 10'x10'x8'. The chuppah's structure is usually decorated in white or ivory fabric, tulle, satin or organza, or a combination of fabrics.

"It's very common to use the flowers from the chuppah to decorate the reception room after the ceremony," she says.

Raffa meets with the bride as often as necessary, and sometimes visits the ceremony and reception venues with her to discuss decorating possibilities.

"I always go if I've never been to their venue before," she says.

On the wedding day, Raffa and her staff arrive for the picture-taking and stay until the ceremony is over to transfer the flowers to the reception venue. At the end of the evening, they return to dismantle the flowers.

Raffa joined The Toronto Florist Shop, which has been on Thornhill's Glen Cameron Road for over 15 years, six months after her own wedding. She learned the business hands-on and, four years later, bought the shop with a silent partner.

"The number of weddings have increased dramatically in these last years and it's been rewarding to be such a huge part of the one of the most special days in people's lives," she says.

HAVE A HOTEL HOST YOUR PARTY

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Hotels offer many advantages as party venues. Anne Mortensen of Four Seasons Hotel Toronto (416-928-7310) and Leah Leslie, director of sales and marketing for Toronto Marriott Eaton Centre (416-204-9002) offer valuable insights into what these advantages are.

Hotels, as they point out, are equipped to host parties of varying sizes, from intimate gatherings to galas with hundreds of guests. And for any size of event, a large hotel will probably have more than one choice of room.

Book a year ahead, advises Leslie. Mortensen recommends six months to a year. When you call, she continues, know the date, the time of day, the number of guests, and type of event (wedding, bar or bat mitzvah, cocktails, etc.). And have some idea what food and beverages you want.

Leslie places a lot of emphasis on location. This time of year, as cold weather sets in, you might not usually think about outdoor parties; but if you're planning well ahead, you have to decide whether a summer event might be outdoors, and if so, what kind of venue can best accommodate it.

Ask yourself whether you want a location in the suburbs or downtown, Leslie adds. At first glance, if most of your guests live in the suburbs and drive, a suburban venue looks better. And guests flying in from out of town will want to avoid heavy downtown traffic. On the other hand, Leslie points out, a downtown location means easier access to public transit or taxis, and fewer designated drivers at an event with alcohol. Moreover, many young downtowners don't own cars these days.

Mortensen says hotels often provide a range of services that save you the trouble of calling on several other party professionals. A good hotel offers a good selection of crystal, chair covers and the like. Some will do the flowers and invitations for you.

Pay attention to the quality and presentation of the food, Leslie advises. If you're a serious prospect, a hotel or banquet hall should put on a taste panel. But they won't do this if you're still at the window shopping stage, since it's costly.

Also, Mortensen urges, look for a hotel that offers something extra special. Four Seasons Toronto hosts kosher events for groups of 250 to 500 in the Regency Ballroom, for example, but they also take pride in innovative cuisine, much of it with an Asian influence, from canapes to full-course meals.

A ballroom at the Four Season Toronto.

Rare sesame seared tuna on an avocado compote with a preserved ginger drizzle is not often seen on a kosher menu. Four Seasons Toronto smokes its own gravid lox in-house, as well.

Look for a level of service that includes literally going that proverbial extra mile, Mortensen advises. On one occasion, Four Seasons Toronto flew in kosher wasabi and pickled ginger from New York.

Atmosphere, setting and size all deserve careful thought, Leslie says. You don't necessarily want the most opulent room. Crystal chandeliers and sumptuous decor may be ideal for a wedding, but if you yourself want to decorate, or your bar mitzvah boy wants a basketball theme, a simpler room would be better.

"Walk the path of arrival that your guest will walk," advises Leslie. Put yourself in their steps, and imagine what they will see.

But the most important factor of all, Leslie says, is trust. The people working at your venue should have a good reputation that they have built over time. They should be competent, experienced and well organized. And they should be caring people who will enjoy working with you.

PARTY PLANNER

INVITATIONS SET THE TONE FOR ANY ENGAGEMENT

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Weeks ahead of the date, when your guests open that envelope and see that card, they will get an expectation of what your event will be like. For something as important as invitations, how should you choose your provider and get the best for your budget?

Let Elaine Anisman of Sendsations (416-322-5553), and Terry Kirshenbaum of Invitation House (416-593-0519) answer these questions.

Anisman recommends talking to different invitation companies. See who is patient, understands your needs, explains what's suitable and can keep within your budget. Find a professional who knows where you can cut and where you can add.

Anisman recommends you look at the invitation provider's other work before you make a final decision. Bring with you the basic information about the kind of event you are holding and where and when it will be, she advises. The more elaborate your event, the more details you need. Know what you want, but keep an open mind and listen to professional advice.

Your invitation, Kirshenbaum says, does more than give information: it sets the tone for your event. And in both Kirshenbaum and Anisman's experience, everyone wants their event to be extraordinary.

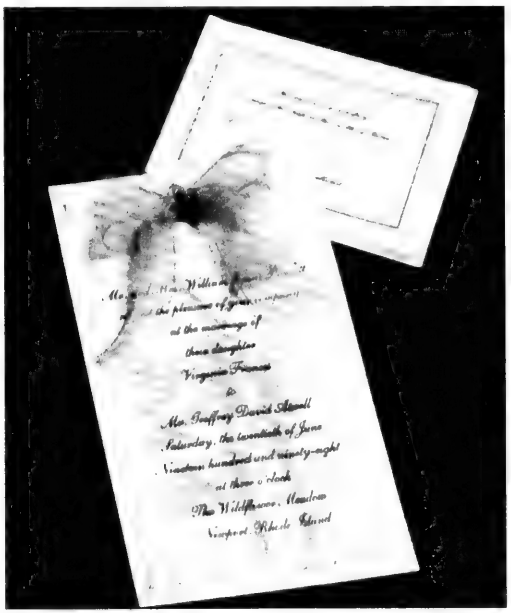
To impress your guests, says Kirshenbaum, you need a custom designer who will create something personalized, not just someone who flips through a catalogue. Anisman also recommends picking a company with an in-house designer.

Kirshenbaum says your invitation provider should know about new papers, typefaces, printing and colouring techniques on the market, since styles change in this field as in others. Anisman says it's equally important that she help you with wording and style.

Design companies need three to four weeks' production time, says Kirshenbaum, after which you should mail your invitations about two months in advance. Be prepared to book your invitation provider about 12 weeks prior to your event. Sooner is even better to allow for contingencies.

But Kirshenbaum cautions that if you order invitations farther in advance, you need to make sure the time/s and venue/s are definite. Otherwise, trying to plan ahead could backfire. If you order six months ahead and find out later that the shul can't accomodate your dinner till 7:00 p.m., and your invitations say 6:00 p.m., you'll need to reprint them. Many things cannot be prepared a year ahead. You may want to expand your guest list six months before the event, for example. But for a major event, Anisman recommends six months, even a year in advance, if possible, to avoid a rush.

More and more, the party business is becoming compartmentalized. Kirshenbaum says she gets a lot of her customers through event planners. Time was, only wealthy individuals used event planners; today, almost everyone does.



Invitations designed by Sendsations.

As for printing techniques, they're changing so fast, Kirshenbaum says it's hard to talk about them. She has to go to trade shows to keep up. Nonetheless, she maintains, nothing surpasses the beauty of calligraphy and real engraving.

These traditions are as popular as they ever were, Kirshenbaum says. Hand-crafted work says: "You, as my guest, matter; I'm giving you some time and effort." A beautiful invitation is an ideal scrapbook item, and can be kept as a souvenir.

Consultant 'makes sure everyone works as a team'

By STACEY STEIN
Special to The CJN

Bridal consultant Tamara Temes likens hiring an event co-ordinator to getting an insurance package. A bridal consultant allows the couple to relax and enjoy their wedding night without having to worry about taking care of mishaps or glitches.

"You put a lot of effort into your wedding and you want to make sure it runs smoothly," said Temes (905-770-7977), who has been working as a bridal consultant for seven years. "The consultant makes sure everyone works together as a team. There's more on your shoulders if you do it on your own."

Making sure everything runs smoothly

Temes works on her own, co-ordinating about a dozen weddings during the summer months. Her Web site, www.tamaratemes.com, includes wedding tips and references from past clients.

Party and event co-ordinator Risa Gold (905-882-5044) says as our lives become more hectic, event co-ordinators are becoming increasingly important.

"Most people are in demanding careers," she said. "It's hard to take the time to organize a wedding. To put a wedding together is like being a project manager."

With 13 years of experience in event planning, Gold's company Risa Gold and Associates is branching out into full event co-ordinating.

While the business will still be heavily geared towards simchas such as weddings and bar/bat mitzvahs, Gold is establishing a special division for corporate functions and special events such as conventions, sales functions and Christmas parties.

Tamara Temes helps a bride on her wedding day.

She will have three associates working with her, which will enable her company to handle more events – up until now she has been planning around 40 events a year. With her new company, Gold also plans to organize meetings over tea for brides and their mothers. She hopes to bring in speakers to discuss various topics.

According to both Gold and Temes, clients should book a party consultant about a year to 1½ years in advance. Gold said couples planning a wedding should ideally call her company as soon as they get engaged.

Gold and Temes offer clients at least two or three in-person meetings. The first meeting with an event co-ordinator is a detail-oriented type of meeting, where the consultant gathers information about the client and the kind of event they want and provides the client with information, such as recommendations for suppliers.

For weddings, the consultant assists with the rehearsal and attends to details such as organizing the wedding procession. Gold said she also assists with speech writing.

On the day of the event, the consultant is there to ensure everything runs smoothly and takes care of any problems that may arise. In between the face-to-face meetings with the consultant, clients may call their consultants to discuss any concerns they have.

Risa Gold and Associates offers clients two packages – a full-service package and an on-site package.

The on-site package is for clients who require less involvement from the consultant – it includes one meeting prior to the wedding as well as the consultant's services for the rehearsal and the day of the event. The full-service package includes two to three meetings, more information and more involvement from the consultant, as well as more phone calls in between the face-to-face meetings.

Both Gold and Temes emphasize the importance of catering to each client's individual needs and preferences.

"I emphasize that every client is different," said Temes. "I make sure each person is happy. Not every person fits into the same mould."

Gold stresses the importance of providing clients with a personal touch. "I dig deep inside to find out what kind of wedding they want," she said. "It's their day and it's what they want. My job is to facilitate that."

WHAT'S A MAN TO WEAR TO A SPECIAL AFFAIR?

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Lou Myles and Wendy Switzer Myles of Lou Myles Disegnatore (416-365-7777 or 905-738-3333; www.loumyles.ca) and Matthew Lee of Heritage Fine Clothing (416-789-5192) have timely answers to the question "What's a man to wear to a special affair?"

But while Lou Myles focuses on the tuxedo, Lee concentrates on the business suit.

Lou is a man of strong convictions. "Black tie," he maintains, "means a bow tie with a dinner suit, which is a tuxedo. It has to be a bow tie, and should be with a cummerbund. It's not whether I like it that counts: it's the only way. Some people do things differently, but their way isn't proper."

To emphasize his point, he says that within these limits, even a pink tuxedo is permissible. "It wouldn't look good, though," he warns.

Lou Myles with his wife Wendy.

To a bar or bat mitzvah or wedding, Lou insists, wear a black tie and tux. To a less formal occasion, wear a well-cut dark suit, white or powder blue shirt, and beautiful tie; or in summer, a suit jacket and tie.

Tuxedo fabric, says Wendy Switzer Myles, is often a blend of 85 per cent superfine worsted wool, and 15 per cent summer kid mohair. Shearing the kid in summer yields finer hair. A tux can also be pure worsted wool – or even pure silk, which is more fragile and delicate.

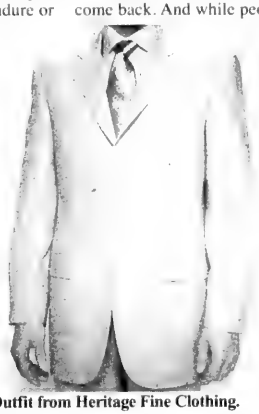
Silk, she continues, is used for the trim on the lapels, top collar, breast and coat pockets, buttons, and side seam of the trousers. The silk facings on the lapels can have a flat satin finish or a ribbed grosgrain finish.

Many fashions, Lou observes, are here today and gone tomorrow. And some people will wear something different, not to look good, but just to be different. Or they buy labels rather than quality, following trends like sheep.

On the other hand, he continues, some things endure or come back. He says an acquaintance of his recently wore a tux made in 1962 to a black-tie affair and got many compliments. Lou intends to bring this style back.

Lou sees it as his mission to lead the consumer and at the same time satisfy him.

Speaking generally, Lou holds that the essence of style is your silhouette. Look for what flatters your body – the rest, such as lapel size, is embellishment. You should feel good about what you wear, about how it fits you and about how it looks.



Outfit from Heritage Fine Clothing.

Lee also maintains that quality counts more than being trendy. And he agrees with Lou Myles that a good suit should make you feel both confident and comfortable.

Lee also prefers a conservative look. Colours, he says, are still the basic black, navy and charcoal. Wear a well-cut suit with white shirt and tie, he says, and you will always be in style.

Men's suits, Lee continues, are tending to striped fabric now, instead of plain. Three-button jackets are still in style, but the double-breasted two-button may be starting to come back. And while people talk from time to time about bringing back the three-piece suit with vest, it never actually happens.

The preferred suit fabric, Lee continues, is still super 100 or 120 worsted wool. He also draws attention to a new fabric, TechnoAir, developed in Italy. It breathes well, and doesn't crease easily. If you hang it overnight, it drapes easily, and any creases should disappear.

This is a great convenience for someone who travels for business and wants to look fresh upon arrival. Sitting for several hours in a car or plane will always put creases behind your knees, for instance. But in a TechnoAir suit, these creases can be easily smoothed out.

Lee estimate a fine suit will cost between $595 and $1,000. If you think of it as an investment in your own well-being and good appearance, it's well worthwhile, he says.

You'll need more than that hand-held video-cam!

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

One sure way to make the precious memories of your affair live on is by capturing them on video.

But don't kid yourself into thinking that your home video camera will do the trick, says videographer Darren Sager of DMS Video Productions.

"Many people have video cameras, but everybody isn't a professional," says Sager, adding that the best videographers are up to speed on the latest film and editing technology and make their clients feel comfortable.

"You have to like the people you're hiring, [because] you deal with them for months."

At DMS – which is in its 17th year of business – clients are free to sit in the editing suite and make sure the finished product is to their liking.

"Clients can view it before they take it home," Sager says.

Gone are the days of microphones shoved in people's faces and bright strobe lights lighting up the screen, says Sager.

These days, tastes and trends abound. Sager says many clients prefer a classic, documentary-style film without hyped up special effects. "We stay away from lights, camera, action Hollywood," Sager says "We keep it simple." He notes high-end DVD productions are very popular.

At Rafael Studios, which has served 1,200 clients over the years, videos take on a dramatic dimension.

"Our videos have a narrative. They actually tell a story," says Rafael's Tom Koltai. For instance, he may take a bar mitzvah boy with his friends and film them in a park or high school in order to add a subplot to the film.

Koltai likes to use multiple screens, motion effects and cinematic editing techniques. And he urges clients to pay attention to sharpness, style and lighting.

"Lighting can overexpose people's faces and make them squint," he says.

Sager and Koltai encourage clients to meet face to face with prospective videographers.

"It's comforting for our clients," Sager says. "They put a face to a name."

And make sure the person you were promised would do the shooting and editing is the person who is actually behind the lens on the day of the affair.

Clients should book six to eight months in advance, they say.

"This is something that lives on forever," Koltai says. "Make your decision on style and trust."

To reach Rafael Studios, contact 416-667-9999 or email tom@rafaelstudios.ca. To reach DMS, call 905-470-4040 or e-mail info@dmsvideo.com.

Let kids make their own fun

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Parents like to say: "When we were kids, we had to make our own fun." Well, Keri Saltzman (905-731-2163) of Keri's Dancing Kids and Shelley Meretsky of Gourmet Temptations & Personally Yours (905-882-7531) put on parties that let kids do just that.

Saltzman started Keri's Dancing Kids three years ago. A communications student at York University, she enjoys both dancing and working with children, and Keri's Dancing Kids brings these passions together.

Saltzman puts on a two-hour party for boys or girls five to 11 years of age. In the first hour, she teaches them dance steps and short routines to pop songs. After learning these, the kids perform for each other in the second hour. To teach them, and for her own enjoyment, Saltzman keeps up to date on all the popular steps.

This makes for a high-energy party. Moreover, since Saltzman creates a different package for each party, she must be inventive in putting steps and routines together. She has done repeat business with the same kids, which gives her even more incentive to make sure each event is unique. She enjoys the challenge.

A party package also includes face painting and fingernail art. Other activities, like body art, crystal tattoos or small crafts like jewelry or bead making, depend on the client's interest. Saltzman also supplies CDs and a sound system.

Book three to four months ahead, Saltzman advises. Usually, she works in homes, although sometimes she works in other venues specified by the client, or in a studio. She puts on her parties mainly for birthdays and after-school events, but she can also be part of a larger party. This month, she is working at a McDonald's charity event.

Meretsky of Gourmet Temptations and Personally Yours offers a venue for a crafts party for about 25 boys and girls aged five to 12 with two instructors. Each party lasts about an hour and 45 minutes.

The range of crafts and variety of materials is generous. It includes foam wall hangings and cork boards. Kids can also make candy art, decorate clocks and do different kinds of painting, including on canvas bags. They can also do clay pens and holders – for example, the holder could be a road, with a pen sitting in a clay car.

Everything is functional and can be used afterward. It's personalized, with the party kid's name or a friend's name on it. Everyone, not just the birthday kid, can take his or her craft piece home. And there's a special birthday song the instructors sing to the birthday kid.

The crafts are challenging, but not too challenging, since Meretsky wants each kid to go home feeling successful.

In her newest type of party, guests colour a paper doll that looks like a Groovy Girl. Other activities at a Groovy Girl party include decorating a makeup bag and putting makeup on themselves.

Planners take pressure away and help relieve the stress

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Planning a function is a colossal project. Between finding the best venue, choosing the right band and making the affair a reality, the entire process can be quite stressful. If you're looking to cut the cost and the stress, consider the services provided by party and event planners.

"The event planner is the liaison between the family or company and the trades," says Hildy Dobrofsky. "We alleviate any potential problems or stress that can occur when planning a function."

Dobrofsky has planned her share of weddings, bar/bat mitzvahs, etc. over the years. That experience has taught her that clients often know what they want, but need someone to point them in the right direction. That's where the event planner comes in.

"I recommend the various bands, photographers, videographers" Dobrofsky says. "And most importantly, I'm there that night to make sure everything runs smoothly."

Because functions frequently run up sizeable bills, people may be somewhat leery of adding the additional cost of an event planner. But as Charlene Golfarb of CG & Friends explains, event planners can save you some dough.

"It will probably cost you more [without an event planner], because you aren't familiar with the resources that we know about," she says.

Goldfarb has worked in the event planning field for eight years. That experience, she says, has taught her which suppliers offer good quality services at reasonable rates.

She emphasizes that event planners can fulfill multiple roles: they can plan the entire event from start to finish; they can pitch in with some aspects; or they can be there just as a consultant on the day of a function. In all cases, what matters is that the event planner is on the same page as the client and they work as a team.

"Clients need someone who is creative, sticks within their budget and gives them what they want," she says. "You have to hire an event planner who suits you and your personality."

Dobrofsky adds that it is important for event planners to be calm and quick thinking. Because events, whether it be a product launch or wedding, are often put together by several people, Goldfarb says the event planner needs to cater to everyone's needs and wants.

For instance, she recently planned a bar mitzvah where the young man wanted a sports theme and the parents were interested in a biblical theme. "So we decided on doing biblical sports."

These days, themes for events are varied. Some popular ones include winter wonderlands, sports, safaris, casinos, movies and the list goes on.

What is key, Goldfarb and Dobrofsky both point out, is that each event is planned with originality. Ultimately, it can take months or more than a year to plan a stellar event.

So, "if you want to be able to relax and enjoy the function," Dobrofsky says, "an event planner is there to take that pressure away."

To reach Hildy Dobrofsky call 416-271-3241 or email hildyis@hotmail.com. To reach Charlene Goldfarb call 416-518-9585, or e-mail charlenegold farb@look.ca.

Entertainer offers all styles of music

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

During her 20 years as an entertainer and entertainment provider at parties and weddings, Debi Sander Walker has made a lot of people happy.

And over that time, she's earned the unstinting praise of her many appreciative clients.

"With all your help, you and your band added so much to make the whole event a very magical one," one client said.

"We would not hesitate to recommend you to anyone," said another. "You are truly talented."

Debi Sander Walker

Walker, who has the distinction of being the only female big-band leader on the scene – she was the bandleader at the Prince Hotel for seven years – is the bandleader and the singer at the functions for which she's hired. She brings in musicians and other artists, such as comedians, mimes or dancers.

"As a company, we have worked with a wide variety of entertainers," Walker says. "I have enjoyed myself so much that it doesn't seem like work."

The musical selections she sings are posted on her Web site, www.debisanderwalker.com. She does lots of ballads – organized under the categories of swing, standard and contemporary ballads on the Web site – along with new country, rock, waltzes and some Jewish music. But clients aren't restricted to the songs on Walker's Web site and she welcomes special requests.

"It's a challenge, and it not only tells me what they want to hear, but I love making them happy," she says.

At functions, Walker, with input from her client, takes care of the order of the musical selections and the choice of songs for specific moments. "I'm the person that keeps the show running smoothly," she says.

Not only a bandleader and a singer, Walker (905-275-4744) also acts and writes songs.

She's been singing all her life; at university she studied classical music and performed opera. After university, Walker sang with a rock band. Becoming the bandleader at the Prince Hotel widened her scope of music and musical styles, she says.

"I love singing all styles of music. I'm lucky to have a voice that I can use in so many different ways."

Her self-penned song, A Mother's Cry, made it onto the charts, and on the acting front, she's created three characters, Carmellina, Ethel and Patsy, who perform at children's shows and provide comic breaks at motivational seminars.

"Motivational seminars can include rather long days," she says, "and a comic break in the middle can be quite refreshing."

A believer in community involvement, Walker has been a member of the Mississauga Board of Trade for the past seven years. In 2001, she won the Sam McCallion Community Involvement Award, earlier this year she received the Board of Trade's Chairman's Award and a few weeks ago she was presented with a Province of Ontario Volunteer Service Award.

Recently, she became a director of Carassauga, Mississauga's annual multicultural festival. "I feel good knowing that I have contributed all I could to help make something better," she says.

This year, Walker brought in Jeff Healey's jazz band and his rock band to entertain at a Board of Trade event.

"It was a fantastic night," she says. "People were standing most of the time."

What a party that must have been!

Merger creates a stronger group of entertainers

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Mandell Entertainment Group and Entertainment Xtreme, leading entertainment event producers, have joined forces to form a new company, Mandell Xtreme.

Corey Mandell, CEO of the new Mandell Xtreme (416-923-7200) , says Jared Florence, owner of Entertainment Xtreme and a manager of Mandell Entertainment Group from 1996 to 1998, has become president of the new company.

The firms merged, says Mandell, so that "two top companies can work on the same side of the fence and become an even stronger company of entertainment producers."

Also new this fall, he says, has been the launch of the York Event Theatre at Yonge Street and Eglinton Avenue, just down the street from its sister event venue, the Capitol Theatre.

Both venues have kosher kitchens and offer a choice of caterers, as well as staff to advise clients on all aspects of event planning, Mandell says.

A third venue, located on the ground floor of Mandell Xtreme's new offices at Bloor Street and Avenue Road, is set to open within the next four months.

Another exciting development, he says, is Mandell Xtreme's purchase of the Prop Factory at Queen and Dufferin streets, which specializes in television, theatre and movie sets.

"What we do is recycle the props into the event industry. Recently, we used the stand-up props from YTV's Uh Oh! in order to create an arcade at a bar mitzvah.

Corey Mandell

"By having us buy the props, our clients are given the opportunity of getting expensive props at reasonable rates."

He says that with 200 staff members at Mandell Xtreme, they make it possible for clients to plan parties of any size and within a budget that starts as low as about $500.

A new trend, he says, is the return of a live element to party entertainment.

"By having musicians playing during the dinner hour, and premium MCs and disc jockeys entertaining during the party reception, we are pleasing guests of all ages and we are adding prestige to the event."

Florence says that as a result of their having joined together, the new company can promote clients' ultimate party planning experience with an all-star staff of dancers and performers.

"We also offer an array of interactive party concepts, such as hot press, which has guests choosing from a variety of items, such as hats, sweatpants, shirts, or T-shirts and having sayings ironed on to them. Guests find it so cool to take them home as give-aways.

"Also cool, are laminated crazy cards that say such things as 'backstage pass' or 'back-seat driver,' and include the guest's picture."

Above all, says Florence, Mandell Xtreme focuses on complete customer satisfaction. "We've redefined the art of live, interactive entertainment."

Choosing a kosher caterer

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

With many hotels offering kosher food, the choice of caterers is increasing all the time.

Deanna Schaffer of Malmar Fine Foods & Catering (416-638-0091) and Miriam Myerowitz of Miriam's Table Catering (416-633-6554) have some suggestions on how to choose the one that's to your taste.

Look for a caterer you have rapport with, advise Schaffer and Myerowitz – someone who will provide what you want and make it the highest quality. Real ease of mind comes from knowing you're in trustworthy hands.

"Your guests," says Schaffer, "should not know who the caterer is, or even if your event is catered at all. All they should know is that the food is good, and well served."

And you as the host should know this will happen so that with less worry, you can be a participant at your own party.

Book as soon as you can, Schaffer urges. This gives the caterer more time to get the best staff and rentals, and in general do a better job. You're also more likely to get the caterer you want, because a reputable professional won't overbook.

"If I have to say no," Schaffer says, "people respect me for it."

At the same time, in Schaffer's experience, a host who prefers a particular caterer will sometimes move a party. This isn't possible with a predetermined date like a bar mitzvah, but people do move events like anniversary celebrations.

If your event isn't in a shul, call the caterer as soon as you book the venue, Myerowitz advises. For a bar or bat mitzvah, book two to three years ahead; for a wedding, about a year. Your major meeting with the caterer to go over details should be about four months before the event.

Your caterer should guide you and take care of you, says Schaffer, asking you about special diet or allergy requirements. And if you're hosting your event at home, she should advise you on how to prepare. All you should need to know when you go to see her, is what food you want.

And a good caterer pays attention to the small, considerate touches like finding out if you need a coat rack for a winter event. Such things add up, Schaffer says.

Myerowitz agrees that real service means going the extra mile, at times even doing things like flowers and invitations.

Many hosts are unaware of the range of services available. Myerowitz keeps lists of people she's worked with, from videographers to martini bars, and will give you names and numbers if you want. In order not to be beholden to one party professional, however, she won't recommend one over another.

"My obligation," she states, "is to you, the host, and no one else."

Find someone flexible enough to meet your needs, Myerowitz advises. And while you should know what you want, it often helps if you yourself are flexible and ready to accept the suggestions of a professional.

Myerowitz places a high value on reputation, but this doesn't mean ignoring newcomers. Oldtimers sometimes get set in their ways; and newcomers often work harder to earn a good name.

Miriam Myerowitz

Hotels, Myerowitz observes, have livened up the competition, even though they're more expensive than halls. If they bring in a mashgiach, they can use their own chef. They can also offer highly valued extras, such as a bridal suite, at cost.

Traditional Jewish dishes, Myerowitz says, have declined in popularity. "People want to eat and serve kosher Thai, kosher Japanese, kosher Chinese."

On the other hand, she adds, when it comes to things like the Simchat Torah lunch she donates to the shul each year, people do want traditional Jewish food. It has a kind of sentimental value, especially when people aren't under pressure to show they're up to date.

Myerowitz puts caterers on three levels. Some, she says, do only traditional food, and have the corresponding clientele. Others are mainly traditional, but will do something different if you push them. The top level are innovators, who don't do traditional food anymore.

Schaffer has been a caterer for 35 years; about half her business is in homes, the other half in halls and synagogues. In her view, 90 per cent of caterers' business comes from their reputation, only 10 per cent from what's in fashion.

People only have one bar mitzvah or 50th anniversary; they're not thinking about what's "in." They want a party they will remember happily for years.

Check out the band before you book

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

There is an aura, an energy that tends to permeate a party and it mainly flows from the band. The sound they generate, the type of music they sing and the connection they make with the guests are crucial to a party's success. So if you want to select the right band, go see them in action.

"I wouldn't hire just from a tape or CD," says Shelley Miller, the leader of the band that bears his name. "People have to go out to a shul or hotel and... check them out live."

Miller notes clients will frequently like a singer's voice and that will cement their choice. But he advises people to not just listen to the band, but to also take a close look at their chemistry with one another.

"You can book great players, but there is a magic that goes beyond that," Miller says. "The band has to have a relationship and that comes out as energy. You see they're having a good time." If the band is pumped, then ultimately that vibe becomes infectious for guests, Miller says.

The Sky's Band: Performers, not just musicians.

Morris Kast of The Sky's Band says bands have evolved into performers, not merely musicians.

"When we perform at a job, we don't just sing. Everyone in the band dances all night long," Kast says. "We want people dancing and moving right away."

Because people's tastes in music are diverse, Kast and Miller advise clients to discuss the type of music they want played at their affair.

Both are open to requests.

"The party has to have a balance because we're catering to all ages," Miller says. To meet the variety, it may help to hire a band that has several singers.

In The Sky's Band, there are four singers as part of the 11-piece crew. "Each of our lead singers specializes in a different field," Kast says.

"For example, we have one for the disco era, one for Frank Sinatra-type music and one for hip-hop."

Miller alters the size of the band and the number of singers depending on the affair. The different configurations range from five to 10 people. And while he says the size of the band should relate to the nature of the affair, in general, "the more, the merrier. Everybody adds energy to the sound."

DJs have become increasingly popular over the years and Kast and Miller note they have created a comfortable niche, especially for kids.

The distinction Miller makes between a band and DJ is the tone they set for the party. "When you want an elegant party, you want live entertainment," he says.

Because of the high number of bands on the party circuit, it is advisable to book more than a year in advance.

And to find potential bands, there is no better means than word of mouth.

"The best advice is to ask the people around you – your community, your friends," says Miller.

To reach Shelley Miller, call 416-481-1034 or e-mail him at Shelleymiller@rogers.com. To reach Morris Kast, call 416-565-1620.

Mr. DJ provides fun for the whole family

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

People who throw a bash usually hope that every guest will revel in the fun. Ed McMurtry of Mr. Disc Jockey says guest participation isn't just a goal at functions, it's a must.

"The number 1 complaint from people who are unhappy with their parties is that the kids are being entertained and the adults are driven out of the room or vice versa," McMurtry says. "We have a unique style that combines adults and kids in the same room."

Mr. DJ's parties are in fact full-scale shows with diverse themes. At one party where hockey was the theme, Mr. DJ's entertainment crew stationed themselves in a penalty box, with Plexiglass and hockey boards.

At another affair, "guests arrived to have Charlie Chaplin escort them on a freight elevator, down to a larger sound stage to a starry reception," McMurtry says. "We had pieces of broken glass glued to threads, like rain drops in the air."

While some mingled with dress-up movie stars, others were treated to music at a set turned into Studio 54.

Mr. DJ's events can involve up to 35 production people, including a DJ, MC and the company's band, The Loud Neighbours.

The company, in its 12th year, also likes to do tribute videos for families.

McMurtry urges clients to not simply pop in for a few moments to inspect someone else's event, but rather come to the studio to see a film of an actual affair.

"We like to find out what the families are all about," he says.

He says it's important for clients to sit down with the entertainment company and bounce ideas off one another to come up with a unique party plan.

Along with the entertainment, there should also be plenty of props for guests to take home.

"We try to give out party favours that go along with the music," says McMurtry. "So for Latin music, we might give out classy moroccas."At other events, guests will leave with necklaces or "funky sunglasses."

McMurtry says some families are more formal than others and the party will be planned in accordance with their tastes.

As an example of something less traditional, McMurtry said that instead of speeches, one family put on their very own live theatre number.

"What we want is a surprise factor," he says. "We want people to see what they would never expect."

Two longtime retailers advise on dressy attire for children

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

When your son or daughter gets to Grade 7, the bar/bat mitzvah circuit begins. Your child's social calendar may rival that of the busiest socialite, and you'll need to find some fine quality dressy children's attire that will hold up for the year.

You can get some expert advice on what to buy from two long-standing retailers who have been dressing children for decades. Beatties, at 430 Eglinton Ave. W. near Avenue Road (416-481-4459), predominantly sells boys' apparel, while Maison Vali, at 112 Cumberland St. in Yorkville (416-923-3117) and 270 The Kingsway (416-239-5583), specializes in girl's clothing.

Elvira Vali is founder of the two Maison Vali stores, which offer medium- to high-end childrenswear. The store is known for fashion for girls. Vali's daughter Barbara now manages the retail business, while Vali focuses her attention on designing. Maison Vali carries garments for newborns to size 16 and can dress girls as old as 12 and 13.

Vali is a fashion designer who was manufacturing children apparel for some 40 years. She recently sold the manufacturing plant, Petite Originals, but she has stayed on as a designer. Vali designs a line of clothing under her own label, Elvira Vali, which is available in the United States and Canada.

"I am basically a fashion designer for little and bigger girls," she says.

Maison Vali carries her label, as well as imports from Europe and the United States.

"Maison Vali is the place people come to for a bat mitzvah or wedding," Vali says. "We do a fair number of bat mitzvahs. People come when they're seeking out something special."

How dressy the garment one chooses is depends on the taste of the parents and the child, says Vali. "It could be a suit or a dress with embellishment.

"The jacket dress is very popular. The bat mitzvah girl can cover up her shoulders and arms for the service and then she can bear her arms for the party."

As for sophistication, Vali says girls 10 and up prefer the junior looks and have a preference for gowns. "They like to look older than age 10.

"Girls try to get more fashionable at a younger and younger age. Some of them choose slinky clothes and slim, body-revealing garments, which I don't approve of for children. Today's 13-year-old girl – you wouldn't know she's 13. She looks 20 at least. They make themselves look older."

In the fall and winter, Vali says velvets are popular, both cotton and stretch velvet. "I use stretch velvet on top and an organza skirt. The dress can be pulled on over the head."

She notes that Kupro fabric, which feels like viscose, is used in many European-made garments. "It's washable, comfortable and soft, and it drapes nicely."

Cotton knits embellished with faux fur are another trend, according to Vali.

"It's suitable for semi-dressy affairs. You can go to a fine gathering without being formally dressed. We have hats to match. This style is always a popular item with us."

The soft feather-style boa is also a popular accessory, she adds.

Vali says cranberry, pumpkin, burnt orange and burgundy are the big colours for fall and winter this year.

Girls are also wearing a lot of black, she notes. "I adore black on kids. With the proper adornments, girls can look just smashing in black. I think back to Coco Chanel. She always had the little black dress. It's one of those safe classics. It applies to adults and juniors, as long as it's properly designed."

Vali does not see a lot of silk dresses for formal wear, because silk is not practical, she explains. "Today's parent wants to pass on garments and have the children wear them for more than one occasion."

As for the length of the garment, Vali says there are no hard rules. "A nice mid-calf dress, is very comfortable, instead of long to the ankle. It's very chic with the proper shoes and hose. For graduation, most of the girls wear long dresses."

Maison Vali carries what Vali describes as a "stunning," classic, double-breasted pea coat in wool imported from Italy. "People come from very far away to get the coat. Very few stores buy such expensive coats. It comes with a matching hat.

"We carry velvet hooded coats. We also have a stunning black cape. People usually buy it for formal wear. Not too many stores carry that cape."

While there are many options for female attire, the choices for boys are more limited, and thankfully, parents can easily find everything their sons need at a boyswear store with a large selection.

Beatties can outfit boys of all ages and sizes (husky as well) from head to toe in casual and dress clothes. There is also a men's division.

Dave Hadden, president of Beatties, grew up at the midtown store that was co-founded by his father, Bruce Hadden, in 1950. Beatties, which occupies a 4,000-square-foot retail space, offers fashionable, higher quality clothing, Hadden says.

"We carry brand names like Ralph Lauren, Tommy Bahama, Nautica, Timberland North 44... We really focus on offering special values on brand names for our customers."

Hadden offers several suggestions for dressing boys, including tips on buying suits, to consider when your own son has his turn on the bimah.

"For the bar mitzvah boy you're basically looking for a three-button suit in black or navy," advises Hadden. "Between sports jackets and suits, I never have less than 1,200 pieces. So people can always find what they're looking for in their size."

There's also a huge selection in dress shirts and ties. "We stock, at any given time, 500 to 800 dress shirts in different colours and sizes to meet our customers' needs."

As for accessories, Beatties is the only store in Toronto with Perry Ellis ties. Hadden says, noting that tone on tone ties (the shirt and tie are the same colour) are very popular.

Along with their extensive clothing collection, Beatties is known for service, Hadden says. "We pride ourselves on our service. We have our own in-house tailor. Dina Zak has been with us for over 20 years.

"Dina will re-cut the suit to fit the boys perfectly. She's a perfectionist... from the old school. Every garment has to be perfect. She knows every garment, and she knows what has to be done."

Hadden suggests that people buy the bar mitzvah suit six months ahead of time. "I reserve it for them. They come back for the fitting about two weeks before the bar mitzvah. We don't alter it until then. We'll change the suit if the child has a growth spurt."

Every bar mitzvah suit comes with a $25 gift certificate, he adds.

An elegant but more relaxed look is the blazer, which is often worn by the bar mitzvah guest rather than the bar mitzvah boy, says Hadden. "Navy or black are the most common. Boy's fashions follow the trends in menswear. Boy's blazers these days are single- breasted, three-button because that's what the men are wearing."

He notes that vests have fallen out of fashion, as have cuff pants, but an Italian knit long-sleeve polo-style shirt is an important casual dressy look for boys. The blazer can be paired with a mock turtle neck or a knit polo shirt, which can be worn instead of a dress shirt, Hadden says.

Beatties carries a line of dress shirts for boys that require very little or almost no ironing, he says. "Just throw them in the washing machine and dryer."

According to Hadden, the bar mitzvah boy should go with a white shirt because it's dressier than any other colour, but the guests can choose from a variety of colours.

"Shirts made from microfibre are very popular because they're comfortable for the kids and they look dressy. They come in a full range of colours and they wash and wear well."

The bar mitzvah is one of the most important days in your child's life, says Hadden. But "whatever the occasion, we make sure your child will look his best."

Tolerance is the key to compatibility between in-laws

By ELAINE COHEN
Business and Supplements Co-ordinator

Authors Eden Unger Bowditch and Aviva Samet start off The Daughter-in-law's Survival Guide on a positive note. The pair dedicate the book to their devoted husbands with the following phrase – "without whom we would not be daughters-in-law."

Bowditch is a journalist and Samet is a family therapist. They may have chosen different career paths, but the authors have known each other since childhood. They interviewed more than 50 daughters-in-law and carried out further research in writing this short, easy-to-read softcover pocket guide.

The bibliography will come in handy for readers interested in following up on the subject. Moreover, the authors don't bring themselves into the story. They draw a fresh perspective and use firsthand quotes from the daughters-in-law they interview. The latter hail from diverse backgrounds, but it's easy to relate to what each has to say.

In some instances, interviewees were concerned about the jealousy that existed between the bride's mother-in-law and her mother. These young women tried to perform a balancing act to ward off hard feelings.

These kinds of scenarios illustrate how, unwittingly, problems can arise. And it's not just about the wife, husband and mother-in-law – other dynamics are part of this complicated set-up.

When you marry, your mate comes with "baggage."

Whether your mate's family lives close by or far away, the in-law's influence, or lack of it, creeps into the relationship.

The parent-child bond stretches beyond the umbilical cord, so soaking up the information in this guide can help breed tolerance and prevent stressful situations.

As the authors attest, good intentions can be marred by a lack of understanding, which can end up causing a rift. The plot thickens when grandchildren enter the picture, as the interviewees reported based on various situations they had encountered.

In the introductory chapter, the authors describe the practices of different ethnic groups. They provide the reader with an enlightening window on cultural conventions.

Bowditch and Samet dislike the negative connotation associated with the term "mother-in-law." Instead, they prefer the French term belle mere. With regard to family, they laud the Yiddish word machetunim, derived from the Hebrew word mechutan meaning "relative by marriage".

Distributed by Raincoast Books in Canada, The Daughter-in-law's Survival Guide is a must-read for brides or "significant others."

The authors summarize each chapter with thought-provoking questions for daughters-in-law. Here are some examples from an early chapter titled "Where do we stand? An overview."

How would you describe your relationship with our mother-in-law? Good, bad or ugly? Are there any particular events or issues that illustrate why you feel this way? Can you describe those events or issues?

The last chapter, "Advice from daughters-in-law to daughters-in-law," simulates an Internet chat room, but it works equally well in print.

If you love each other enough..marriage is still not easy!

By COURTNEY NATHAN

Anyone who has been married knows the real truth that marriage is hard work and, while it might get easier over time, marriage always takes effort.

This is the number one thing I tell newly engaged couples in the marriage preparation class sponsored by Jewish Family Service, "I Do!"

Sure, engagement is exciting and happy and planning a wedding can be fun, even thrilling at times. But the real nitty-gritty that happens once you've said your "I dos" is what people rarely talk or think about beforehand.

The word "newlywed" conjures up images of smiling, happy couples in love, holding hands, dancing and kissing.

But a couple that is newly wed is not very different from anything else that's new. A new car, for example, may look shiny on the outside and smells clean and fresh. Yet, the seat isn't quite comfortable until you've sat in it for awhile, and all of those fancy gadgets can be confusing until you learn exactly what every one does and how to use it.

Same thing with a new pair of shoes. They look perfect and they go with everything in your closet, but for the first few weeks, they hurt your feet. It isn't until you wear them and they stretch a little, mold to the shape of your foot and get broken in that you realize how much you adore them and you can't believe you ever lived without them.

Marriage isn't any different.

Rabbi Harold Schulweis has this to say about marriage in the book, Fighting for Your Jewish Marriage: "Love in marriage is a gift, a potentiality to be cultivated. Marital love is a subtle art that calls for sustained and sensitive appreciation....The art of loving relies on a conscious sensibility, an awareness of the other who is not a mere extension of the self. The other is not an ear into which the 'I' can shout its wants and angers."

Marriage is about two people actively working together. It is complicated and it doesn't always feel good.

There is a great deal of pressure on newly engaged and recently married couples to be happy, even blissful. Yet, planning a wedding can be extremely stressful. Strong emotions surface, and family dynamics play out in often ugly and complicated ways. Religious feelings often become more pronounced, potentially creating difficulty for both interfaith and endogamous couples.

If you love each other enough..marriage is still not easy!

And that's just the beginning. Everyday married life raises all kinds of challenges as well. Suddenly you are both truly accountable to another person and must share in decision making wholeheartedly.

As Einhorn and Zimmerman write in their book, In the Beginning: How to Survive Your Engagement and Build a Great Marriage, "The responsibilities of giving each other emotional support, spending time together, co-ordinating finances, and taking care of personal health all require each partner to curtail many of his or her formerly solitary activities."

What does this mean for newly engaged and recently married couples? It means you should be aware that this is a critical time that is full of promise but is also emotionally loaded. Tread carefully through this time.

Talk with your partner about your feelings, fears, expectations and needs. And don't feel crazy or bad if you're not always feeling happy. Nobody feels happy all the time, and pretending like you do or pressuring yourself to feel that way only compounds normal problems and tensions.

In their provocative book, In the Beginning, Einhorn and Zimmerman suggest that at some point during engagement or early marriage every person asks him- or herself, "What did I get myself into?" Einhorn and Zimmerman assure the reader that this is a normal projection of marital anxiety that should be explored to determine its true source. They offer couples several questions to help evaluate the strength and health of their marriage.

- Do we have similar values?
- Do we respect each other?
- Does each of us admire qualities in our partner?
- Are we attracted to each other?
- Do we feel affection for each other?
- Do my trusted friends and relatives like the person I've chosen?

These are good questions to ask yourself and your partner to help you identify the strengths and potential pitfalls in your relationship. But remember, feelings change regularly and a marital foundation is built over time and maintained through diligent effort.

Reknowned psychologist Judith Wallerstein, Ph.D., studied divorce for 25 years before she decided to focus on what factors helped happy marriages stay happy. Her research resulted in the book, The Good Marriage (with Sandra Blakeslee, 1995), where she profiles four types of happy marriages:

Romantic, Rescue, Companionate and Traditional.

She says, "Of all human relationships, marriage is the most complex, the one you can tell the least about from the outside."

In The Good Marriage, Wallerstein suggests nine tasks that form the basis of a good, lasting relationship in her book:

- Separate emotionally from their childhood family and redefine that relationship
- Create intimacy while each person also retains autonomy
- Take on the role of parents while still protecting the marriage's intimacy
- Confront the crises of life and stay close no matter how difficult
- Feel safe expressing anger, conflict and differences of opinion
- Create a rich sexual relationship and maintain it despite hectic lifestyles
- Use humor to keep things in perspective and have fun
- Comfort, support and encourage each other
- Sustain early romantic images of falling in love with the other

With all the media mythology about romance, soul mates, wedded bliss and the many other fallacies of marriage, how could we not get caught up in search for marital perfection?

But just as the frightening movie Fatal Attraction isn't the norm, neither is soap opera passion (at least in the long term).

Marriage is about finding someone you like, trust, respect and value enough to want to spend the rest of your life with, create a home and a family with and sacrifice for. That's a lot to ask for and should not be taken lightly.

And despite all the work and the stress and the pressure, the payoff is tremendous. Knowing that you have found someone to love and trust and that you have made a commitment to stay together through thick and thin, to share life's challenges and triumphs together and that you are both willing to work to maintain a relationship for the rest of your lives...that's pretty special.

That's what dreams are made of.

Courtney Nathan is an outreach Co-ordinator at Jewish Family Service in the United States.

Leave the planning of bar, bat mitzvahs in Israel to the professionals

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

A bar or bat mitzvah in Israel links a milestone in an individual Jewish life to the 5,000-year heritage of the Jewish people.

Stanley Morais, EL AL Israel Airlines' sales and marketing manager for Canada (416-967-4222), says this experience can be enhanced even further by flying with Israel's national airline.

EL AL, with only 37 planes, does not have a large fleet. But its reputation for security is unsurpassed and sets the standard for other countries. It also has a strong reputation for its service.

EL AL has gone to great lengths to facilitate bar and bat mitzvah travel to Israel. The company flies Toronto-Tel Aviv non-stop in Boeing's newest aircraft, the 777. There are individual screens with five or six channels in each seat. But all this is an adjunct to the essential Israel experience.

For 11 hours, Morais points out, you will be in the air en route. With EL AL, it's almost as if you're in Israel before you arrive. The experience on board is a preliminary to the celebration. Virtually all your fellow passengers are going to a common destination and share a heritage with you. The first language you hear when you step on board is Hebrew.

When a bar or bat mitzvah is celebrated in Israel, it demonstrates a commitment to the future of the Jewish state. It also gives a Canadian boy or girl some insight into how teens come of age differently in Israel.

At 13, an Israeli teenager knows that he or she will be serving in the army in five years. This prospect, plus Israel's ever-present need for security, means that these young boys and girls don't take life for granted.

Visitors also see the vibrance of Israeli culture. Despite the constant threat of terror, Israelis go to their jobs, laugh and quarrel, drink coffee in cafés. Life triumphs over adversity.

Samara Kleinman of the Israel Government Tourist Office (416-964-3784; email info@igto.ca; Web site www.goisrael.com) says more and more Canadians considering a bar or bat mitzvah in Israel leave the planning to the professionals. Many tour operators, organizations, synagogues and specialty travel sponsors arrange group tours for families.

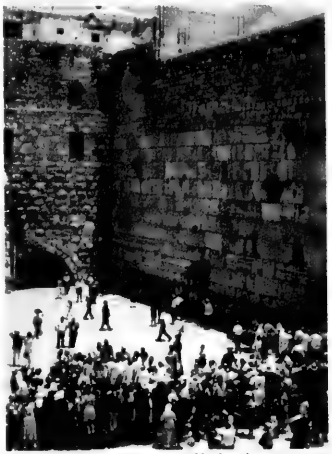
While parents gain relief from the work and pressure of planning, the bnei or bnot mitzvah befriend each other. This special bond reduces nervousness, and transforms what is an ordeal for some children, into a magical vacation and spiritual experience for the entire family.

Tours are arranged during school vacations and include special discounts, or even a free tour, for the bar or bat mitzvah.

Many organizations and travel sponsors make individual family arrangements similar to those for groups, or let you customize your itinerary. The planning is still left to professionals, but offers the privacy some families prefer.

Some parents who are familiar with Israel, or who have family and friends there, prefer to handle everything themselves.

Here are some bits of information: The Israel Government Tourist Office provides a certificate, free of charge, for those celebrating their bar or bat mitzvah at the Western Wall. The celebrant's name is in calligraphy, and the certificate is signed by the minister of tourism.



If you're taking a group or individual tour with an experienced operator or sponsor, they make arrangements for obtaining the certificate. Requests for certificates for families planning the arrangements themselves must be made at least 21 days before the ceremony.

Ceremony locations are: the Western Wall and tunnels, in the Orthodox tradition; the Southern Wall, according to you and your rabbi's traditions; the Tower of David Museum of the History of Jerusalem, and the Hurva Synagogue, for private ceremonies; Neot Kedumim nature preserve; Masada, according to the Orthodox, Conservative, Reform or Reconstructionist traditions; and any synagogue of your choice. [IGTO pictures]

A wedding in Prague

By FRANCES GOODMAN PELLATT
Special to The CJN

A little over a year following their introduction, a Toronto couple was planning their wedding in a world far removed from their everyday life.

Fifty years after his maternal grandparents fled the onset of Communism in Czechoslovakia, Jonathan Center returned there to marry his bride Tania Lewis. The wedding took place July 29 at the Altneu Shul in Prague, now part of the Czech Republic.

"Part of the reason [they chose this venue] was that they did not want a conventional wedding," said Jonathan's mom Vera Center, who recently retired as vice-principal at Herzliah.

Tania, originally from South Africa, is a social worker and Jonathan, from Montreal, is a dentist. They have no attachment to any synagogue but are both drawn to Jewish traditions. They researched and organized their wedding without sharing their plans with anyone. The idea took root when the itinerary for a summer family trip to the region was finalized last spring.

"Five years ago, Jonathan's zaide, Joseph Lazarovic, did a family vacation of his own with his daughters and their husbands," said Tania from her home in Toronto's Kensington Market, the neighbourhood where most of the city's Jews lived in the early half of the 20th century.

"They spent time in Prague," she continued, "and visited the oldest synagogue in Europe, the Altneu Shul [the Old-New Synagogue], where Zaide Joe had an aliyah on Shabbat."

Tania Lewis and Jonathan Center outside the Altneu Synagogue in Prague.

Jonathan, who had also previously been to Prague on the 1988 inaugural March of the Living, was impressed by the Old Jewish Ghetto and particularly the cemetery and the Altneu Shul. But it was Tania's idea to get married in the magical 700-year old synagogue.

Jonathan Center and Tania Lewis exchange marriage vows

"Our idea came more from knowing exactly what we didn't want for our wedding rather than what we did want," said the couple, who said they wanted to do something unique and memorable. They told their parents and siblings about their plans a mere four weeks before the date.

"We were stunned. It was totally out of our realm of thought, but we were delighted," said Vera, who was born in Czechoslovakia and emigrated with her parents.

"The only part that was difficult was keeping it a secret for a month," said Vera, whose husband Steve is a retired high school teacher.

Tania said the most problematic part of the arrangements was connecting with the synagogue's rabbi to find out if it was possible for them to be married there. After numerous e-mails and meetings with Toronto rabbis, the couple was given the phone number for the chief rabbi of the Czech Republic and the Altneu Synagogue – Rabbi Sidon, who only speaks Czech and Hebrew.

They had several phone conversations with the rabbi, who assured them it was possible for their marriage to take place in his synagogue as long as they provided proof from the Canadian government that they had not been married and that their mothers were Jewish.

The Altneu Synagogue, like all synagogues in Prague, falls under the umbrella of the Jewish Museum of Prague and the Orthodox Rabbinate. Three rabbis officiated at the ceremony, which was performed in Hebrew (the sermon and jokes were in English). Jonathan's zaide's tallit was used as the chupah.

The small wedding party consisted only of immediate family, but it grew to about 30 people when a group of lost Israeli tourists overheard the singing in the synagogue and joined the simchah. There were also witnesses from Prague's Jewish community.

The couple knew there would be some family members and friends who would be shocked and perhaps disappointed about not being invited to or told about the wedding.

"[But u]ltimately we knew that everyone would be enthusiastic and happy for us and respect the fact that it was our wedding – we did it in a way that was meaningful to us," the newlyweds said.

A reception for friends and family members will be held in Toronto next month.

Creating a theme:

Tammy Heisel of Artistic Creations (905-770-9335) creates many exciting themes for parties, like this "Hawaii theme" she did recently.
Asked what her favourite decor theme is, she said she's done so many it's hard to pick just one.
"I've been lucky enough to create so many themes for bar and bat mitzvahs that it would be impossible to choose my favourite. I just love to create a themed party, especially when the children themselves choose the theme. That way when they walk into the finished room, they see exactly what they were hoping for. The Hawaii theme that we did a while back was a great theme."

PARTY PLANNER

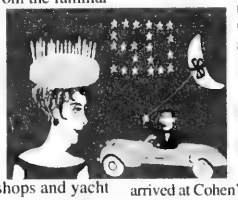
Non-traditional parties

By EFRAT SHALOM
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Actress Odeya Koren organized a surprise 50th birthday for her spouse near Mitzpeh Massu'ah in the Judean plain. When he was brought there on some pretext, he found some 50 friends and relatives preparing for a bike ride under a full moon. After the ride, an hour and a half later, they were taken into a cave where candles had been lit and rugs placed around low tables. As music played in the background, the guests enjoyed a catered meal.

"It was definitely not a banal birthday celebration," says Koren. "Some of the guests hadn't ridden a bicycle in 30 years or so. I wanted to make these 50-year-olds, who are settled in their ways, go back in time."

The Korens aren't the only ones to stray from the familiar tradition of birthday celebrations. Recently, many people have been replacing traditional 50th birthday parties with some very carefully planned and unconventional events. Instead of an intimate dinner in a restaurant surrounded by a small circle of relatives, they are having catered meals in caves and forest clearings. The modest surprise party at home is being replaced by treks all over the country, special performances by well-known artists, laughter workshops and yacht cruises with some guests.



For sums of $5,000-40,000, Tova Wald, a field trip and special events organizer, cooks up grand birthday parties. For example, one 17th-century style event was held in a Crusader castle surrounded by an olive orchard. To the sound of trumpets, the guest of honour was surprised to find 20 of his friends dressed in period costumes bowing to him, while others greeted him from horseback.

Another party was held in a house adjacent to a pecan orchard that was rented for the occasion in which the 50-year-old was astonished to find his friends, family and the singers Mati Caspi and Shlomo Gronich. After the singers and a gourmet meal, came an artistic program: Several of the guests presented the guest of honour's favourite Gashash Hahiver comedy troupe skit and his wife did a drag skit that a choreographer helped her prepare.

Dr. Vered Vinitzky-Serousi, a Hebrew University sociologist, thinks the need for grandiose statements on the part of one spouse is an indication of the nature of the couple's relationship.

"I'm totally unconvinced that this is a positive manifestation of the relationship between the couple. Maybe it actually stems from a desire to get out of a problematic routine," she says.

Wald also figures that unconventional 50th birthday parties are a kind of stimulant, reflecting a desire to generate renewed interest. "The kids have grown up, the relationship is known and familiar and this is the time to create new excitement," she says.

Tami Ramot, 49, of Yavneh, dragged her husband to an afternoon movie one Friday. During the intermission, when he went out to stretch his legs, he was astonished to find many of his friends coming out of all four movie theaters. Ramot did not settle for just renting the four movie theatres when the movies were over, the 50 guests enjoyed a catered meal in the foyer.

"Everyone will remember this birthday party because it was different," she says. "I assume that if I'd arranged a conventional party, I wouldn't have been excited about it. Here my adrenalin was really flowing."

Sociologist Amir Ben-Porat of Ben-Gurion University argues that the new trend is prevalent in the social strata that can be described as the new middle class – well to do, educated and consumers of cosmopolitan culture.

"At the age of 50, they are financially established and that's why they can afford to invest in their leisure-time activities. They are consumers of knowledge, spirituality, culture and trips all over the world," he explains. "It's questionable Israeliness, because this generation is more educated than their parents' generation, most of whom arrived here as immigrants."

Vinitzky-Serousi argues that these parties are a declaration of economic and social power. According to her, "the grandiose parties are certainly a function of available capital and leisure time."

Danny Gotwin, a Haifa University historian, thinks that the showiness of birthday celebrations is representative of consumer culture that is very typical of the middle class.

"The ability to experience something exciting and personal is negated by the need to produce a grandiose event that will be talked about the next day. In the past, couples would enjoy an intimate dinner at a restaurant and didn't need other people. Today, such experiences are not satisfying," says Gotwin.

Many events use elements drawn from the celebrant's childhood – such as goody bags filled with candies and childhood friends from different periods of his life, invited to fulfill a nostalgic longing. According to Vinitzky-Serousi, this nostalgia is usually a reaction to a crisis stemming from a transition period, which typically occurred around age 40.

"It is possible that this built-in mid-life crisis at 40 has skipped a decade," she says. "Due to an increase in lifespan and quality of life, the mental and cultural perception of 50-year-olds has changed. They are well established, healthy and look good and that's why they're keeping their heads high. However, while the spirit wants to show its vitality, the effects of age start to show up on the body."

Pnina Cohen decided to mark her 50th birthday with a party celebrating femininity, inspired by Anita Diament's book, The Red Tent. All 25 guests received a carefully designed invitation by email, including a request to bring a gift and some kind of dish suitable for a dinner.

On the day of the event, at 11 a.m. the guests arrived at Cohen's home on Moshav Bnei Atarot. A red tent was set up in the loft on the upper floor, sunlight shone through it and a red light shone in the inside of the tent where mattresses, rugs, pillows and candles were distributed around.

Inside the tent, the guests attended a seminar on "The Five Tibetans" – a Tibetan exercise method for restoring one's youth – and a belly dancer taught them how to swing their hips. At 8 p.m., after a dinner downstairs, the party ended.

Cohen says she was very moved by the way she marked her 50th birthday. "I managed to introduce the many friends I've made over the years: friends of mine from age five through university came. All of them shared recollections about me and it was a kind of retrospective on my life".

The cultural perception of age 50 leads to a desire for a new opportunity for self-actualization. Cohen, for example, now works in building up brand names; she dropped out of her academic studies around 25 years ago, and recently went back to university to complete her undergraduate degree in culture and sociology.

"There's a feeling that now, while we are still healthy and strong, is an opportunity to utilize one's full potential," she says. "I don't have women friends who say 'now that I'm a grandmother, I'll puree fruit in the blender for my grandchildren.' On the contrary. Many of my friends are packing a sleeping bag and heading off on treks to Alaska. My sister-in-law, just before she turned 50, packed a backpack, said goodbye to her husband and children and left for a stay of several months in northern India."

Cohen also says that her contemporaries – who belong to the founding generation of the state – lived for many years in a reality that did not encourage individualism.

"We grew up in an ascetic reality of total enlistment in the cause of the nation: the Tzena (post-statehood period of rationing), memorial days and monuments. Our parents, with their shattered dreams, had high expectations for us. We shouldered a huge load and we sped along in life's rat race. Now the desire to connect to ourselves is surfacing, the desire to do what we want and not what's expected of us."

Magen David Adom, CCRA cut a deal

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

The national president of Canadian Magen David Adom for Israel (CMDA) says the organization has made a deal with the federal tax department that will allow it to keep its charitable status, despite a Federal Court of Appeal ruling that " would have it revoked."

Joseph Bitton said CMDA has entered into an agreement with the charities directorate of the Canada Customs and Revenue Agency (CCRA) that "will enable our cause to continue uninterrupted.

"We are delighted that we will continue to be able to solicit the support of the Canadian community for our fundraising activities. Tax deductible receipts will be issued as usual," he said in a press release.

In an interview, Bitton said CMDA had not as of last week received the agreement in writing, but he expected it imminently and felt confident enough to make the announcement.

Bitton said he believed National Revenue Minister Elinor Caplan intervened, although CMDA had not directly asked her to. "There were lots of letters [of protest] from around the world, and an online petition that obtained over 4,300 signatures. Articles appeared in local, national and international newspapers," Bitton said.

"This case has caused an uproar and I think [Caplan] recognized that the problem had to be settled."

Israelis invest billions in Canada

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

In 1998, the Israeli government implemented a measure aimed at improving conditions for its domestic economy, one which has had an unexpected impact on the Canadian real estate market as well.

In that year, restrictions on currency flows were relaxed, freeing pent-up capital and prompting Israeli investors to pour billions of dollars into properties abroad, including almost $4 billion in Canada.

In the last year and a half alone, more than $2 billion in Israeli investment has flowed into Canadian real estate, primarily in Montreal and Toronto, and those numbers can be expected to increase, say Gil Blutrich and Galia Feiler.

Blutrich and Feiler are well-acquainted with the Canadian real estate market and its attraction to Israeli investors. Blutrich is president of Skyline International Development Inc., a Canadian-based corporation

Shuls on 'hit list' respond

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Jewish officials say it is not surprising that four synagogues were included on a list of high profile terrorist targets in Canada that U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell was reportedly going to turn over to Foreign Affairs Minister Bill Graham last week.

The synagogues were part of a list of 22 prominent Canadian targets that Osama bin Laden's Al Qaeda network might target, according to a report in the National Post. The list includes such prominent landmarks as the CN Tower, the Peace Bridge and houses of Parliament.

However Powell said he only heard of the list through published reports. "I have no such list," he told reporters in Ottawa.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Seifert Hearing

VANCOUVER — The British Columbia Supreme Court began hearings last week into whether a former Nazi prison guard is fit to face an extradition hearing. The wife of Michael Seifert testified that his mental condition deteriorated after he suffered a fall earlier this year. Seifert, 78, is a former SS officer convicted in absentia in Italy for raping, torturing and killing prisoners at a Nazi concentration camp in World War II. A Canadian of Ukrainian origin, Seifert faces possible extradition to Italy to serve a life sentence. Ottawa has already begun the process of stripping him of his citizenship.

New Safe House

VANCOUVER — Jewish Women International of Canada and the Jewish Family Service Agency are in the process of setting up an Alternative Short Term Emergency Housing (ASTEH) shelter for women and their children who are fleeing abusive partners. The facility, which will open in the next few weeks, was made possible by the donation of an apartment and a grant from the Jewish Community Foundation of Greater Vancouver. There are similar homes in Toronto, Montreal and Winnipeg.

ISRAEL

Tourism Up Slightly

JERUSALEM — There has been an increase in the number of tourists visiting Israel in recent months, the Central Bureau of Statistics says. According to figures published last week, there has been a 2.5 per cent increase since May, with some 65,000 tourists entering monthly, Israel Radio reported.

Sprinzak Dies

JERUSALEM — Israeli political scientist Ehud Sprinzak, a counter-terrorism expert and adviser to prime ministers, died Nov. 8 of cancer at 62. Sprinzak was recognized around the world as an authority on terrorism, extremist politics and the radical right in Israel. He was founding dean of the Lauder School of Government, Diplomacy and Strategy at the Interdisciplinary Center in Herzliyah, after teaching for many years at Hebrew University.

Pollard Campaign

JERUSALEM — The Jerusalem-based Committee to Bring Jonathan Pollard Home says it is stepping up the campaign to have Israel press the United States to release the jailed 48-year-old former U.S. Navy intelligence analyst. On Nov. 21, Pollard begins his 18th year of a life sentence for passing classified U.S. military information to the Jewish state. Committee chairman Yehoshua Steinberg said Pollard has been used as a bargaining chip in ongoing peace talks, but that "at the close of each negotiation, the U.S. backed down from its promises" to release him.

WORLD

Nimoy Nudes

NEW YORK — Actor Leonard Nimoy, now on a 16-city book tour, was forced out of the Detroit Jewish Book Fair earlier this month after objections by some local Jewish leaders to his book Shekhina, a photo collection that includes pictures of naked women wrapped in Jewish ritual objects. Nimoy, who played Spock on TV's Star Trek, appeared instead at Temple Shir Shalom, a congregation in the area. Meanwhile, Rabbi Steven Dworken, executive vice president of the Rabbinical Council of America, e-mailed 1,000 RCA members accusing Nimoy of "debasing" the Shchinah – the feminine aspect of the divine spirit – and urged them to protest the book.

JDL Leader Dies

LOS ANGELES — Jewish Defence League leader Irv Rubin, who had been hospitalized for more than a week after trying to commit suicide in jail, has died. Rubin, 57, had been in a medically induced coma since Nov. 4. He and fellow JDL member Earl Krugel had been in jail awaiting trial since December for allegedly planning to bomb a mosque and the office of a congressman. Authorities said an investigation confirmed his death to be the result of a suicide attempt after Rubin's wife had called for a probe, believing he would not have tried to take his own life.

Harvard Disinvites Controversial Poet

BOSTON — Harvard's English department last week retracted an invitation to Irish poet Tom Paulin, who once said West Bank settlers should be "shot dead."

After student complaints, department chair Lawrence Buell said in a statement the reading had been cancelled "by mutual consent of the poet and the English department." Buell also said he "sincerely regretted the widespread consternation that has arisen as a result" of the invitation.

The invitation to deliver the prestigious Morris Gray poetry reading "had been originally decided on last winter solely on the basis of Mr. Paulin's lifetime accomplishments as a poet," the statement said.

Paulin, an Oxford University lecturer whose award-winning work has explored violence in Northern Ireland, told an Egyptian newspaper earlier this year that "Brooklyn-born" Jewish settlers should be "shot dead."

"I think they are Nazis, racists. I feel nothing but hatred for them," he also was quoted as saying. "I can understand how suicide bombers feel."

In his poem Killed in the Crossfire, he writes of "another little Palestinian boy in trainers jeans and a white teeshirt" killed by the "Zionist SS."

Paulin did not respond to media requests for comment last week. But in an April letter to the Daily Telegraph, he said he is not anti-Semitic and his views had been distorted.

Israel, U.S. blamed for world's problems

Visiting York U professor talks on Remembrance Day

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

The United States is to blame for all of the world's problems and American policy is being driven by an Israeli agenda, says a York University visiting professor.

Aijaz Ahmad, who has published articles titled The Nazification of Israel and Israel's Killing Fields, told a group of 50 students and faculty members that former Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak and current Prime Minister Ariel Sharon conspired to bring about the second intifadah in order to convince America to intervene in the Middle East.

Ahmad was speaking on Remembrance Day in York's sociology common room on the topic Politics in the Middle East.

According to the office of the Dean of Arts, Ahmad has been a visiting professor at York since July 1, 1997.

In his presentation last week, Ahmad said, "Never before have I seen a situation where the client [Israel] consistently dictates policy of the patron [United States]."

In terms of Israel and the United States, Ahmad said there is a "power structure which links the two."

He explained that U.S. Defence Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and a group of advisers, including Richard Perle, are directing President George W. Bush.

This is the same group who advised incoming Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu in 1996 and exemplifies "the enormous weight Israel commands in the United States," said Ahmad, who is also a professorial fellow at the Nehru Memorial Museum and Library in New Delhi.

York Prof. Eric Lawee said "the talk was full of problematic illusions and misrepresentations."

There was an anti-democratic theme that ran throughout the talk, Lawee said, noting that Ahmad criticized the political parties in the United States and Israel without ever acknowledging that they were freely elected.

"There was absolutely no analysis of issues that might have affected voters – such as terrorism or suicide bombers.

"American and Israeli policies were blamed for absolutely everything," said Lawee, who was present for most of the talk.

Lawee also said that Ahmad's article comparing Israel to Nazi Germany was not only inflammatory, but wholly scandalous on academic grounds.

"I would say this man is obsessive in his search for [ostensible] American and Israeli crimes," Lawee added.

In a letter to the department of political science, Canadian Jewish Congress executive director Bernie Farber expressed "great concern about Mr. Aijaz Ahmad."

Farber noted that in Ahmad's writings, "Israel's actions are frequently compared to the actions of the Nazis or those of Cambodia's Pol Pot" and that in Farber's view, such language "crosses the anti-Semitic line."

York's dean of arts, Robert Drummond, said that if Ahmad's articles cross any legal line, there are means at law to deal with that.

"Otherwise it is my practice not to expect that I will agree with everything my colleagues write but to defend their freedom to write it," Drummond said.

It would be up to a court to decide whether Ahmad is guilty of any crime, he said.

However, Prof. Martin Lockshin, director of York's Centre for Jewish Studies, said that Ahmad is definitely "guilty of shoddy and offensive scholarship.

"I don't know how a person like this can get an appointment at York University and I intend to look into it and take steps that it won't happen again," Lockshin said.

Ahmad's talk was sponsored by the Middle Eastern Students Association, York University, the Coalition for a Just Peace in Palestine and Israel, Jewish Women's Committee to End the Occupation and the Canadian

A visit to Germany (2)

From the editor's desk

It is a profound existential paradox that in Germany today, a land of more than 80 million people, the Jewish presence is almost invisible and yet almost ubiquitous at the same time.

The approximately 100,000 Jews who live in Germany comprise slightly more than one eighth of one per cent of the total population in the country. Except in certain areas of some 90 communities in Germany, the likelihood of seeing, let alone meeting, a Jew is quite slim.

And yet, the "historical events in Germany before 1945," as Stephen Kramer, the youthful managing director of the Zentralrat der Juden in Deutschland (the Central Council of Jews in Germany), delicately and euphemistically referred to them, fill the myriad reformulating interstices of German life today to such a degree, that a visiting Jewish tourist bumps into them even without searching.

Thus, while walking on the streets of Berlin, the tourist frequently notices, embedded into the concrete sidewalk or the cobbled stones abutting a building, small rectangular brass plaques pinpointing the spot where Jews had once lived but were betrayed by fellow Germans and deported to their deaths during the period of National Socialism.

Thus, a woman in her mid-20s, in the midst of converting to Judaism, tells the tourist that she now avoids the subject of Israel's conflict with the Palestinians during conversations with her non-Jewish friends for fear of hearing comments that are too painful or too infuriating.

Thus, a non-Jewish woman in her mid-30s, tells the tourist as she guides him through the museum of the former Judengasse in Frankfurt, that she is "deeply pained by her country's past oppression of the Jews and appalled by its lingering prejudices."

Thus, two non-Jewish journalists, also in their mid-30s, in separate conversations in different places with the tourist, in response to questions about the conflict in the Middle East, both make a point of telling the inquisitive visitor that "their generation is tired of being reminded of any moral obligation" Germany may have to Israel and to the Jews.

Thus, a non-Jewish woman in her mid-50s guiding the Jewish cemetery at Worms, says it is important that the German generations never forget what their countrymen did during World War II.

Thus, the youthful managing director of the Central Council of Jews in Germany tells the tourist it is probably wiser that a Jewish man not wear his kippah in public.

The examples of the Jewish "paradox" in 21st-century Germany are too numerous to record in this space. But the "scarce and ubiquitous" Jews who are determined to establish a decidedly Jewish way of life in Germany have set about the task with purpose and resolve.

Hanna Liss of Frankfurt is a compelling example. Born in Hanover in 1964, she teaches Jewish biblical exegesis and Jewish hermeneutics at the Hochshule für Jüdische Studien (HJS) in the University of Heidelberg.

The HJS was founded 22 years ago in an attempt to respond to the increasing need for rabbis and teachers in the Jewish community. Since 1989, due to the influx of Russian Jews into Germany, that need has grown more urgent. This year, 159 students are enrolled at the HJS; 40 are Jewish. Prof. Liss openly concedes that rabbinics and Bible classes attract very few students.

The first post-war Jewish studies institute in Germany, Liss said, was founded in Berlin in 1960. Today, there are also institutes of Jewish learning in Düsseldorf, Halle, Eckwarden, Freiberg, Munich, Köln and Potsdam.

"It is difficult," Liss said, "to get German Jews interested in pursuing careers in Jewish studies." As a result, she "gets great satisfaction from raising students through Jewish studies." Some of the Jewish graduates, she proudly said, "will soon be teaching in the Jewish communities."

Also helping to buttress the identity, sense of community and of security for the Jews in Germany is the office of the American Jewish Committee (AJC) in Berlin, which is run by American-born Deidre Berger.

As managing director of Berlin's AJC office, Berger said her mandate is to defend Jewish interests in Germany by, Liss stated, "promoting democracy, pluralism and by standing up against anti-Semitism."

The office was founded in the mid-1990s as a response to "the changing Jewish-European circumstance in the wake of the crumbling of the Iron Curtain," Berger said. It is situated in a recently constructed building in what was formerly no man's land, the vacuum of sovereign space between East and West Berlin.

"Europe has a special responsibility towards guaranteeing the existence of Israel," said Berger. "It's a responsibility, we feel, we can emphasize better by being here, on site, in Berlin."

"From a Jewish perspective," Berger pointed out, "we are facing a challenge. There is no longer a sense of urgency and immediacy to the relationship between Germany and Israel. The younger generation of Germans no longer feels that personal attachment to history. Therefore, it is important to keep a German-Jewish dialogue alive that makes younger generations continue to have a feeling for the importance of Israel's existence and for the importance of Germany guaranteeing that existence.

"But," Berger added in her understated, eloquent manner, "it is not easy to do."

Israel not just a Jewish cause, says Irwin Cotler

By JENNIFER M. PAQUETTE
Special to The CJN

International human rights lawyer and Mount Royal MP Irwin Cotler says he supports Israel "not because it's a Jewish cause, but because it's a just cause."

The McGill law professor was speaking at Toronto's Beth Tikvah Synagogue on the 64th anniversary of Kristallnacht, Nov. 9, during Holocaust Education Week.

Holocaust Education Week

Giving a talk called Echoes of Kristallnacht in Our Time, Cotler evoked unsettling parallels between that period and today.

Referring to the UN World Conference Against Racism in Durban, South Africa, shortly before Sept. 11, Cotler compared participants' de-legitimization of Israel to Nazi strategies.

He said he had eagerly anticipated addressing human rights issues in a country celebrating its release from apartheid, but left the conference in South Africa appalled, after Israel was indicted as an "apartheid state" in a statement comparing Palestinian resistance to "Nazi-type occupation," and using the term "holocaust" to describe Israeli rule.

Irwin Cotler

Quoting a colleague, Cotler said, "If Sept. 11 was the Kristallnacht of terror, Durban was the Mein Kampf."

The term Kristallnacht, meaning "night of broken glass," is a euphemism that "sanitizes" the atrocities that occured on that day, including the death of almost 100 Jews, he said.

Sanitization of language is one of many danger signs, Cotler said, as well as "crimes of silence."

Cotler, who was the legal representative of former political prisoners Nelson Mandela and Natan Sharansky, said that today, as during the Nazi period, "We are witnessing an appalling indifference in our day to the unthinkable – ethnic cleansing – and to the unspeakable – genocide – and, worst of all, to the preventable genocide in Rwanda.

"No one can say that we did not know, and so it becomes our responsibility to break down walls of indifference, to shatter conspiracies of silence."

"Indifference," he said, quoting Elie Wiesel, "always means coming down on the side of the victimizers, not the victims."

For many, these dangers only became clear after Sept. 11. But, Cotler said, "Sept. 11 overshadowed Durban, but Durban foreshadowed Sept. 11."

Cotler said he believes the road to Durban was paved by Jewish silence. Jews, "yearning for peace," were so deeply committed to the Oslo accords that they didn't debate these criticisms of Israel when they first began, resulting in the "one-sided indictment" at Durban.

Now, we must fight these views, even outside the Jewish community, he said: "In the next six months... make 10 non-Jews better aware of the Jewish case." If we're uncertain whether we could make a case for Israel, we should "go back and learn."

We must first combat prevailing myths, Cotler said, adding that to claims justifying Palestinian "resistance," we can counter that they were offered a state in 1947. Today's refugee problems are a consequence of the Arab refusal to coexist and the ensuing "war of extermination," he said.

We can also educate those around us about the Arab "teaching of contempt," through the education system, mosques and government, creating a cult of martyrdom and legalized hatred eerily reminiscent of Nazi Germany, he said.

Finally, he said, we should proclaim publicly that "Israel is the prototypical aboriginal people... speaking the same language... reading the same text... sharing a sense of peoplehood across space and time" as ancient inhabitants of the land.

Cotler discussed the global increase in anti-Israel sentiment, pointing to the recent allegations against Israel accusing it of war crimes and of violating the Geneva Convention.

"Forty per cent of United Nations Human Rights Commission resolutions in the past year were against Israel," and overlooked "real violators, like China, Syria and Iran," he said.

Cotler said the "new" anti-Semitism denies Israel's equality before the law. Modern anti-Semitism has shifted, "from Jews as individuals to Jews as a nation."

Quoting Martin Luther King, he spoke of "the denial to the Jewish people of a fundamental right... freely accord[ed] all other nations of the globe."

When an unidentified man began shouting accusations of hypocrisy barely five minutes into Cotler's speech, saying Cotler had "lambasted" Israel in the House of Commons for human rights violations, Cotler calmly said his intention had been merely to reiterate that "Israel... has a responsibility for any violations under international law."

"Israel is not above the law," Cotler later added. But "if individual Israelis engage in excessive practices, Israel itself holds the perpetrators accountable." This "remorse and self-restraint" contrast with the Palestinian glorification of homicide, leading to attacks which, per capita, he said, are "the equivalent of more than two dozen 9/11s."

Bookstore designs own buttons to fight anti-Semitism

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Although the Toronto Women's Bookstore will not carry Stop the Homicide buttons recently offered to it by National Council of Jewish Women, Toronto section, and Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region (CJC-Ont), it has designed its own Stop Anti-Semitism buttons, which should be on display at the Harbord Street store within two weeks.

'Only with symmetry can there be justice'

In addition, says the store's co-manager Anjula Gogia, the store has ordered lapel pins designed with both the Israeli and the Palestinian flag and the words Justice-Peace-Life.

The pin is available for sale on a Web site, www.supportsanity.org, which states that the symbol "reflects the only solution that makes sense – two equally secure, viable and sovereign states for two equally worthy peoples. For only with symmetry can there be justice, and only with justice can there be peace. And only with peace can there be the life that the mainstream on both sides longs for."

Gogia said the pin clearly reflects the store's policy, and "we support it happily."

As a bookstore, she said, "We do not support violence or bombings."

Over the past few months, the bookstore has received complaints from some Jewish customers and CJC for selling buttons with slogans such as "Free Palestine – Time for Peace Time for Women;" "End the Occupation Now;" and "Palestine - Homeland Denied."

Meanwhile, Bruce Kurta, director of public affairs and communications at CJC-Ont. said that at least 1,000 Stop the Homicide buttons are currently for sale at local Jewish bookstores, as well at offices of NCJW, CJC-Ont. and the Jewish locals of the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE).

As well, he said, orders for buttons have come from York University and the University of Western Ontario for sale on campus.

Proceeds will to go to the David Rosenzweig Memorial Fund for victims of Terror.

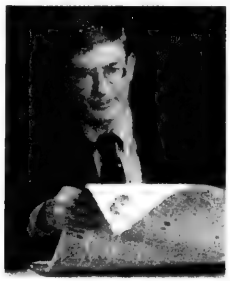
'I am an Israeli,' U.S. columnist tells audience

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

George Will has been a longtime supporter of the State of Israel. But, in an address to an overflowing house at the Holy Blossom Temple last week, the Washington-based columnist personalized the attachment.

Paraphrasing the late President John F. Kennedy, who told Berliners 40 years ago that he too was a Berliner, the syndicated columnist and television commentator said that all Canadians and Americans should say today, "I am an Israeli."



George Will

"The heat of burning jet fuel" has forged a special link between the United States and Israel and today Israel stands with the United States in a fight against terrorism, Will said.

Where in the past people asked, "can we save Israel," today the correct question is, "can Israel by its example save the rest of us, now that we are all Israelis," he continued.

Will delivered his remarks to an audience of 1,800 to 2,000 who filled the Holy Blossom sanctuary to capacity and spilled over to a downstairs auditorium. His speech was part of the temple's Gerald Schwartz/Heather Reisman fall lectures series.

Israel, Will said, blends two ancient traditions, those of Athens and Sparta. The Spartan characteristic provides the necessary "fierceness in response to barbarism."

Will cited the late U.S. Senator Henry "Scoop" Jackson, who broke with convention by noting the importance of Israel to the United States, and not the other way around. "I support Israel...not because I'm Jewish, but because I'm a free person concerned with freedom," Will said.

He criticized those who contend Israel's actions are "provocative." That mistakes the situation and frames the question improperly, he said. For some people, Israel's very existence is a provocation. Israel's opponents aren't concerned about land that it occupies. They are concerned that it occupies any land at all, Will said.

Addressing the theme,"two years after the reckoning," a reference to the failed Camp David talks,Will said Palestinian violence is "self-legitimizing" to many in the West.

That attitude derives from the liberal assumption that violence has root causes that can be laid at the feet of the broader society.

To illustrate his point, Will quoted an anecdote in which two sociologists come upon an individual who had been badly beaten and bloodied. One social worker turns to the other and says, "We need to find out who did this. He needs our help."

Turning to the origins of the Arab hostility to Israel, Will concluded that since it predates Israel's 1967 seizure of the West Bank and Gaza, return of the lands would not end the conflict. The lesson of the Camp David negotiations is that "the most Israel can give is less than [Palestinian Authority President Yasser] Arafat will take."

The Palestinians, for their part, have been plagued by the worst possible leadership, Will said.

In World War I, they backed the Ottoman Empire. In World War II, they backed Nazi Germany. They favoured the Soviet Union in the Cold War and in the Gulf War, they supported Saddam Hussein. "That's a losing streak," Will said.

The 1993 Olso peace process, which transplanted Arafat's "thugocracy" from Tunisia, represented a great mistake, he continued.

Nine years ago, there were no suicide bombings and it would have been inconceivable that 95 per cent of Palestinians would have voiced their approval, as they did in a recent poll, for such a tactic, Will said.

That demonstrates "how malleable a captive population is to a state-controlled propaganda and state-controlled clergy." A process of "de-Nazification" is now required, he said.

Will's biting analysis did not spare America's European allies. Their genius is largely exhausted, he said, and they cling to the last century's most successful ideology – anti-Semitism. France's seat as a permanent member of the UN Security Council, he joked, was a "reward for the role it played in defeating Germany." He suggested Arafat be exiled to France.

Will derided the recent U.S. plan to introduce "confidence-building measures" as a way of reducing tensions in the Mideast. That is no more than diplomacy as psychotherapy, practised by the U.S. State Department, "which is unfailingly wrong," he said.

The problem is not lack of confidence. Rather, it's that none of the Palestinians' promises at Oslo have been enforced, Will said.

Will also had choice words for the Saudi peace plan, which he called an oxymoron. (The plan calls for normalized relations between Israel and the Arab world in exchange for Israel's return to pre-1967 borders).

Saudi Arabia, he said, is no more than a family with a flag, a land governed by 3,000 cousins.

He warned against Arafat's claim of a "right of return." That is nothing more than a plan to "swamp Israel."

A Palestinian state, which a majority of Israelis favour, will one day emerge, but there is currently no indication of a Palestine emerging that is "a civilized social democracy," Will said. A Palestinian state will have to await the development of a new generation of leaders, he said.

Eerie, hollow, amoral but sadly, unrefuted

The voice on the audiotape that was aired last week by the happily accommodating Al Jazeera television station in Qatar may or may not have been that of Osama bin Laden. To be sure, the identity of the speaker is important. But the content of what was spoken was of far greater import.

In a detached, eerily calm, almost hollow demeanour, the voice on the tape celebrated the many recent brutal attacks against westerners – beginning with "the conquests of New York and Washington," and ending with "the recent hostage-taking in Moscow" – as "but the response of Muslims eager to defend their religion."

But, how, the question begs to be asked, do savage, murderous rampages against mostly unarmed civilians defend a religion?

The logic of the message in the tape was perverse, a distortion of history, extolling violence and urging permanent jihad against the western world. Grounded in hatred, the statement was a paean to amorality, a chilling diatribe aimed primarily against the United States and Israel. But six other western nations, including Canada, were also singled out by the voice on the tape.

"As you kill, you will be killed and as you bomb, you will be bombed," the voice on the tape threatened. "So the Muslim nation begins to attack you with its children, who are committed before God to continue the jihad, by word and by the sword, to establish justice and eradicate injustice, for as long as their hearts continue to beat."

One day after the audiotape was made public, Al Jazeera disclosed it had in its possession a six-page manifesto purportedly sent by Al Qaeda promising more violence against the West.

Al Qaeda abhors the free, open, tolerant multi-denominational nature of western democracy. But it abhors Israel even more, for Israel is both a vanguard of western democracy and a sovereign Jewish body politic in what Al Qaeda considers to be exclusively the non-western, non-Jewish, Muslim Middle East.

Most western leaders, including Canadians, understand the grave implications for our western way of life contained in the threats by Al Qaeda and their violent collaborators. We denounce them; we oppose them and we resolve not be cowed by their terror.

But, in sad and puzzling contrast to the stout-hearted denunciations of Al Qaeda by western leaders has been the absence of any equivalent refutation by the leadership of the mainstream Muslim world. The result has been to foster, incorrectly we hope, a sense of indulgence toward Al Qaeda's hate-filled messages.

To permanently defeat this new terrorism, the terrorists must be abjectly, unambiguously rejected by their co-religionists. We therefore plead with Muslim leaders around the world to condemn as evil, without equivocation, the notion that the "Muslim nation" is at war with the West, that using children to attack anyone is somehow a sanctification of God's name and that jihad must continue.

CUPE Ont. president Sid Ryan wrong

Regarding the article in the Oct. 24 issue of The CJN titled "Workers mull leaving CUPE Ontario," certain matters need clarifying. The Jewish CUPE locals were not approached by Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) to encourage or even discuss de-certification from CUPE Ontario. CUPE Ontario president Sid Ryan implied that the Jewish locals were unduly influenced by Bernie Farber of the CJC and that he, in fact, is to blame for the current political differences between the locals in question and CUPE Ontario.

This is completely inaccurate. In fact, it would be much closer to the truth to say that Ryan himself should be taking responsibility for our current difficulties. In fact, Farber was unequivocal in urging us to remain certified and to look at alternative ways to make a statement that CUPE Ontario would hear.

Our locals are comprised of intelligent and independent members. We deeply resent the implication that we can be so easily influenced. We are investigating how best to solve this problem with CUPE Ontario while best serving the needs of our respective memberships. This may mean disaffiliating with CUPE Ontario while maintaining our connection with CUPE at the national level. Dominican Republic not only haven

Ed Butts' recent Perspectives article ("A little Caribbean hope during the Holocaust," CJN, Nov. 7) duly lauds the Dominican Republic for being a haven for Jews fleeing persecution before World War II, when western democracies – Canada included – shamefully and tragically refused to accept Jews.

However, Butts errs when he claims that the Dominican Republic "was the only country in the western hemisphere to open its doors to Jewish refugees."

In 1938, my parents, along with about 300 other European Jews, secured steerage on the few passenger ships still sailing to the Caribbean in a desperate attempt to escape Hitler's fomenting fury. They found safe haven in Trinidad, where my brother and I were born and where we lived out the war years on our "island stepping stone."

Barbados was another rare opening where Jews could enter without viasa or landing money. The fact that they lived freely (despite minimal internment once war broke out) and thrived (despite the aftermath of finding out that their families had been decimated) is a remarkable tribute to these islands that welcomed them when everyone else turned a deaf ear. Although not many Jews were lucky enough to find "a little Caribbean hope during the Holocaust," we should all know that were a few other oases for Jews in the West Indies, in addition to the one in the Dominican Republic.

A refreshing article...

Prof. Ernie Lightman's Perspectives article on the dilemma of the current "leftists" was a remarkably refreshing read ("Jewish and on the left: a tricky place to be," CJN, Nov. 14). It would be even more encouraging if there were more people like him. It is hard to believe these days that there are still decent people with upstanding morals and principles remaining on the left of the political spectrum. Most leftists, both Jewish (like Judy Rebick) and non-Jewish (like Svend Robinson), have gone on a rampage of Israel-bashing that borders on anti-Semitism. I abandoned the leftist ideology long ago, following this adage: "If you are young and not a leftist you have no heart, but if you are old and not a conservative you have no head." But despite remaining on the left, Lightman, it appears, still has his head.

...But a not refreshing letter

According to Jordy Cummings, Israel is a racist, colonial and pariah state, and its leader, Ariel Sharon, is "not good for Jews" (Letters, CJN, Oct. 24). Cummings compares the Israeli government to the governments of Iran and Afghanistan.

Millions of Arabs throughout the Mideast hate Jews and want to see their country wiped off the map. Their hatred is not hidden. The Arab press and their religious leaders call for the destruction of Israel and death to the Jews. Over one million Arab Israelis live in Israel, but the Palestinian territory must be Judenrein. Yet to Cummings, it is Israel that has "racist tendencies."

The Muslims do not want a Jewish state in the Middle East. They cannot be placated. If Israel were to withdraw from Gaza and the West Bank, nothing would change. Jews would still be despised and the Arabs would not rest until the last Jew in Israel was exterminated. Arab anti-Semitism is not new. Arabs have been persecuting and killing Jews in the Mideast for years before Israel was established. The Arabs cannot, or will not, live with Jews in their midst.

The left justifies Palestinian terrorism against Israeli civilians and overlooks vicious Arab anti-Semitism. The left demonstrates against the United States and Israel while supporting terrorists and despotic Arab regimes. With the moral decline of the left, it has become one of the most dangerous political movements in the world.

Carter's Nobel Peace Prize could spell trouble for Israel

By PAUL C. MERKLEY

Jimmy Carter's name has been before the Nobel Prize committee 10 times since 1978, when the committee awarded its prize to former Israeli prime minister Menachem Begin and the late Egyptian leader Anwar Sadat, the other two architects of the (first) Camp David accords. Just a few weeks ago, however, the Nobel Prize committee took another look at its Carter file and, holding it up to the light of today's debate about U.S. policy toward Iraq, decided that the former U.S. president's time had come.

The Nobel Peace Prize it awarded to Carter, it said, recognizes his "untiring effort to find peaceful solutions to international conflicts, to advance democracy and human rights, and to promote economic and social development." Gunnar Berge, the head of the committee of five that made the choice, broke all the rules by boasting publicly about the political intention behind the selection: "With the position Carter has taken on [Iraq], it can and must also be seen as criticism of the line the current U.S. administration has taken on Iraq... It's a kick in the leg to all that follow the same line as the United States."

Friends of Israel, like all decent people, will ignore the temptation to respond with matching cynicism to this brutal political message and will endorse the committee's long-delayed recognition of Carter's great contributions to civilized life.

But friends of Israel should also prepare for the possibility that this award will inspire a media campaign, and perhaps even a political campaign, to put the Carter Center to work on a peace settlement between Israel and the Palestinians.

Over the years, Carter and his peace centre have made no secret of their availability for this task. No doubt the Carter organization is already on the case of our own foreign affairs minister, Bill Graham, who is always ready to appear to champion mediation.

But to give Carter and his organization such a public role would be ruinous for Israel. While he has succeeded beyond what is normally expected of human beings in achieving an even-handed approach to many thorny issues, Carter has never tried to do so in the case of the Israel-Arab conflict.

In several post-presidential writings, he has openly deplored the Balfour Declaration and espoused the Arab view of the history surrounding Israel's creation in 1948 and all subsequent stations in the story of Israel's costly struggle to remain alive in the midst of that sea of violent refusal.

He mocks those fellow Christians who support Israel as mindless "literalists" and political dupes. It is his undisguised ambition to be the anti-Cyrus of our day – turning back the consequences of 1948, which he assures us, in concert with anti-Zionists everywhere, is the cause of all the unhappiness that afflicts the region.

As soon as he left public office, Carter began publicly to accuse Begin of never having intended to abide by his promises, and has continued to blame him for the inability of the Arab leaders to follow in Sadat's footsteps. He has also repeatedly vilified the Israeli political system, the only democratic system in the Middle East, and consistently prettified the political system of Arab dictators, exalting such statesmen as Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, the late Syrian leader Hafez Assad, and, of course, the Saudi and Gulf State princes.

By the late 1980s, Carter was telling friends that he regretted not having invited the PLO to Camp David in 1978. In the mid-1980s, Carter conveyed that thought to PLO leader Yasser Arafat himself. Regular correspondence followed, and in April 1990 in Paris, the two met for the first time.

"Now in an atmosphere of cordiality, Arafat had accepted the [Camp David] accords and forgiven Carter for excluding him in 1978. Carter felt that a burden he had been carrying for years had been lifted... then they dried their tears, embraced, and said farewell," wrote historian Douglas Brinkley in his 1998 book The Unfinished Presidency: Jimmy Carter's Journey Beyond the White House.

After that initial meeting, Carter literally became a ghost writer for Arafat. In his proposed draft for the speech that Arafat gave to the Security Council of the United Nations on May 20, 1990, we find Carter advising Arafat: "The objective of the speech should be to secure maximum sympathy and support of other world leaders, especially including Americans and Israelis... [You should refer to various reports of Israeli cruelty in the West Bank and Gaza], then ask: 'What would you do, if these were your children and grandchildren? As the Palestinian leader, I share the responsibility for them.' The thrust of the speech should be to bring, not only the world's political leaders, but every parent and grandparent, into a realization of the excessively patient suffering of the Palestinians."

By a strange logical and moral inversion, the rock-throwing boys of the intifadah became for Carter embodiments of Gandhi's principle of non-violence: they were "instant heroes" exhibiting "an unprecedented commitment to their cause and a surprising threshold for absorbing pain." In so doing, he told the world in an op-ed piece in the New York Times, "they are appealing directly to the conscience of the world... They have pre-emptively attacked Israel's most cherished characteristic: its moral fiber."

Carter has sought to use his Carter Center to finish the unfinished work of the Camp David Accords. His conviction about the centre's impartiality is unaffected by the fact that, in its early years, it received several millions of dollars in financial support from Palestinian Arab businessmen, and millions more from Pakistani and other Muslim financiers who ran the Bank of Credit and Commerce International, which would eventually come to ruin in the biggest banking scandal of the last century.

'Only a minority of Americans agreed with Carter on the Gulf War issue.'

Carter has not restricted himself to words in his campaign to undermine Israel. In the months that followed Iraqi President Saddam Hussein's conquest of Kuwait in August 1990, Carter worked ceaselessly to prevent the international action against Iraq that eventually reversed that conquest. He wrote personally to all the leaders of the major powers and urged them not to co-operate with American initiatives.

Instead, Carter advised that they hand over the matter to "an Arab League effort" that would bring peace to the region by linking the solution of the Kuwait matter to the issue that he believes is the source of all unhappiness among the Arabs – Israel's occupation of Palestine.

A few days before Operation Desert Storm was to begin, Carter wrote secretly to Assad, Mubarak, and King Fahd of Saudi Arabia and urged them to withdraw their support for the Allied initiative: "The advances you made in guiding your nations' progress might well be lost. This war might also postpone indefinitely any efforts to resolve the Palestine issue."

The story of Carter's secret initiatives did not emerge for many years. When it did, some figures in the administration of former U.S. president George Bush concluded that Carter's actions had verged on treason. The elder Bush's secretary of defence, Dick Cheney, said: "For [Carter] to go behind our backs and ask world leaders to denounce our war policy was reprehensible, totally inappropriate, for a former president."

Only a minority of Americans agreed with Carter on the Gulf War issue. Yet most, it seems, gave him the benefit of the doubt, believing that he was wrong for the right reasons – because he declared that he abhorred violence and believed that anything was better than to pour down death and destruction upon the people of Iraq. He says the same today.

Yet his own Carter Doctrine of January 23, 1980, as expressed in a state of the union address in response to the Soviet Union's invasion of Afghanistan – "Any attempt by an outside force to gain control of the Persian Gulf region will be regarded as an assault on the vital interests of the United States of America, and such force will be repelled by any means necessary, including military force" – was the explicit foundation for U.S. actions during the Gulf War.

There was no reason to believe that Carter had a monopoly on moral anguish at that hour. The larger truth was that his animosity towards Israel had become so intense that he could only see the Gulf War as a marvellous opportunity to put the peace process back on the track that he had opened up at Camp David some 12 years before.

Carter made this link publicly from the outset, but it was little noticed. In a speech on September 29, 1990, he said: "No matter how you look at what is happening in Kuwait, no matter how you look at what is happening in Lebanon, the core issue is now and will continue to be Israel-Palestine."

In an op-ed piece in the New York Times on January 2, 1991, Carter disclosed what he felt was the key to resolving the crisis in the Gulf: "Now is a propitious time for Israel to come forward with a genuine peace initiative," he wrote, thereby, in effect, shifting the responsibility for Saddam's invasion of Kuwait to Israel.

U.S. President George W. Bush is well aware of the humiliation Carter attempted to bring upon his father's diplomatic efforts during the desperate months that followed Saddam's seizure of Kuwait — when Carter publicly denounced the position of the elder Bush's administration while secretly urging Arab states and others to defy the American coalition strategy.

Still, it's not hard to see how those near the top of the current U.S. administration might wish to prove their willingness to have pursued all avenues to bring Carter on board as the United States prepares to confront Iraq.

We might recall that Carter's partner in the mediatory effort that eased the political crisis in Haiti in 1994 was none other than current U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell.

It's not difficult to see how Powell might be tempted to play the Carter card again. Let's hope and pray that he resists the temptation.

Looking back at turning 90

Several weeks ago, The Canadian Jewish News was good enough to announce that I would soon celebrate my 90th birthday.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

That station in my life has since come and gone.

At the end of my last column, I gave brief thanks to those of you who helped celebrate my special anniversary.

Needless to say, it was for me, personally, as well as for my family, a signal and significant event.

At one of the celebrations, some 1,000 people were present and that moved me more than I can possibly say.

I would like to repeat that I am most grateful to all of you who congratulated me and who, in some other way, acknowledged my special day.

Therefore, dear reader, if you sent me a personal note through the mail, or via telephone or e-mail, please understand that the messages I have received number in the hundreds, and I have simply been unable to respond individually to each one.

My strength is limited and responding to literally hundreds of messages individually, is simply impossible. But do know that I am deeply grateful and I pray that God may reward you for your generosity.

I, therefore, once again am taking to this public medium to thank all those of you who have been kind to me and have in some way expressed your friendship.

You have been most gracious and generous, and you have enriched my life more than I can possibly say.

I am deeply appreciative for the wonderful attention that I have received. You have made this birthday truly a milestone to remember.

But life goes on. My poor wife Elizabeth has now been in the hospital for two years, unable to recognize me or communicate in any way.

That is the heavy burden that I carry with me into my new stage of life, and I would give everything if only she could be returned to health.

But the experts are not very hopeful.

However, I still belong to those who believe in miracles, and who knows what will happen in the future.

My wife is a splendid person who deserves the best and whom I would like to see unshackled from the terrible bounds in which she is now a prisoner.

The highest rung, the lowest policy

Since my column last month was a critique of the Fraser Institute's approach to immigration and immigrants, I feel I should devote this month's column to the good idea that the institute recently promoted. The idea? That payment of welfare should not restrict the recipients' ability to earn extra income.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Let me explain. As readers of the general media know – that is, readers outside British Columbia who pay attention to our slightly bizarre political scene – we have elected a government that has co-opted the label "Liberal" to describe a gang of people who otherwise would be considered Socreds, Conservatives, Reform/Alliance or any other right-of-centre party ever hatched in Canada.

But make no mistake; the label "Liberal" goes only as far as the party's letterhead. Their ideas are old-fashioned conservative. They gave us a tax cut, which they were advised against; they broke their promises not to attack medical care or education; and they are on the way to plunging the province back into debt. They held a referendum on treaty negotiations with native peoples that cost millions, then threw away the results (even though the results seemed to back their position on treaty outcomes). They cut many therapies from the list of covered medical treatments, including physiotherapy. They promised millions of dollars to support Whistler's Olympic bid while they cut services to the elderly and the poor. And then they stepped over the line that Maimonides laid down 800 years ago.

Of course, the government probably never heard of Maimonides, so they can be excused for their ignorance. But even though the Fraser Institute probably never heard of the Rambam either, they got it right.

Maimonides, also known as the Rambam, listed 13 levels of tzedakah. I won't go through them all, but the highest is tzedakah that lets the recipient become self-sufficient. This level is what inspired such Jewish institutions as Hebrew Free Loan Societies, one of the best ideas our community ever had. By providing interest-free loans, HFLs helped people start small businesses or train them for new careers. Supported by the communities where they were located, recipients of these loans became independent and contributing members to the Jewish and general communities. They regained a sense of self-worth and were prevented from falling into despair or worse.

Now what has the B.C. government done? It has decreed that recipients of welfare can no longer earn any extra income outside their welfare payments, payments which were meagre enough to start with, given the costs of living in our province. This means, for example, that a single mother will get her welfare allowance, but will not be able to earn a lousy $200 per month as an envelope stuffer for a community organization. In a city where you are lucky to find an apartment for rent under $1,000 that will take children, this woman is in dire straights. Social housing? Wait for it. Food banks, Sally Ann and humiliation are her choices. Re-train? How to pay for childcare, also no longer funded?

And suddenly, like the cavalry in an old western movie, comes the Fraser Institute. While so far the insititute has had no effect on the government, I credit it for trying. It proposes letting that woman earn some extra cash, maybe enabling her to get some work skills and again feel like a part of the human community.

We as a society are judged by the way we treat our least fortunate. The Victorians developed the concept of the "deserving poor" versus the "undeserving poor," defined as those who by their own slothfulness and inattention to propriety did not "deserve" the charity of society. Anyone who has seen the movie Angela's Ashes cannot forget the scenes where the title character appears in front of the welfare board in Limerick, Ireland, to plead for money to feed her children, her hapless husband having deserted the family. Is this where we are headed?

Eight hundred years ago, our great teacher, Moses ben Maimon, got it right. I'm still waiting for our government to get it.

Winnipeg pride

No one in Winnipeg particularly likes when the mercury drops below minus 30. If fact, we tend to grumble about it under our very visible breath. Sure, the bravest among us will utter words like "fresh" and "crisp" to describe the bone-chilling, knee-knocking climate, but to be perfectly honest, those are euphemisms best reserved for iceberg lettuce, not icy burghs like Winnipeg.

Stuart Slayen in Winnipeg

As for the mosquitoes, occasionally referred to as Manitoba's provincial bird, well, at least they're frozen to death about six months of the year.

Winnipeggers often complain about the weather and the bugs. And there are a fair number of other Canadians familiar with Winnipeg quick to poke exaggerated fun at our 10 months of winter and two months of rough skating.

But having to wear a balaclava a few weeks a year (on particularly cold days, the entire city looks like the set of some mega-crime re-enactment for Crime Stoppers) and insect repellent for a good chunk of the summer is a small price to pay for living in such a fine, relaxed, accepting city.

As much as Winnipeggers gripe about the climate, the mosquitoes and other things, I think most of us are quietly proud of this place 670,000 people call home. I was reminded on the Remembrance Day long weekend how lucky we are.

On Saturday night, my wife and I hosted a young Jewish, Argentinean couple for dinner. They were in Winnipeg on an "exploratory" visit, meaning that after looking around, assessing job prospects, learning about the city and exploring accommodation options, they would figure out whether to pursue immigration here.

Married for only two months, Martin and Valeria decided that they wanted a future in Winnipeg. I think they made that decision before their plane even landed here. Based on some Internet browsing, some contact with a cousin who had recently moved here and contact with the local Jewish community, they determined that Winnipeg would become their home.

By the time we had dined with them, Martin and Valeria had been here about a week. They met Argentinean- and Canadian-born families, toured the city, hung out at the JCC and experienced their first snowfall. (They also made a point of reading the local papers while they were here. Martin read about a survey that concluded that a significant number of Winnipeggers are dissatisfied with the condition of city roads. He wished out loud that papers in Buenos Aries could look like this instead of being full of reports of crippling poverty, crime and social instability.)

Containing the couple's enthusiasm for Winnipeg is impossible. They think the people are outstanding, they see the Jewish community as hospitable, they love the scenery and they are counting down the months before the immigration paperwork is complete.

Until then, they will continue to stay in contact with Winnipeggers, read voraciously about Canadian history, work on their English (which is already pretty good) and, if I have anything to say about it, root for the Blue Bombers.

When Martin, a computer systems professional, and Valeria, a psychologist, arrive here in about a year and a half, they will join a few dozen Jewish families from Argentina who have moved to Winnipeg over the last several years. The influx of newcomers has been like a shot of adrenaline to the community. While strong, Winnipeg's Jewish community hasn't really grown from its population of somewhere between 13,000 and 14,000 in the past few years. Our programs and facilities are impressive, though, and it seems like every dot on the Jewish ideological landscape is represented. The new immigrants from Argentina and elsewhere like what they see.

Winnipeggers are a lucky bunch. The people are tolerant, the arts scene is superb, the economy is stable and there is a real sense of community. On the colder and buggier days, though, life-long 'Peggers tend to forget how good we've got it. Sometimes it takes a young couple from Buenos Aries to remind us. I'm grateful to them. I'll have to buy them balaclavas to say thanks.

The Kirshner File

Netanyahu challenges Sharon

Within minutes of being sworn in as Israel's foreign minister on Nov. 7, Benjamin (Bibi) Netanyahu, the former prime minister, was angling for his boss's job, keenly anticipating Likud's Nov. 28 primary. Netanyahu, having joined Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's caretaker cabinet after the sudden dissolution of the national unity government, told reporters about a proposal he had put to Sharon. If he, Netanyahu, won the primary and was chosen to contest the Jan. 28 general election, Sharon would support him. But if Sharon was the victor, Netanyahu would back him.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

With this politically charged disclosure, Netanyahu officially acknowledged that his ultimate objective is to unseat Sharon, his perennial rival, and thus complete his return to the pinnacle of power. Soundly trounced by the Labour party's Ehud Barak in the 1999 general election, Netanyahu has since been plotting to revive his fortunes.

Sharon, who appointed Netanyahu after calling new elections, did not immediately respond to Netanyahu's proposition. Instead, through gritted teeth, he expressed confidence that Netanyahu would be loyal to him. In offering Netanyahu the post of foreign minister, Sharon had hoped to curb Netanyahu's criticism of his policies. And yet, on the first day in his new position, Netanyahu openly knocked Sharon, declaring that Israel had fallen into "dire straits" under his watch. He was referring to the terrible toll that the second Palestinian uprising has exacted on Israelis and to the recession that has engulfed Israel.

A loose cannon, Netanyahu further annoyed Sharon with his blithe announcement that, for now, he had struck the United States' most recent peace proposal, the so-called "road map," from Israel's agenda. Netanyahu explained that Washington's current preoccupation with the increasingly tense Iraqi question had momentarily sidelined Arab-Israeli diplomacy.

Sharon, to be sure, was never too enthusiastic about the American plan, considering it it objectionable on several counts. But because he values his relationship with U.S. President George W. Bush, Sharon was upset by Netanyahu's apparent failure to consult with him in advance. In any event, the Bush administration has decided to freeze the proposal until after the formation of a new government in Israel.

Netanyahu's unilateral comment about the "road map," as well as his subsequent threat to deport Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat from the West Bank should he oust Sharon in the primary, were in keeping with his strategy to outflank Sharon from the right. Much to nearly everyone's amazement, Netanyahu has succeeded in portraying Sharon as a moderate.

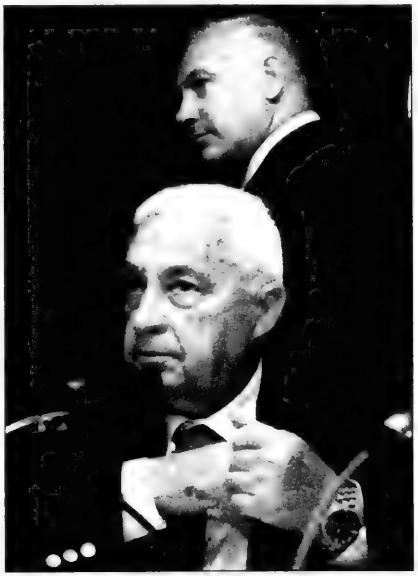
Ever since December 2000, when Netanyahu sat out the Likud leadership race he probably could have won with ease, he and his supporters have been nipping at Sharon's heels, castigating his government's Palestinian policy. Netanyahu, who was at Likud's helm from 1992 to 1999 and served as prime minister from 1996 until his ignominious defeat, has yearned to replace Sharon.

No sooner had Sharon beaten Barak in the February 2001 election than Netanyahu told The Jerusalem Post: "The Sharon government will fall within three months. I am saying this on behalf of the State of Israel and not just my own political future."

Clearly, there is no love lost between Sharon, 74, and Netanyahu, 53. Sharon still smarts from the perception that Netanyahu tried to exclude him from his cabinet in 1996. Still stung by the snub, Sharon dismissed Netanyahu "an expert only in his eyes" after Netanyahu advised him to banish Arafat and destroy the Palestinian Authority. Rubbing salt into the wound, Sharon deigned not to meet with Netanyahu for more than a year after becoming prime minister.

Long before the collapse of his government two weeks ago, Sharon had been scheming to thwart Netanyahu's comeback as prime minister. Sharon's decision to invite Center party stalwart Dan Meridor, an old Likudnik, into the cabinet last year was aimed at blocking Netanyahu from regaining ascendancy in the Likud. Similarly, Sharon's widely-publicized meeting in July with Shaul Mofaz – the ex-chief of staff – to discuss Mofaz's political future was in part regarded as a blatant effort to outmanoeuvre Netanyahu. Mofaz, having replaced Binyamin Ben-Eliezer as defence minister, is now Sharon's staunch ally.

The super-ambitious Netanyahu has been just as devious. Last May, shortly after Netanyahu announced his intention to run for office again, he irritated Sharon by convincing the Likud's central committee to reject Palestinian statehood. The decision was not binding, but it embarrassed Sharon, who had grudgingly come out in favour of a mini Palestinian entity without contiguous borders. Analysts interpreted Netanyahu's move as a brazen bid to wrest control of the Likud from Sharon.



Ariel Sharon and Benjamin Netanyahu square off for Likud's leadership in a Nov. 28 primary.

Netanyahu's camp followers have also caused Sharon sleepless nights. Last February, Yisrael Katz, a member of Knesset and a Netanyahu acolyte, set the tone when he declared, "The battle for the Likud leadership is under way." And in a foray into psychological warfare, Netanyahu supporters claimed that he was significantly more popular among right-wing voters than Sharon, at least according to polls. On a more practical level, Netanyahu's political patron, Moshe Arens, a former Israeli defence minister, seized control of Likud's secretariat.

In the main, Netanyahu has directed his appeal to the most hawkish segment of Israel's Jewish population. When Sharon deliberately refrained from responding militarily to the June 2001 disco suicide bombing in Tel Aviv, Netanyahu accused him of turning "restraint into ideology." And then, in a pointed reference to Sharon's security policy, Netanyahu said, "I think he is doing too little."

Netanyahu has been scathing in denouncing Sharon's toleration of Palestinian statehood – a concept he calls a "prescription for catastrophe." At best, Netanyahu would grant the Palestinians autonomy.

Having described Arafat as "much worse" than Osama bin Laden, Netanyahu has repeatedly urged Sharon to expel Arafat, now his nemesis but formerly his negotiating partner under the Oslo accords. Last week, Netanyahu suggested that a war in Iraq would be an opportune time to exile Arafat. Sharon has promised Bush that he will not eject or physically harm Arafat.

For all their differences, Sharon and Netanyahu are in agreement on virtually all the key issues. Both believe that: Arafat seeks Israel's destruction and cannot be a viable partner; a final peace accord cannot be achieved in the foreseeable future; Jewish settlements should remain in place; Israel cannot go back to the pre-1967 borders; Saudi Arabia's peace plan is a non-starter; Palestinian terrorism must be and can be crushed by military means.

Although Netanyahu has portrayed himself as a bolder hawk than Sharon, the fact remains that, as prime minister, Netanyahu relinquished two per cent of the West Bank and 80 per cent of Hebron, while Sharon has ceded absolutely nothing.

Netanyahu strategists expect his campaign to accentuate economic rather than diplomatic or security themes. But with the intifadah raging and a war in Iraq looming, this is really a debatable contention.

Judging by the latest surveys and scuttlebutt, Sharon is running ahead of Netanyahu. But we still do not know who will cross the finish line first on Nov. 28.

How Do We Prepare Children for Grade One?

Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto

Readiness for Grade One is a combination of academic, social and emotional preparation. Our pre-school curriculum proceeds gradually, adding levels of difficulty and expanding the spectrum of work covered. As the children grow, expectations grow as well. Socially, the children are integrated into the larger school framework from the very beginning, with reading buddies and participation in school wide projects. For children within our system, the academic and social transition is virtually seamless. We pay special attention to new children who enroll in Grade One, so they can integrate quickly and get off to a great start.

Reform congregations thriving, movement head says

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

When it appeared that Israel was moving towards peace, the Reform movement saw a tremendous religious revival with a focus on issues of God, ritual and text, says Rabbi Eric Yoffie, president of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations.

"There was a certain embrace of fundamental religious questions which most of us viewed to be a healthy phenomenon," he said.

Rabbi Yoffie, a keynote speaker at the recent Canadian Council for Reform Judaism 2002 biennial convention, said that while Reform leaders welcomed a return to roots and sources, some became concerned that the focus became "overly much on the individual experience and not enough on peoplehood.

"The revival stemmed from healthy developments, but we had to be sure that it did not lead us away from the community," he said in an interview prior to the start of the convention.

Since the current intifadah, however, "we have had to worry about our basic survival, and as a result our attention has redirected itself to issues related to the welfare of the Jewish state," said Rabbi Yoffie.

"There is no ambivalence towards Israel, but there is a [general] confusion as to how to help the Jewish state.

"There are the general philanthropic efforts, of which we have done well, but there is a sense that we need to do more."

As a result, he said, the Reform movement has concentrated on developing practical programs "that help Jews move towards a more active [relationship] with Israel."

Although it has been difficult, of late, to organize tours to Israel, said Rabbi Yoffie, his movement recently announced eight national missions over the next 1½ years.

"There is a clear sense that many Reform Jews who might otherwise not participate in a tour to Israel, might go with other Reform Jews and Reform community leaders.

"We need to provide a vehicle to go and be physically present in Israel."

Artza, the Zionist arm of Reform Judaism, has taken on the challenge of developing hands-on, congregation-based programs to connect Reform Jews to Israel, he said.

About 300 congregations across North America recently took part in a teach-in that covered every topic from buying Israeli products to correcting media distortions, he said.

Rabbi Eric Yoffie

"People are hungry for information, and a program was put together that provided the basics."

A topic of particular interest, he said, is how to answer childrens' questions about the current situation in Israel.

"Nothing is simple about teaching children about bombs going off. We put a lot of thought into how we could help teachers and parents approach these subjects."

Recently, he said, a new religious school curriculum was developed for the movement's almost 800 supplementary Hebrew schools across North America.

"About 90 per cent of children in the Reform movement attend religious school, and we need to make sure that teachers receive the proper material to teach these children."

Essential to the new curriculum, he said, is an emphasis on family education. "Supplementary school is supplementary to what goes on at home, and we cannot supplement education if there is no foundation at home. If all signals at home are negative, the best supplementary school cannot make a difference."

Guidelines were passed at the last Reform national convention suggesting that every parent attend their child's school at least six times throughout the year, he said.

"Our curriculum includes family education for every grade level. We have developed lessons for parents that parallel, on an adult level, what their children are learning in school."

All in all, he said, the Reform movement is thriving, congregations are growing, and its camping system is expanding.

"The religious revival and re-ritualization is very important to us. Our best congregations are vibrant, religious places."

What he finds interesting, he said, is that the community in general is "far more committed than we would have imagined about five or 10 years ago.

"The level of commitment is extraordinary. At a national convention 10 years ago, worship was an incidental part of the proceedings. All that has now changed, and not only Shabbat worship, but Torah study, has become an essential part of the conventions."

"People are no longer interested in 'aboutism.' They do not want to learn about Judaism; they want to immerse themselves in it. Jewish learning is about an individual approach to the text."

They also want the "ultimate connection" he said, and that is not provided by general society. "That comes through God, Torah study and prayer."

Catholic church must admit crimes against Jews: author

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The Roman Catholic church must "repair" itself by owning up to its crimes against Jews, says the author of an explosive new book.

Describing the church's treatment of Jews down through the ages as a "history of hate and harm," Daniel Goldhagen called upon the Vatican to admit its "unjust and injurious deeds" and make concrete amends.

Holocaust Education Week

In A Moral Reckoning: The Role of the Catholic Church in the Holocaust and its Unfilled Duty of Repair, published by Random House, Goldhagen examines its historical record toward Jews and recommends remedies.

Goldhagen, who is affiliated with Harvard University's Minda de Gunzburg Center for European Studies, believes the church can rehabilitate itself by raising the struggle against anti-Semitism to a "core teaching," alongside its traditional message of love and goodness.

Goldhagen's speech was sponsored by the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre and supported by the University of Toronto Hillel branch and Pages Books & Magazines.

He was also here in connection with Holocaust Education Week.

Goldhagen acknowledged that the church, on the whole, has not reacted well to A Moral Reckoning.

But Goldhagen is no stranger to controversy. His first book, Hitler's Willing Executioners, published in 1996, aroused an international furor. His thesis was that a uniquely German brand of "eliminationist anti-Semitism" enabled ordinary Germans to participate in the Holocaust.

In his lecture here at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education, Goldhagen declared there is no question but that the church's record in relating to Jews is "horrible."

It spread inflammatory calumnies, labelled Jews a "guilt-laden people" and, in effect, laid the foundations for Nazi anti-Semitism.

Taking these falsehoods to their logical conclusions, European cardinals, bishops and priests justified the persecution of Jews.

As for Pope Pius XII's role during the Holocaust, Goldhagen, in his book, debunks the claim that he worked tirelessly on behalf of Jews.

Urging the church to embrace the principle of "moral restitution," Goldhagen said the Vatican must tell the "full truth" about its stance toward Jews, restore the reputation of the Jewish people it has slandered relentlessly, open up its archives to scholars and fearlessly investigate itself.

In his view, one of its foremost duties is to confront the anti-Semitism of the Christian Bible, which is riddled with scores of anti-Jewish verses.

But in an implicit warning, Goldhagen observed that "the solution" must come from Christians themselves.

In the end, the church must cease being "a sinful church," and subject itself to "a full moral reckoning."

If it abides by its intrinsic philosophy, repair is possible, he said.

"Repair is a must, not a choice – an unavoidable moral duty."

Lest he be accused of tarring all Christians with the brush of anti-Semitism, Goldhagen unequivocally rejected the notion of collective guilt as "morally indefensible."

He said that today's church, under the leadership of Pope John Paul II, has no wish to disseminate anti-Jewish enmity.

The church has made enormous strides since Vatican II in 1965, and there are "many, many Christians" who do not subscribe to anti-Semitic beliefs, Goldhagen said.

Nevertheless, he said, sacred texts, notably the New Testament, remain a fount of prejudice.

Goldhagen credited the current pope with having taken constructive "symbolic steps" to break with the past, such as visiting a synagogue and calling Jews "older brothers in faith."

But, Goldhagen said, much more needs to be done.

In his book, he calls on the church to renounce its political ambitions to conquer all souls, to stop telling its faithful that Judaism is an illegitimate religion and to jettison the idea that Jews are an impediment to the salvation of humanity.

During a question-and-answer session, Goldhagen dismissed as "historically untrue" glowing post-war testimonials of Pope Pius XII by Jews and Zionist leaders, such as Golda Meir.

He suggested that these statements were made in the interests of political expediency.

legacy of life

Oscar Shainhouse 1913 - 1999

a presentation of the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto

Oscar Shainhouse had a passion for life and nothing made him happier than reveling in it. He took great delight in everything that came his way, be it music, friends, family or community. Given his infectious smile and deeply kind heart, everyone who met Oscar was hooked.

"Oscar had a little bit of 'old country' mannerisms and culture in him and that made him stand out in the crowd," says Ralph Fromer, his friend of almost 70 years since their teenage days in a Toronto Betar chapter.

Oscar was born in 1913 in his grand parent's home in Kovna, Lithuania, the second of four children. His father Abraham, a shoichet by training, and his mother Sarah were both well educated in Torah and Jewish values and passed their love of learning on to their children. Oscar adored the language of the Torah – he often referred to it as poetry – and was fortunate to spend his childhood steeped in Jewish education and tradition.

The family moved to Toronto when Oscar was 17, where Abraham opened a dry goods store on Spadina Avenue and Oscar fell in with a magnificent group of Betar boys who were constantly struck by their new friend's charisma. Oscar found promise as a traveling salesman, first for a knitting company and then for a handbag manufacturer. Eventually, he and his brothers Louis and Sam opened National Knitting Mills, growing it into one of Canada's largest children's wear manufacturers.

Always the charmer, Oscar put his salesmanship to good use the night he crashed a pajama party in 1935 and managed to woo a beautiful girl named Florence Wilson. They were married a year later and became life partners and best friends for 62 years. Florence supported her husband in everything he did, whether it was visiting Israel, spending summers at music camp so Oscar could brush up on his violin techniques, or attending all of his performances with the Etobicoke Philharmonic Orchestra and Florida's Broward Orchestra. They even gave back to the community together, with Oscar joining Florence at Hadassah-Wizo when he became its first male life associate.

Oscar Shainhouse

"Papa had this strong presence," says granddaughter Alli Shapiro. "If he walked into a board room, he could own it. If he walked into an orchestra pit, he could own it. He was so confident and so loving. He would cut off his arm for anybody, he was that giving."

Oscar's giving nature extended to the community, too. In 1971 he received a Special Service Award from UJA Federation's Israel Special Fund Campaign for his tireless efforts as chairman of UJA's Knitting Group. He served as Honorary Vice President of the Board of Governors of Associated Hebrew Schools and was an active member of Herut-Likud, B'nai Brith-Forest Hill Lodge, and the Women's Wear Bureau of Toronto. He also served as a consultant to the Federal Business Development Bank in Ottawa.

Israel was also a major part of Oscar's life and he went there often – 29 times, in fact, frequently visiting his good friend Menachem Begin. One of his favourite things to do in Israel was to shmooze with the hotel bartenders and the local cabbies just so he could surround himself with Hebrew.

"I once asked Dad why there wasn't a Jewish National Fund Negev Dinner in his name," recalls daughter Syrelle Bernstein, who is involved at Baycrest and with other community organizations as are her three sisters Marlene Brudner, Mary Carrel and Pam Shainhouse. "He said he probably couldn't raise enough money. But that wasn't the real reason, of course. Dad was just too humble and didn't want the attention. He preferred to do things quietly."

When he wasn't busy with his adoring family, his business, or his volunteer work, Oscar could be found at the small cottage community on Kahshe Lake that he formed with a group of friends in 1947. It's been said that his violin resonated throughout the grounds, giving pleasure to all. That's not surprising – spreading warmth was always Oscar's specialty.

New liturgy dedicated to mark the Holocaust

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

An ambitious joint project of the Conservative movement's Rabbinical Assembly and the Schechter Institute of Jewish Studies in Jerusalem was dedicated recently as part of Holocaust Eduction Week.

"This is a historic event," commented one of the 1,100 attendees at the dedication ceremony for Megillat Hashoah: the Holocaust Scroll, held at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation.

The publication of Megillat Hashoah, expected to be completed for Yom Hashoah 2003, "will mark a milestone in the transformation of the Jewish calendar and a transformation of Yom Hashoah into a true sacred day in the cycle of the Jewish year, taking its rightful place as a day of mourning and commemoration," said Rabbi Reuven Hammer, Jerusalem-based president of the Rabbinical Assembly, which represents 1,600 Conservative rabbis worldwide.

Holocaust Education Week

Rabbi Hammer said he believed that unless Holocaust commemoration is marked by "appropriate liturgical formulations," specific prayers will not outlast those who actually experienced the Shoah. In fact, he noted, in the 1980s, the Rabbinical Assembly of Israel worked on a Yom Hashoah siddur, which is incorporated in a slightly revised version in the Conservative movement's new Sim Shalom siddur.

But it was Alex Eisen, a Beth David member and Holocaust survivor, who set the wheels in motion for the project. Eisen, who was instrumental in building the Holocaust memorial in Earl Bales Park, began to approach institutions a decade years ago, seeking to transform his dream of creating a Holocaust scroll into reality.

Two years ago, Eisen and Rabbi Philip Scheim, spiritual leader of Beth David, took the idea to the Rabbinical Assembly.

"I have never known, nor could I imagine existing in the world an individual like Alex," said Rabbi Scheim at the dedication, praising Eisen for his drive, courage, chutzpah, humour and persistence.

Rabbi Scheim also praised the "stunning Hebrew text" and "sensitive English translation" of the Megillah, parts of which were chanted in Hebrew and the rest of which was read in English.

The work was written in Hebrew by Avigdor Shinan, a professor of Hebrew literature at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem and translated into English by New York liturgist Rabbi Jules Harlow. Some of the chapters are chanted using the cantillation of the Scroll of Eichah (Lamentations), which is read on Tisha B'Av.

It is a mitzvah incumbent upon every Jew and all human beings who believe in freedom and human dignity to remember the Holocaust, said Eisen.

"We hope the megillah will be accepted by Klal Yisrael, the collective Jewish people, as a meaningful religious way to commemorate the Holocaust for generations," said Rabbi David Golinkin, president of the Schechter Institute.

"You may ask why we need to compose a scroll right now," said Rabbi Golinkin, who steered the Jerusalem committee that produced the text. Survivors are quickly diminishing in number, and with them living memories, he noted. The scroll is also a response to an increase in Holocaust denial and distortion, as well as a way of ensuring that historic events will be remembered, he added.

There are six chapters to the scroll, one for each of the six million Jews who perished in the Holocaust. The text evokes the emotional toll of the Shoah using first-person narratives in chapters titled Chaos and Confusion, Darkness, and Facing the Abyss, but ends with a message of strength and hope in the final chapter, There Will be Light Again.

The dedication ceremony included the lighting of six memorial candles by members of the community, and the chanting of K'El Maleh Rachamim by Cantor Marshall Loomer and of the Mourners' Kaddish by Rabbis Abraham Feffer and Erwin Schild. The Renanim Youth Ensemble and Cantors Aaron Bensoussan, Louis Danto and Benjamin Maissner, who chanted one of the chapters, also participated.

Book chronicles life in Montreal's Jewish orphanages

By STACEY STEIN
Special to The CJN

Like many Montrealers, Judy Gordon was not aware of the two Jewish orphanages in Montreal that provided a home for more than 300 Jewish children from 1909 to 1942. That is, not until she met her husband Myer Gordon, who spent most of his childhood at one of the orphanages.

Jewish Book Fair

"Nothing has been written about the orphanages in Montreal," said Judy, who has produced a new book on the subject. "Out of all the Jewish authors in Montreal who wrote about the city's history, none have written about the orphanages. It's a story that had to be told."

Myer was "the catalyst, the inspiration behind this book," said Judy, who now lives in Toronto with her husband.

The book, Four Hundred Brothers and Sisters, which was launched Nov. 10 with a reading at the Jewish Book Fair at the Leah Posluns Theatre, probes this little-known part of Montreal's history.

The Montefiore Hebrew Orphans' Home and the Montreal Hebrew Orphans' Home provided shelter and a Jewish upbringing to children who had lost one or both parents or whose families could not care for them.

Myer Gordon spent 10 years at the Montefiore home, having entered the orphanage at age five with his older brother Ben. Gordon's widowed mother came to the orphanage a year later to take her sons home, but staff at the orphanage asked that she only take home Ben and leave Myer because he was "such a good boy."

The Gordons took turns telling the story of the orphanages at the book reading, which was attended by a strong contingent of ex-Montrealers, including a few alumni from the orphanages.

Myer recounted personal experiences and memories from his years at the Montefiore home and Judy read passages from her book.

Children at both orphanages were well-treated and were provided with many enriching activities, Judy said. "They were well-cared for, schooled, learned manners, religion, values and caring.

"Life in the [Montreal Hebrew Orphans'] Home was marked by privacy, individual treatment and informality, and with appropriate discipline – and discipline not as a group, but based on the need to develop self-reliance," Judy said. "For any public appearances they made, their status as orphans was played down."

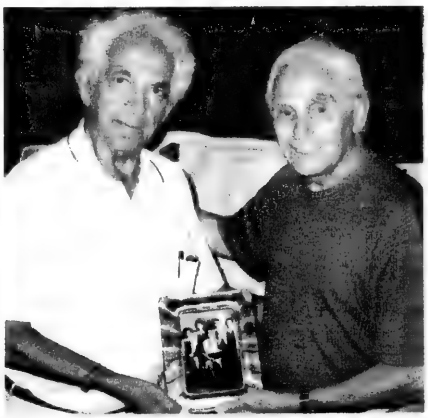
Not all of the children were orphans – many had one surviving parent. And some came from poor families and others were refugees from World War I.

The Montefiore home closed in 1936 and the Montreal home, located in Westmount, shut down in 1942. The buildings still exist today – the Westmount's is now a seminary for retired priests and the Montefiore's houses a French day-care centre.

The first combined reunion of alumni from both orphanages took place in 1989. Since then, there have been several more, including the last one this past August in Montreal.

Judy said her book is the culmination of one year of research and writing. Much of its material came from interviews with alumni of the two orphanages and from the Jewish archives in Montreal.

Judy has also written a humorous poetry book for children. Royalties from Four Hundred Brothers and Sisters are going to Montreal's Jewish Family Services to help needy children.



Myer Gordon (left) and fellow orphanage alumnus Earl Greenberg hold a photo taken at their group Bar Mitzvah at the Montefiore Hebrew Orpans Home in the 1930s, during a recent reunion in Montreal.

Israel not above the law: Cotler

"Every single word [I'm saying here]," he said, "I have also said in the House of Commons. I don't just speak about this to Jewish audiences."

For Cotler, Durban proved that Jews are a long way from equality. Yet, "whatever 2002 may be, it is not 1942," he said. "There is a Jewish state today as an antidote to Jewish powerlessness." And there are many "non-Jews... who will stand with us if we are prepared to make our case...

"Despair is not only a denial of our past, but a betrayal of our future. As long as they remain our abiding vision," he said, "truth and justice will prevail – Am Yisrael Chai!"

We supply the warmth...the rest is up to you.

Saddam must be stopped: Ross

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The United States courts catastrophe if it does not topple Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein, suggests a former American diplomat who played a pivotal role in shaping U.S. policy during the Oslo peace process.

In a speech at the University of Toronto last week, Dennis Ross warned that Saddam is determined to build a nuclear arsenal.

And if he succeeds, he will invade his neighbours yet again, said Ross, referring to previous Iraqi invasions of Iran and Kuwait.

"I don't want to wait until he gets nuclear weapons," he said. "We'll face a catastrophe if we don't stop him."

Without explicitly advocating regime change in Baghdad, Ross suggested that Iraq and the Middle East will be better off if Saddam is deposed.

Delivering the Heather Reisman and Gerald Schwartz lecture at the Munk Centre for International Studies, Ross observed that Saddam – a "master of miscalculation" who surrounds himself with sycophants in fear of their lives – is driven by a desire to dominate the Middle East and recreate the ancient kingdom of Babylon.

"Saddam actually believes he won the [1991] Gulf War. No one can tell this guy the truth. He's full of self-delusions."

Saying that Saddam may miscalculate once more and try to bully his neighbours, Ross said Saddam will "play for time" and pretend to comply with the latest United Nations resolution on Iraq.

On Nov. 8, the UN Security Council unanimously adopted a resolution demanding Iraq's disarmament.

Ross predicted that "the moment of truth" will come Dec. 8, when Iraq is expected to make a full and accurate accounting of all its programs to develop and deliver weapons of mass destruction.

"My guess is Saddam will reveal things that will surprise the UN inspectors, and will dump enormous material on us."

But Ross intimated that Iraq will fall short of making a complete and honest disclosure.

In Ross's view, the full extent of Iraq's holdings will not be revealed until after Saddam's demise.

Once he is gone, Iraqi scientists will come forward with valuable information.

Ross, the facilitator of the 1995 Oslo 2 agreement and the 1997 Hebron accord, said the United States may have to send commandos to western Iraq to pre-empt an Iraqi missile strike against Israel.

Israel, though, has improved its capacity to counter Iraq Scuds, he added.

Saddam's downfall will touch off "unlimited expressions of joy" in Iraq, and the Arab world, which respects power, will adjust to the new order in Baghdad, Ross said.

Taking issue with analysts who claim a U.S. invasion of Iraq will destabilize the region, Ross said this won't happen if the war ends quickly, within about a month, and civilian casualties are minimal.

A clean U.S. victory, he noted, may be of benefit to Israel and the Palestinians.

It could create the conditions for a period of calm in Israel's current struggle with the Palestinians, end suicide bombings, if only for awhile, and embolden Palestinian reformers to reach an accommodation with Israel.

Now a fellow at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, Ross said the reformers are in the vanguard of "a culture of responsibility" that rejects violence as a means by which to attain political goals.

He claimed reformers were making progress toward eroding Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat's position until Israel's 10-day siege of his compound in Ramallah in September.

As a result of the siege, Arafat's popularity increased and the process of reform was put on hold.

Asserting that Arafat has failed as a leader due to his refusal to change with the times, Ross said he offers his people no "pathway to the future," or hope for a better tomorrow.

Ross expressed doubt about what an Israeli expulsion of Arafat might accomplish. But he conceded it might be a useful exercise if Arafat's ouster coincided with the launching of a major Israeli peace initiative.

Ross, a key player at the July 2000 Camp David summit, said Arafat had missed a great opportunity by walking away from a peace proposal made by former Israeli prime minister, Ehud Barak.

Turning to Washington's newest Arab-Israeli peace plan, he said the "road map," while "conceptually right," does not offer a path to a solution. Ross speculated that Saudi Arabia's peace plan, which it unveiled in Beirut last March, may have received a more upbeat reception in Israel had Arab leaders condemned a massive suicide bombing in Netanya around the same time.

He urged the Arab League to prove its sincerity by sending a delegation, with Saudi participants, to Israel to explain the plan.

He also called on Palestinian leaders to condemn suicide bombers, as opposed to only condemning the bombings themselves.

RONEN BERCOVITCH – A Medical Miracle

At 23, in the prime of his young life, Ronen Bercovitch, a member of the Golani Divison was injured by a hand grenade during an anti-terrorist mission in Lebanon. Ronen suffered the loss of one leg and severe blood loss; his odds of survival were slim. Ronen's mother prayed that any disability could be managed as long as he just survived. He answered her prayers and has since achieved so much more. Doctors have referred to Ronen as a medical miracle.

Ronen has fought hard through intense pain with sheer determination and is now, 3 years later, physically rehabilitated and studying for a business degree. "It has been through the emotional and physical support of Beit Halochem that I am able to resume a 'normal' life. At Beit Halochem there is no shame or embarrassment in removing my artificial leg and going for a swim. I can become stronger in every way as a result of the facilities and friendship at Beit Halochem."

Hospice library opens at JF&CS

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

A new library, dedicated to those living with cancer, opened last month – breast cancer awareness month – at the offices of Jewish Family & Child Service.

The library is a project of JF&CS and the Jewish Hospice, a home-centred palliative care program of Baycrest Centre, Circle of Care, JF&CS, UJA Federation and Mount Sinai Hospital.

The hospice program offers links to community resources and institutions, counselling and emotional support for patients and their families, assistance with daily living, spiritual care in co-ordination with an individual's own religious network, bereavement counselling and education for community and professional groups.

Sheila Walker, hospice co-ordinator, said the the first donations to the library were made by the families of Judith Orbach and Edith Veig, two members of a support group for terminally ill women that met about seven years ago.

All of the group's members have since died.

Walker says she formed the group after deciding that several women she had been meeting individually could benefit from the support of other women in the same situation.

"They talked about their fears, about how to enjoy a good quality of life even though they were ill, and basic things such as diet and exercise."

Walker said she was inspired by the original group to begin a second support group for anyone dealing with a life-threatening illness.

"We expanded the criteria for the group and made it available to women at any stage of their illness. This group ended because several of the women graduated and moved on with their lives."

It was gratifying, she said, to see some of these women – many dedicated their cancer material such as videos, tapes and books to the library – at the library dedication.

Barbra Walters, a family life educator who facilitated the support groups, said Jewish women want knowledge.

"It is part of our culture. Jewish patients tend to be very informed. Members of one group even had homework assignments," she said.

Since the hospice program was formed about nine years ago, it has served about 850 people and their families. "The Jewish context of support is very important. There are Jewish ways to respond to illness and dying," said Walters.

The library material – housed on a bookshelf donated by the Forest Hill Lyons Club – may be borrowed by appointment.

"Anyone who wants to view our material, or who is looking for emotional or physical support, can call our office. No one needs to face their struggles alone," said Walker.

Although there is no current support group, Walker said another one can be organized if people are interested.

For information on support groups, or on borrowing or donating library material, call the Jewish Hospice Program at 416-638-7800, ext. 260.

First intifadah made Israel stronger: analyst

Accelerated process of healing from Holocaust

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Israel emerged from the first intifadah as a more healthy society, says Yossi Klein HaLevi, a contributing editor and Israel correspondent for the New Republic and a commentator for the Los Angeles Times.

After the first intifadah, the process of healing from the Holocaust became accelerated. "We did not feel that Israel had become victimized by choice," he told a capacity crowd recently at Holy Blossom Temple.

On a personal level, HaLevi said that as the son of a Holocaust survivor, the experience of defending Israel by serving in the West Bank and Gaza freed him from identifying himself as a victim.

HaLevi, who is also the author of the Entrance to the Garden of Eden, was the second speaker in Holy Blossom's Gerald Schwartz/Heather Reisman fall lecture series.

In the '90s, HaLevi said, partly as a result of that intifadah, "the centrist Israeli mainstream began the slow and excruciating process of forcing themselves to begin to read the other side's narrative.

"It is the story of two traumatized people with ample rights and ample wrongs, both struggling to find a place on the same piece of land."

Regarding the famous 1993 handshake on the White House lawn, he said, "the only reason we considered such a leap of faith was because we realized that we could not remain a healthy society if the occupation continued into the next generation. We were desperate to believe that peace was on the way."

Israelis willfully blinded themselves to any unpleasant facts that might have undermined that optimism, he said.

The painful awakening to the truth of the peace process, however, "became the story of the mid-'90s.

"Gradually, we began to realize that the real question is 'Why are we-allowing [Palestinian Authority President] Yasser Arafat to create a culture that nurtures terrorism?'"

For decades, said HaLevi, Israelis allowed themselves to be dominated by two absurd ideologies.

"We wanted to believe we could dominate another people and still remain a democratic and Jewish society, and that we could empower a terrorist organization whose charter is committed to our destruction."

There are certain non-negotiable demands that history has imposed on the current generation of Jews, he said.

"The first is that we are forbidden to do to others what has been done to us, a lesson which has become the passion of the left. The second is that a generation after the Holocaust, we are forbidden to be fools. You do not empower someone who wants to destroy you."

As a people, we violated these imperatives, he said.

In recent months, Israelis have suffered an almost clinical depression, said HaLevi.

"We plunged into deep despair and disillusionment, and we were not sure what it would take to end the war."

A turn came however, with the Passover massacre, and "within hours, [we] realized that we were in an existential war and we had no choice but to fight. We stunned ourselves by our willingness and our ability to fight."

Now, he said, Israelis are experiencing long lulls between attacks, so the tactics are working.

In the last month, for the first time, dissident voices are showing up within the Palestinian leadership, HaLevi said. "They are beginning to attack Arafat over this war. [They see it as] a war of political suicide.

"These seem to be the first cracks in the resolve of the Palestinian leadership."

Just as Israelis took the first intifadah as an opportunity to confront themselves as a society, the Palestinians will begin to confront themselves and examine how parents could celebrate the destruction of their children, HaLevi said.

"Self-examination is the prerequisite for resuming the peace process."

DISCOVER ISRAEL
The Science of Israel
Israel may be rich in spirituality but the country also displays an infinite fascination with science. Countless discoveries have come from Israel's universities and other respected research institutions such as the Weizmann Institute of Science and the Technion. Science is everywhere in the Holy Land, and the following are some of the most exciting sites to see science in action.
Bloomfield Science Museum, Jerusalem – See and hear how electricity flows through the human body, or marvel at the ROBOMOW, an Israeli invention that cuts the lawn without human assistance, at the new Senses and Sensors exhibit. Opened in 1992, the Bernard M. Bloomfield Science Museum has welcomed over one million visitors. For more information, browse www.mada.org.il
Israel National Museum of Science, Haifa – Located in Haifa's famous Technion building, the Israel National Museum of Science contains 350 permanent and changing exhibits. The newest exhibition, Secrets of Life, features interactive, three-dimensional displays about the mysteries of DNA. The museum also sponsors the prestigious OlympiYeda, the annual science competition, won last year by a Toronto teenager. Visit http://mustsee.org.il/english.
Albert Einstein Archives, Jerusalem – One of the Hebrew University's jewels, the archives contain the world's largest collection of Einstein's manuscripts and his scientific feats. It's a fitting tribute to one of the world's legendary scientific figures and one of the university's most prominent founders. For additional information, take a look at www.albert-einstein.org.
Whatever your interest, there's always something to discover in Israel. It's a wonderful time to see our magnificent country, knowing how much the people of Israel appreciate your presence and the positive impact of your trip on Israel's struggling economy.
After all, Israel is yours. So please say I care and I'm going.

Italian Jewish author discusses life in Mussolini's Italy

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

She was a a typical Italian teenager when her world came crashing down under the oppressive weight of Benito Mussolini's anti-Semitic laws of 1938.

Italy's racial legislation, aping Nazi Germany's, marginalized Jews who had always felt more Italian than Jewish.

"Before 1938, we were like everyone else," said Angela Bianchini, one of Italy's most prominent novelists, short story writers and literary journalists.

"I was simply a person of a different religion," she added plaintively in an interview.

Bianchini, who has written several novels about her experiences as a persecuted Jew forced into exile, was in Toronto recently to deliver a lecture to the Canadian Society for Italian Studies.

Angela Bianchini

As might have been expected, her topic was herself – or, as she described it, "my existential narrative."

Now 80 and somewhat frail, Bianchini is the author of seven novels, including The Edge of Europe and The Girl in Black, the only two that have been translated into English.

Published by the University of Nebraska Press, The Edge of Europe, or Capo d'Europa, is autobiographical, taking place in Lisbon and revolving around a young Jewish woman fleeing fascist Italy.

Writing in the newspaper La Stampa, critic Furio Colombo called it "the only testimonial" in Italian literature on the flight of a Jew from Italy's racial intolerance.

In general, the themes of identity, persecution, uprootedness and exile inform Bianchini's works, explained Giuliana Katz, a professor of Italian at the University of Toronto.

"As an Italian Jew, compelled to leave Italy during World War II and to find refuge in the United States, Bianchini, in her novels, describes the pain and dazed feelings of a refugee who has to leave her family and become integrated in a new country."

Looking back at her long and turbulent life, Bianchini said ruefully, "History has looked for me."

She was born in Rome into a Sephardi Jewish family whose ancestors were expelled from Spain after the Inquisition.

Her mother, Marcella Levi, was widowed when her husband, Angelo, an Italian naval officer, was murdered under mysterious circumstances in Syria in 1920.

Angelo, apparently the only officer in the Italian navy at the time who was conversant in Arabic, was seconded to the foreign ministry when the major European powers were jockeying for influence and positions in the Middle East after World War I.

"I was born eight months after his death," said Bianchini.

Marcella raised Angela and her sister, Regina, single-handedly.

When the racial laws were enacted, Bianchini felt its effects immediately. She was expelled from school and forced to study at home. Nevertheless, as she noted with some pride, she passed her exams with flying colours.

However, she was not permitted to enter university.

Thanks to her mother's connections in the Italian government, she and Regina, as well as Regina's husband, were granted exit visas.

Regina, an art historian, and her husband left Italy in 1940. Bianchini departed a year later, leaving Marcella and her mother behind. They survived thanks to the kindness of anti-fascists.

After the war, Marcella's diary about her experiences during the war years was published in Italian under the title of Where Shall I Go Now?

Surprisingly, perhaps, Bianchini feels no bitterness or anger toward Italy regarding its treatment of its Jewish citizens.

As she put it: "It was a terrible mistake for the Italian people."

No one in Bianchini's extended family was killed during the Holocaust. But of Italy's 42,000 native-born Jews, approximately 8,000 perished, most in Auschwitz.

Six thousand Jews managed to emigrate before Germany occupied Italy in 1943 and began deporting Jews to concentration camps in Poland.

Bianchini spent 11 years in Baltimore, where she learned her fluent English. She studied at Johns Hopkins University, earning a PhD in French linguistics at 24.

"They were very good years," she recalled. "Objectively, Mussolini did me a good turn."

It never occurred to Bianchini not to return to Italy, where she was reunited with her mother.

"My ties with Italy were very strong, something I couldn't forget. We had been living in Italy for centuries."

Having returned to Rome, where she still resides, Bianchini turned her talents to writing commentaries on Spanish and Latin American literature for La Stampa, churning out plays for the Italian Broadcasting Corporation and translating medieval French novels into Italian.

In 1962, when she was 41, she produced her first collection of short stories. Since then, she has concentrated on novels. In both forms, she has won prizes.

Bianchini's latest novel, Nevada, is set on a dude ranch in the early 1950s and is not, she noted, autobiographical.

She writes almost every day, in long-hand, and is currently mulling over the plot of her next novel. "I don't have it clear in my mind as yet."

Twice married, she was divorced from her first husband years ago. Her second husband died in 1997.

Bianchini's only child, a professor of ancient Oriental history, lives in Rome, as does her older sister.

Irish rabbi's descendants gather in Dublin

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

The Leventon family reunion, held recently in Dublin, Ireland, brought together 127 direct descendants – including 28 from Canada – of Rosa and Rabbi Israel Leventon, who lived in the 19th century.

Rabbi Leventon served as the last spiritual leader of Dublin's Mary's Abbey Synagogue, which closed in 1892, and he was the first spiritual leader of the Adelaide Road Synagogue, which opened a short time later.

The Leventons' descendants who came to the reunion ranged in age from four to 95 and hailed from Ireland, Scotland, England, Israel, the United States, Belgium and Canada. Many had never met before.

"It took a year-and-a-half to collect names and addresses of relatives and put the reunion together," says Toronto's Joy Schreiber, who worked on the arrangements with two cousins in London, England.

Israel and Rosa (formerly Greenberg) were born in Poland in the early 1830s. They met and married in Poland and left in 1861 for England, where the rabbi served congregations in Leeds, Leicester and Swansea before moving to Dublin with their six children.

In Dublin, among his many duties he served as rabbi, cantor, Torah reader, mohel, shochet, sofer, registrar, secretary and teacher.

The patriarch of the Leventon family also inscribed a Torah on parchment of his own making, a 10-year labour of love. He presented the scroll to his synagogue in 1894, and it has been in continuous use ever since.

At the reunion, the Torah scroll, which had recently been repaired, was consecrated at a special Shabbat service.

The chief rabbi of Ireland, Yaakov Pearlman, spoke about Rabbi Leventon, saying the rabbi did a job that today would take 10 men. He added that it is believed that Rabbi Leventon's Sefer Torah is the only one ever written in Ireland.

"The thing that strikes me," said Schreiber, "is that it was such a joyous affair because the Leventon family was not touched by the Holocaust like my father Sidney Levitt's family."

Today, there are 337 Leventon descendants.

The reunion included family meals, services in the Dublin Synagogue and visits to the Irish Jewish Museum, which records that Jews lived in Ireland as far back as 1079 CE.

There was also a reception at city hall hosted by the Lord Mayor of Dublin, a visit to the fictional birth place of Leopold Bloom of James Joyce's Ulysses, and a visit to the park where Oscar Wilde is memorialized.

"We also visited the graves of Israel and Rosa Leventon," Schreiber said. "We realized that he was everything in his community."

Dublin now has 1,000 Jews, she said. There were more than 5,000 Jews at the turn of the 20th century.

To commemorate the occasion, everyone who attended received an engraved kiddush cup, and a "a handsome donation was given to the Jewish Home of Ireland in honour of Israel and Rosa by five generations who were there," Schreiber said.

The Leventon family now has a Web site and Schreiber said family members are frequently in touch.

Jewish Life

Acknowledging mazel tov

By RABBI REUVEN TRADBURKS

Rabbinic Reflections

We have all done it – when someone drops a glass and it shatters on the floor, we yell out mazel tov. Why do we do this? Well, one would assume we are imitating the traditional wedding custom that occurs at the end of the ceremony, under the chupah, when the groom breaks the glass to commemorate the destruction of the Temple and everyone yells out mazel tov. So, too, when we hear a glass break accidentally, we jokingly yell out mazel tov.

However, there is a more meaningful explanation. We all need to experience some suffering in life. Suffering can take a variety of forms – life-threatening illnesses, financial ruin, marital breakdowns, parent-child conflicts. Some suffering is much more manageable – flat tires, being stuck in traffic, rainy Sundays. So when a person breaks a glass, we yell mazel tov – meaning, boy, aren't you fortunate that your suffering is a little broken glass. You have good mazel to have such innocuous suffering.

The Chidushei HaRim, the first Gerer Rebbe, uses a similar theme when he describes the confrontation between Jacob and Esau in this week's parshah. Jacob is afraid to meet Esau – after all, Esau wanted to kill him the last time they saw each other 22 years ago. Jacob is preparing for some kind of confrontation. So the Torah describes in great detail all of Jacob's possessions – he comes to greet Esau with his entire entourage of servants, camels, donkeys, goats and cows. He instructs his servants to tell Esau that he, Jacob, has been with Laban until now and that he has a lot of servants and possessions.

But why the emphasis on these possessions? The Chidushei HaRim offers a simple explanation – Jacob wants to focus the confrontation on the material goods. In essence he is saying, if we are going to fight, let it be focused on my possessions rather than on spiritual things. If I have to lose something, let me lose my material things. We can all live without those. Let me divert the conflict away from the real nexus of the conflict, which is over the legacy of Abraham and the future of the Jewish people. I can live with a conflict over material things – in fact, I am willing to lose my material things – but I am not willing to lose my legacy as the leader of the Jewish people.

This is a profound insight on Jacob's preparation for his confrontation with Esau – diverting attention away from the substantive and to seemingly the trivial. The Chidushei HaRim explains a verse in Psalm 23 – "You prepare a table before me in the face of my enemies" – in the same way: You, HaShem, try to divert my enemies to fight over possessions, over my opulence and You save my inner being from opposition.

Struggle and challenge in material things can sometimes be a blessing in disguise because it saves us from challenges to our inner spiritual being. Misfortune displayed in trivial broken glasses is reason to rejoice that we have been spared much more serious misfortune – and that, indeed, is mazel tov.

Rabbi Tradburks is the spiritual leader of Kehillat Shaarei Torah Congregation in Toronto.

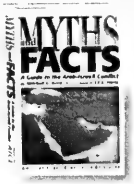
Long history of mistreatment of Jews in Arab lands

MYTH:

Jews who lived in Islamic countries were well-treated by the Arabs.

FACT:

While Jewish communities in Islamic countries fared better than those in Christian lands in Europe, Jews were no strangers to persecution and humiliation among the Arabs. As Princeton University historian Bernard Lewis has written in his book Pro-Islamic Jews: "The Golden Age of equal rights was a myth, and belief in it was a result, more than a cause, of Jewish sympathy for Islam."



In 622 AD, Mohammed, the founder of Islam, travelled to Medina to attract followers to his new faith. When the Jews of Medina refused to convert, two of the major Jewish tribes were expelled; in 627, Muhammad's followers killed between 600 and 900 of the men, and divided the surviving Jewish women and children among themselves.

The Muslim attitude toward Jews is reflected in various verses throughout the Qu'ran. "They [the Children of Israel] were consigned to humiliation and wretchedness. They brought the wrath of God upon themselves, and this because they used to deny God's signs and kill His Prophets unjustly and because they disobeyed and were transgressors" (Sura 2:61). According to the Qu'ran, the Jews try to introduce corruption (5:64), have always been disobedient (5:78), and are enemies of Allah, the Prophet and the angels (2:97-98).

Jews were generally viewed with contempt by their Muslim neighbours; "peaceful" coexistence between the two groups involved the subordination and degradation of the Jews. In the ninth century, Baghdad's Caliph al-Mutawakkil designated a yellow badge for Jews, setting a precedent that would be followed centuries later in Nazi Germany.

At various times, Jews in Muslim lands lived in relative peace and thrived culturally and economically. But their position was never secure, and changes in the political or social climate would often lead to persecution, violence and death.

When Jews were perceived as having achieved too comfortable a position in Islamic society, anti-Semitism would surface, often with devastating results. On Dec. 30, 1066, Joseph HaNagid, the Jewish vizier of Granada, Spain, was crucified by an Arab mob that proceeded to raze the Jewish quarter of the city and slaughter its 5,000 inhabitants. The riot was incited by Muslim preachers who had angrily objected to what they saw as inordinate Jewish political power.

Similarly, in 1465, Arab mobs in Fez slaughtered thousands of Jews, leaving only 11 alive, after a Jewish deputy vizier treated a Muslim woman in "an offensive manner." The killings touched off a wave of similar massacres throughout Morocco.

Other mass murders of Jews in Arab lands occurred in Morocco in the eighth century, where whole communities were wiped out by the Muslim ruler Idris I; North Africa in the 12th century, where the Almohads either forcibly converted or decimated several communities; Libya in 1785, where Ali Burzi Pasha murdered hundreds of Jews; Algiers, where Jews were massacred in 1805, 1815 and 1830; and Marrakesh, Morocco, where more than 300 hundred Jews were murdered between 1864 and 1880.

Decrees ordering the destruction of synagogues were enacted in Egypt and Syria (1014, 1293-4, 1301-2), Iraq (854-859, 1344) and Yemen (1676). Despite a prohibition in the Qu'ran, Jews were forced to convert to Islam or face death in Yemen (1165 and 1678), Morocco (1275, 1465 and 1790-92) and Baghdad (1333 and 1344).

The situation of Jews in Arab lands reached a low point in the 19th century. Jews in most of North Africa (including Algeria, Tunisia, Egypt, Libya and Morocco) were forced to live in ghettos. In Morocco, which contained the largest Jewish community in the Islamic Diaspora, Jews were made to walk barefoot or wear shoes of straw when outside the ghetto. Muslim children threw stones at them. The frequency of anti-Jewish violence increased, and many Jews were executed on charges of apostasy. Ritual murder accusations against the Jews became commonplace in the Ottoman Empire.

In the 1940s, more than 1,000 Jews were killed in anti-Jewish rioting in Iraq, Libya, Egypt, Syria and Yemen, triggering the mass exodus of Jews from Arab countries.

Jewish Life

Hope for the three great faiths

Abraham: A Journey to the Heart of Three Faiths*, by Bruce Feiler, William Morrow, $36.50.

All that we know about Abraham comes to us from the Hebrew Scriptures. There are no other sources for his existence. This lack of documentary evidence has encouraged Jewish, Christian and Muslim traditions to fashion elaborate midrashim around his life, activities and importance.

Books
Bernard Baskin

"They took a biblical figure open to all, tossed out what they wanted to ignore, and ginned up what they wanted to stress," writes Feiler. For Paul, Abraham was a symbol of faith that came before Mosaic Law. This was a useful interpretation for opening Christianity to the wider pagan world. Mohammed identified Abraham as a precursor of himself, a figure with Arabian roots who was ready to break with his polytheistic forebears.

Feiler, the author of last year's bestselling book, Walking the Bible, which took readers on a spiritual, theological and geographical tour through biblical lands, now insightfully rediscovers the central episodes of Abraham's saga: the initial call by god; Abraham's passive acceptance of Sarah's demand that he cast out his offspring Ishmael (viewed by Muslims as their ancestor); his challenge to God to spare Sodom and Gomorrah; and, most chillingly, the sacrifice of Isaac, which poses the question of whether devotion to God requires killing.

Feiler stresses that the account of the Akedah, in which God asks Abraham to sacrifice Isaac, is a central religious idea in each of the three monotheistic faiths. Jews, of course, read this story on Rosh Hashanah. Christians read it during the week of Easter, and Muslims read it during their holiest time, the last week of the Pilgrimage to Mecca.

Although the Akedah is often cited as the ultimate example of devotion to God, it is not mentioned anywhere else in the Torah apart from Genesis. Not David, Solomon, or any of the prophets refers to the story, though they allude to many other events in the patriarch's lives. "When later books cite Abraham, they mention his departure from Ur, his receipt of the covenants, his promise of land," Feiler writes. "Perhaps they were perplexed by the event. Perhaps they wanted to distance themselves from an allusion to child sacrifice. We don't know."

The Qu'ran has its own version of the life of Ishmael and his mother Hagar. Instead of banishing them to the Negev, Abraham actually takes them to Mecca, settles them there and returns home. Feiler writes, "Left alone in the desert, Hagar runs seven times between two rocks looking for water before an angel appears and saves her. A vital shift is under way, moving the locus of the story away from the Fertile Crescent to Arabia, where Ishmael grows up to become a prominent Arab."

Abraham's death promotes peace. His two rival sons, Isaac and Ishmael, come together for his funeral, the first time since they were torn apart three quarters of a century earlier. Abraham achieves in death what he could never achieve in life: a moment of reconciliation between his two sons, a peaceful, communal, side-by-side flicker of possibility in which they are not rivals, but brothers and mourners.

Well-researched and written, Abraham offers a vision of hope and reconciliation – not soon or easily to be attained in our bitterly fragmented society.

Chanukah gelt & the Internet

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

It's one of the most popular traditions of one of the most well-known holidays of the year. But the question why we give Chanukah gelt can leave most people scratching their heads. Today, some Chanukah gelt traditions from the World Wide Web.

Ohr Somayach explains that Chanukah gelt is a Jewish custom rooted in the Talmud. "The Talmud states that even a very poor person must light Chanukah lights, even if he can't afford it. A person with no money is required to go 'knocking on doors' until he collects enough to buy at least one candle for each night of Chanukah. The Torah concept of charity – tzedakah – requires us to help the recipient in the most dignified manner possible. Therefore, the custom arose to give gifts of money during Chanukah so that someone who needs extra money for Chanukah candles can receive it in the form of 'Chanukah gelt'" [http://www.ohr.org.il/ask/ask173.htm#Q5].

Eliezer Siegel traces the evolution of the tradition in Gelt to Gifts: A Chanukah Journey [http://www.ucalgary.ca/~elsegal/Shokel/961121_Geltl.html]. He writes that because of the similarities of the words "Chanukah" (dedication) and "chinuch" (education), some Jewish communities used the Chanukah season to honour their religious teachers and students. In 18th-century eastern Europe, rabbis toured outlying villages during Chanukah to strengthen the townsfolk's Jewish education. Initially, these rabbis would decline payment. But eventually, they accepted tokens of appreciation for their time. Eventually, these gifts or gelt because almost obligatory to the rabbis, to other pillars of the community and then, in the 19th century, to children. Other traditions of giving coins or small gifts to kids have also been found in Persia, Yemen and pre-State of Israel Palestine.

If you do opt to give gifts, Jewish Family.com has some suggestions to keep your spending and nerves under control [http://www.jflmail.com/articles/587.html]. Instead of trying to compete with the seasonal frenzy, Lisa Traiger says you should look for low-key Jewish-oriented gifts to bring Chanukah – and your kids – back to their roots. Some suggestions: Jewish books, music, dreidels, puzzles, crafts, and of course, gelt.

According to the Jewish Outreach Institute, there is another direct connection between gelt and the story of Chanukah. After the Temple was recaptured, the Jewish population was able to mint coins as an expression of their newly-won independence. After the Temple was destroyed in 70 C.E., Jewish coinage ended except for a brief period during the Bar Kochba Revolution. But all that changed when the State of Israel revived the tradition. "In a brilliantly conceived move to link the modern world with the ancient history of our people, the first Chanukah coin portrayed exactly the same menorah that had appeared on the Last Maccabean coins of Antigonus Matityahu, 1,998 years earlier" [http://www.joi.org/celebrate/hanuk/gelt.shtml].

You can view drawings of some original coins on the American Israel Numismatic Association Web site [http://amerisrael.com/articles_chanukah_gelt_4.html]. And to look at some of the modern Chanukah coins minted in Israel, visit the Commemoratives International site. The Connecticut-based company operates a large Web site with pictures of the beautiful coins minted by Israel since 1958 [http://www.comm em.com/prod 04.htm].

Nowadays, most gelt exchanged at Chanukah isn't made of genuine gold or silver, but of chocolate. Many of our fond memories for those bags of coins can be traced to Israel's Elite chocolate company, which has an impressive Hebrew-only Web site [http://www. elite.co.il/]. For the homemade touch, you can try some Surprise Chanukah Gelt [http://shlk.com /222] or chocolate coins with mint [http: //shlk. com/224].

How about a batch of Chanukah Gelt Cookies? These treats have real gelt inside [http://shlk.com/223]. The Cyber-Kitchen site also has a recipe for White Cheesecake decorated with Chanukah Gelt. But if that's not decadent enough, try out the Chanukah Gelt Double Fudge Chocolate Layer Cake [http://www.jewish-food.org/recipes/ geltcake.htm]. You have eight days to finish it off, so it shouldn't be a problem.

Two weeks ago, I told you about entire Jewish books that you can read on the Internet. Prof. André Bougaïeff of the Université du Québec à Trois-Rivières has written to me about his project to put the entire text of Émile Zola's "J'Accuse...!" online [http://www.uqtr. ca/~bougaief /EFL]. Zola wrote "J'Accuse...!" in 1898 to defend Jewish Captain Alfred Dreyfus during France's infamous Dreyfus Affair. The online book is in the original French with help in English. Merci, Professeur Bougaïeff.

Tensions at York U are being addressed

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Despite – or perhaps because of – tensions among members of their respective groups at York University, Paul Cooper, president of the Young Zionist Partnership (YZP) and Ali Hassan, president of the Middle Eastern Students Association (MESA) maintain a cordial working relationship and were planning to meet this week with members of their executives.

"We try to maintain a working relationship for the good of our two groups and the good of the York community," said Cooper. "University is a place for debate to exist."

'We try to maintain a working relationship for the good of our two groups'

Recently the two groups were the subject of a front-page article in their campus newspaper Excalibur, after heated arguments broke out in a high-traffic area, the Vari-Ross link, when the YZP and MESA's Palestinian Human Rights committee had neighbouring tables. Each had literature deemed objectionable by the other group.

"I feel it's unfortunate that people who aren't interested in what's going on are forced to walk through a crowd of people yelling at us for having Israeli education on board," said Cooper, a co-founder last year of YZP, which is more right-wing and more politically oriented than JSF: The Centre for Jewish Campus Life at York University. YZP now has 180 members.

"Some students got carried away,' said Hassan. "Some people on both sides have families who have suffered." He said he was shoved when he asked one student for his name.

Cooper witnessed violence from the other side, in the form of a punching incident. But even in a non-hostile conversation with a moderate Arab student, he said, he was told that Jews have the upper hand because they own the media and the power structures and "can manufacture truth."

That exchange represents "a scary new attitude emerging on campus," said Cooper, who countered those assumptions one example at a time, noting for instance that media mogul Ted Turner is not Jewish.

The YZP poster that sparked objections from MESA bore two images side by side: under the headline "American terror," a white-robed and hooded Ku Klux Klan member; next to it bearing the title "Palestinian terror," an Arab, a keffiyah obscuring most of his face, and a bomb strapped to his head. The text read "The Face of Terror. Intolerance harms people of all races. The Common Bond is Hate!"

"Somehow that was deemed racist, as if we were referring to all Palestinians as terrorists, and as if we were referring to all Americans as terrorists," said Cooper. He noted that he and Hassan had had an "unofficial agreement" that each group would have items the other would "not enjoy" and that there would be no need to go to each other's tables.

Cooper said he told Hassan that some of MESA's information was statistically false. He also objected to pictures of Israeli soldiers dealing aggressively with children, because of a lack of context and misleading implications.

He does not see the recent incident as a setback in Jewish-Arab student relations. He said that at the upcoming meeting, the two groups would share what they planned to display. Although he expects that nobody will like anything the other group has, they plan to single out and not use the most offensive items and each group "will know the worst because [we'll] have agreed to it." Part of the agreement would include letting group members know what was discussed, he said.

Hassan said that plans are to "make sure that information from both sides is accurate and that none of the information will induce violence or threats, and that none of it could be construed as hate propaganda. Hopefully we'll be able to present both views without inducing hate."

They are even talking about the possibility of a joint event.

"Discussion is always good," said Hassan. "Yelling and screaming is not productive at all."

Ahmad also encouraged those present to align themselves with global protests and participate in all demonstrations, including the Walk Out Against the War on Iraq, which took place on Nov. 13 at York at noon. Rally organizers "encouraged students, professors, workers to walk out of their classes or places of work... in protest against the unjust war."

Jewish Toronto

Helping Israel - from Toronto to Panama

When members of Toronto's Jewish community banded together on Israel's behalf, they joined countless Jews on many continents.

In the United States, United Jewish Communities (UJC), the umbrella organization for North American Jewish federation's, raised over $315 million U.S. to help ease Israel's emergency.

Keren Hayesod, the fundraising arm for the Jewish Agency - UJA Federation's overseas partner – works with 50 countries around the world to assist Israel.

Latin American communities fared better than ever as the crisis facing Israel was universally understood.

"We've seen particularly outstanding results in Mexico, and in Brazil," says KH Director General Gad Ben Ari. "Even small, more unlikely communities such as Panama, which has only 6,000 Jews, have come through. Panama quadrupled last year's total from $500,000 to $2 million this year."

Ben Ari also pointed to other solid contributors such as Greece and Australia, but says that Toronto's UJA Federation is the KH world leader.

"The results of Toronto's campaign have been simply incredible," notes Ben Ari. "Even though we, in Israel, recognize Toronto – and all of Canada – as a warm, strong, Zionist community, we didn't expect this."

Ben Ari, who was in Toronto in April just as the Israel Emergency Campaign began, says he felt something stirring among Torontonians.

"I could feel the electricity in the air, and I could see the look of determination on the faces of everybody I met in Toronto. I knew that this would be something special. The momentum was there from the very first day and it just kept gaining even more strength as the campaign wore on."

Gad Ben Ari, Director General of Keren Hayesod, in Toronto last April as UJA Federation's Israel Emergency Campaign 2003 began.

The Israel Now Consortium is uniting Jewish Toronto

The Israel Now Consortium, with a membership of over 100 community organizations and growing, is a thriving force in initiating, planning and promoting pro-Israel activities in Toronto. Chaired by Julia Koschitzky, the consortium - under the auspices of UJA Federation and the Consulate General of Israel - offers one of North America's most unified voices on Israel's behalf.

The consortium – representing the entire religious and ideological spectrum of the community – is playing a critical role by ardently and passionately showing the citizens of Israel they will never stand alone.

"The consortium makes a bold statement to our brothers and sisters in Israel. It lets them know that we are here, doing something, big or small, every day for them," says Koschitzky.

Consortium-run rallies in Toronto attracted more than 20,000 participants, while also helping send thousands more to pro-Israel rallies in Washington and Ottawa by bus and plane. It also organized Toronto's largest-ever Yom Ha'atzmaut celebration at Earl Bales Park with over 10,000 participants on hand.

On Yom Ha'atzmaut, more than 10,000 people marched along Bathurst Street to Earl Bales Park for a celebration organized by the Israel Now Consortium.

For Richmond Hill dentist and Ottawa rally participant Alex Pister, the Israel Now Consortium is essential in uniting Jews for the good of Israel.

"I'll be honest with you," says Pister, "I didn't want to go to Ottawa. My wife convinced me that it was my moral obligation to go, and it turned out to be one of the best decisions I made. These rallies are essential. It was great to see so many Jews, young and old, from all religious backgrounds, together. Even my two young daughters who came with me said afterwards that they were so happy and proud to be Jewish."

"The Israel Now Consortium is an extremely important organization under the tremendous leadership of Julia Koschitzky," says Israel's Consul General Meir Romem. "The Israel Now Consortium has been doing an outstanding job. The rallies, the educational speakers, everything they are doing in Toronto is having a wonderful affect on Israel. The Consulate is very happy with the work of the consortium, and so is Israel."

"The consortium is a reflection of Toronto's remarkable Jewish community and its unbreakable bond with Israel," adds Koschitzky. "Few communities in the world have united to such an extraordinary extent on behalf of Israel and the impact can only be positive and powerful."

Jewish Chamber of Commerce holds inaugural event

Community comes through for unprecedented results

UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign 2003 has raised $61 million so far, on track for $66 million, making it the most successful campaign in the history of Toronto's Jewish community and the Jewish world's third largest.

A portion of funds raised during UJA Federation's Israel Emergency Campaign 2003 will assist Israel's victims of terror.

Israel emergency funds raised will assist Israel's victims of terror; expand security at kindergartens and daycare centres; enhance medical, psychological and human services for Israel's most vulnerable; and intensify Israel advocacy activities in Canada.

Emergency money will be allocated to:

- Security guards at Israeli pre-schools
- Israeli children who have lost one or both parents at the hands of terrorists
- Israeli hospitals and trauma centres for medical equipment
- Parent and child centres and expanded programming for children at risk
- Intensified efforts to promote support for Israel in Canada and to fight a new worldwide wave of anti-Semitism

"When this campaign began in April, every volunteer and donor knew that Israel could never survive indifference," says Howard Sokolowski, chair of the campaign with Ronnie Appleby. "So the outpouring of love for Israel was immediate and never-ending. We witnessed a revival of love for Israel among thousands of young people who gave gifts, joined missions, planned programs and proudly held placards at community events."

"From day one, people knew that it was up to all of us to stand together with Israel during these tough times," says Appleby. "They came through as expected, and the entire community should feel proud."

The chronology of a campaign

In early April this year, UJA Federation and Toronto's Jewish community – with the urgency of Israel's situation on everyone's mind – sprang into action.

Toronto's UJA Federation annual campaign was about to begin – four months earlier than usual – in conjunction with Israel Emergency Campaigns across North America.

UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign 2003 recently surpassed the $60 million mark, $19 million more than last year at this time, on its way to $66 million.

In the first two months of the Emergency Campaign, UJA had raised more than $45 million.

"The need for programs to serve Israel's most vulnerable was dramatically increasing as resources were – necessarily – being diverted to security; the cost of long-term terror relief increased with every blast," says Howard Sokolowski, chair of the campaign with Ronnie Appleby.

"Israeli families and the entire country are suffering economic hardships, so these emergency fundraising dollars have made a major difference," says Appleby. "Our message to Israel loudly and clearly is that 'we're with you.'"

Appleby and Sokolowski immediately recruited an emergency cabinet for the most important UJA campaign since the 1973 Yom Kippur War. A UJA leadership delegation took off for Israel on April 8 for an emergency fact-finding mission.

An emergency meeting of leading donors, chaired by Barry Sherman and Irving Granovsky, was quickly called at Toronto's Royal York Hotel where $7.5 million additional dollars for Israel were raised.

UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign 2003 was not based solely on fundraising. Monthly missions to Israel and advocacy for Israel were the other key components. One of the world's largest demonstrations of support for Israel occurred on UJA Federation's Walk With Israel, on May 20, when 25,000 Torontonians marched through the downtown streets and filled the SkyDome.

Campaign supporter Dov Altman was not surprised by Toronto's commitment to Israel.

"As a community, we in Toronto have always been very generous to Israel – not only through UJA Federation, but other organizations as well," says Altman. "We, as parents, are proud to support Israel and show our children just how remarkable a people we are."

For long-time UJA Federation campaign canvasser, Agi Mandel, convincing Toronto's Jewish community to dig deep wasn't a difficult assignment.

"Everybody understood Israel's situation clearly," says Mandel. "It was actually exhilarating to speak to the members of this incredible community. Talking to virtual strangers, we had the common concern and interest of Israel which we would end up discussing and sharing with each other. We are so fortunate to be a part of this amazing community."

Our mission is Israel

a record 29 missions in 24 months

Members of Toronto's Jewish community have not only financially supported Israel the past two years, they've been visiting Israel on solidarity missions as well. In fact, over 2,000 Torontonians have joined solidarity trips – 1300 of them on UJA Federation's 29 missions – the most of any other North American community.

"I don't believe there is any other Jewish community in the world that has sent nearly 30 missions in 24 months," says Victor Yagoda of the UIA Federations Canada office in Israel.

"Believe me, I was not someone who was likely to ever go on a mission to Israel," says Jonathan Kirshblum. "I've been to Israel over 20 times on my own or with family, and I visit family in Israel quite often, so for me, a mission was not really an option."

However, that mentality changed after he saw the positive impact of his mission on the people of Israel.

"The war with the Palestinians is not really a military war; it's a spiritual war, testing the spiritual resolve of Israelis," he says. "I learned that by sending mission after mission to Israel, we are showing Israelis that they are not alone, and that missions are vital for their spiritual well-being."

Toronto's Philip Ladovsky, a recent mission participant, says that missions serve as an educational tool for Jews of every age.

"I went because it's essential that as many of us go as possible," says Ladovsky, "but I also went because I wanted my son, Nathan, who recently had his bar mitzvah, to see Israel firsthand."

Ladovsky figured that it was time for Nathan – who has spent the last 8 years involved in Zionist studies at Bialik – to get out of a book and onto the land itself.

"The time was right for my son to go and appreciate Israel for all that it is. I wanted him to meet its remarkable people, touch its earth, and breathe its air. He did it, and, hopefully, we'll do it again soon with my two other sons."

"It's like a boxer who keeps getting hit over and over again," adds Kirshblum. "If he returns to his corner at the bell, but there's nobody there to encourage and soothe him, what will happen? Israel needs us in her corner."

Students brave cold to commemorate Holocaust victims

By LARA RABINOVITCH
Special to The CJN

At the recent Reading of the Names ceremony held at the University of Toronto as part of Holocaust Education Week, students stood outside in the cold in 20-minute shifts, from noon on Nov. 7 to noon on Nov. 8, reading the names of almost 20,000 Jews murdered during the Holocaust.

Holocaust Education Week

More than 75 students participated in the fourth annual event, which also marked the anniversary of Kristallnacht, the Night of Broken Glass, which occurred Nov. 9, 1938. Some Holocaust survivors also attended and read the names of their loved ones who had perished.

> 'When you read that person's name, you give them an identity'

Co-organized by Hyla Korn, the orientation, outreach and engagement co-ordinator for Hillel at U of T and the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life, and Noah Lazar, the philanthropy chair of the Jewish fraternity Alpha Epsilon Pi, the solemn event was held outside the University College Union building, near St. George and Harbord Streets. Korn and Lazar are both third year undergraduate students at U of T.

Robert Birgeneau, the university's president, was among the first to read names over the loudspeaker. Most names were read, along with place of birth and residence, and age and place of death. Approximately 700 of the people named were relatives of members of the Toronto Jewish community.

Frank Bialystok, adjunct professor of history at the University of Waterloo and author of Delayed Impact: The Holocaust and the Canadian Jewish Community, delivered a brief address at the ceremony's conclusion.

"When you read that person's name, you give them an identity," he said.

Bialystok said the ceremony is "a way of reconnecting with a heritage that was ruptured, a civilization that was destroyed."

One student added it would take almost one year of continual reading of names to identify all those who were murdered in the Holocaust.

Both Korn and Lazar, who had only four hours of sleep each during the event, thanked the participants and attendees for their support. They said many of the survivors were grateful that the students initiated the reading to honour and remember those who were killed.

United Church minister discusses Malcolm Ross

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Rev. James Leland says his life changed forever when he became aware of the anti-Semitic writings of former New Brunswick school teacher Malcolm Ross.

Until he heard about the Holocaust denial of Ross and others, the United Church minister said he knew little about Jews or Judaism. He was, in fact, happy with his quiet life in rural New Brunswick and had never imagined himself as a participant in a demonstration, let alone the instigator and leader of one.

In 1996, the Supreme Court of Canada upheld a human rights board ruling that upheld the Moncton, N.B., school board's order to remove Ross from teaching because he had published anti-Semitic material during his off-duty time.

Holocaust Education Week

The school board ordered Ross out of the classroom and gave him an administrative position after a 1988 complaint by a Jewish parent.

Feeling at the time that the Jews of the province were afraid to protest, Rev. Leland said he waited in vain for someone else to speak up.

"I was certain that there would be people who would speak out against this, but there was silence and Malcolm Ross went unopposed," he told a gathering at Southminster United Church as part of Holocaust Education Week.

"This was unacceptable to me. I could not stand the silence. I waited awhile, but then I found myself in a dilemma – I did not feel qualified or skilful enough, did not feel that I knew enough to make a stance," said the minister, who now lives in Ontario.

Beginning with a letter-writing campaign to churches, newspapers, teachers' union and government departments, Rev. Leland then spoke to groups and organized both individuals and organizations to refute Ross and other Holocaust deniers. He also met with Rabbi David Spiro, then of Fredericton, and immersed himself in reading and studying about Judaism.

"I wrote a letter to the people of New Brunswick and sent it to all the major newspapers. I pointed out to the people of New Brunswick that Malcolm Ross must be condemned and... that there was a need for Holocaust education in the schools of New Brunswick.

"I felt that young people could be swayed by racists without the proper education," he said.

As the media became aware of Rev. Leland's campaign, he said he began to get threatening calls and letters.

"For the very first time in my life, I felt threatened, insecure, attacked, and I knew what it was to be hated," he said.

Persevering, he said he was instrumental in the introduction of Holocaust education in N.B. schools.

Last month, Rev. Leland was recognized by the Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies for his work fighting anti-Semitism. He has received similar recognition from the Canadian Jewish Congress and the Atlantic Jewish Council, including the AJC's Jerusalem Award for his commitment to social justice.

On the same program, Rabbi Ely Braun of Beth Shalom Synagogue described his return for the first time to Germany, where he was born. In July 2001, after a rabbinic mission to Berlin, Rabbi Braun was joined by his mother, brother and sister-in-law on a family trip to Poland and Belarus. He shared his moving experience of returning to his roots and the bittersweet feelings the trip engendered.

Internet hate must be confronted: activist

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Though the number of neo-Nazis actively using the Internet to promote hatred is small, there aren't enough people working to refute them, says the director of a Web site dedicated to countering online Holocaust denial and racism.

Holocaust Education Week

Speaking at Congregation Machzikei Hadas as part of Holocaust Education Week, Ken McVay urged his mainly Jewish audience to "never quit" fighting racism, "because the minute you do, you are granting some Nazi a little more space to spread hate. The message of the Shoah is to never, ever forget."

When asked how widespread anti-Semitic propaganda is on the Internet, McVay, a non-Jew who has made it his life's work to fight Holocaust denial on the Web, said there is nothing to be alarmed about in terms of sheer volume.

He estimated that of the approximately 600 million people using the Internet, only about 200 to 300 are promulgating Nazi hatred.

But the "most serious problem" is that "there are only about two dozen people actively refuting their ideology.

"The danger is that one person can put up a very professional Web site and appear to represent thousands, and can reach people around the world," McVay said.

"My message to the world and, in particular, to the Jewish community, is that the hatred is not being confronted as it should."

A former U.S. Marine who has lived in British Columbia for 35 years, McVay credits his grandfather for teaching him to stand up for what is right.

He said he first encountered anti-Semitic literature and Holocaust denial propaganda on the Internet 10 years ago. The discovery led him to research the Holocaust and engage Holocaust deniers by countering their anti-Semitic propaganda with facts that he posts online.

The result of that work – the Nizkor Project, at www.nizkor.org – is perhaps the most extensive Web site dedicated to the refutation of Holocaust denial, one that is used extensively by researchers, journalists and students.

McVay said it is a "very bad time to be a Jew in Canada," because the situation in the Middle East has led to an increase in anti-Semitism and anti-Semitic incidents here.

McVay said he has been "accused" of being Jewish and has received many death threats because of his very public work.

McVay also told the audience that "from the Nazi point of view, you should be very proud of all your power. According to them, you control the media, the education system, the courts and the monetary system."

McVay, who believes in countering Holocaust deniers and racists with facts rather than censoring them, urged his listeners to "refuse to tolerate [hatred]... The hatred won't go away until you refuse to tolerate it in your community. No amount of legislation will do it... My belief is that the solution is public education."

McVay challenged the Jewish community to refuse to be apathetic. "It frustrates me that so many people just don't give a damn."

Collection of old Judaica on exhibit

OTTAWA — Many of the same people who were at the launch of the Jacob M. Lowy Collection a quarter century ago attended the recent opening of a new and exciting exhibit of some of its contents at the Library and Archives of Canada.

In Good Company: A Celebration of the Jacob M. Lowy Collection in Its 25th Year, brings together some of the most intriguing and beloved books from the 4,000-volume collection of old and rare Hebraica and Judaica dating from the 15th to the 20th century.

The collection, amassed by the late Jacob M. Lowy over a period of 50 years, was donated to the National Library of Canada in 1977 and has since been added to by a number of donors.

Those attending the opening ceremony for the new exhibit included members of the Lowy Council, an advisory body affiliated with the Friends of the National Library of Canada), Israel's ambassador to Canada, Haim Divon, former deputy prime minister Herb Gray, and Clara Lowy, Lowy's widow, who came from Montreal for the occasion.

"It is a wonderful celebration and I certainly feel grateful to be here in the company of so many people who were also at the [1977] opening of the library," Lowy said.

Following welcoming remarks by Roch Carrier, the national librarian, the exhibit's curator, Cheryl Jaffee, described the exhibit to guests.

"You will see two portraits gazing back at you from the far wall of the exhibition room. Two portraits. Two very different destinies," she said.

"One is the face of a father who was denounced and deported by the authorities in his hometown of Bardejob, in Slovakia. His name was Raphael Lowy, and he perished in Auschwitz.

"The other is the face of the son who survived. His name was Yaakov Elimelekh Levi – Jacob Max Lowy. Over the course of his lifetime, he would assemble a great library of old and rare Hebraica and Judaica. That creative act was his defiant response to those who would destroy the world... Tonight we honour them both."

Norman Barwin, chair of the Lowy Council, said the Lowy Collection is "a national treasure" and that "the warmth, the vibrations that come from every book, every book that touches you as you walk through the Judaica and Hebraica, it is our history."

The exhibit runs until Jan. 5. - D.K.

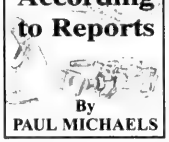
Double standards on targeted killings

On Nov. 2, the CIA fired a missile from an unmanned Predator aircraft over Yemen and killed a senior Al Qaeda leader and five colleagues as they were riding in a car near the capital of Sana.

This was the first time the Predator was employed outside Afghanistan, where it was used to kill Muhammed Atef, Al Qaeda's chief of military operations, last year.

According to Reports



By PAUL MICHAELS

Reporting on this operation in the Nov. 5 issue of the New York Times, James Risen and Judith Miller explained: "The decision to use military force to attack Al Qaeda leaders in Yemen rather than to try to arrest them fits in with a broader [Bush] administration view that the world is a battlefield in the campaign against terrorism, and that Al Qaeda operatives should be treated as enemy combatants."

In a follow-up story, the Times reported that the Yemen strike "was authorized under the same set of classified presidential findings, legal opinions and policy directives... that have set the rules for the administration's campaign to prevent terror."

However, it appears that what applies to the United States in combating terrorism does not apply to Israel.

The day after the Yemen attack, U.S. state department spokesman Richard Boucher reemphasized that America was opposed to Israel's "targeted killings" of Palestinians who are believed to be involved in terrorism. The two cases, Boucher says, were not comparable.

U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell underscored this assessment during an interview on CNN: "We believe that there are significant differences [between the cases of Israel and the United States]. [The Yemen] operation was a case of clearly somebody engaged in a direct conflict with the United States."

Israel was miffed because it finds itself under attack like the United States, except that Israel must contend with terrorist attacks almost every day, a "relentless campaign" as the CBC's Paul Workman put it in his Nov. 1 report, involving more than 50 suicide bombings since last January. And unlike Israel, the United States had not previously tried to negotiate a political settlement with an enemy sworn for a long time to its destruction.

While the United States chided Israel about its "targeted killings," it expressed near glee at the success of the Yemen operation. One senior U.S. law enforcement official said, "I'm ecstatic. We're at war and we've got to use the means at our disposal to protect the country. You've got to use all your tools, and this is a kind of war which requires us to fight on multiple fronts with all the weapons at our disposal."

And Tom Friedman, the New York Times' highly respected foreign affairs analyst, reflected: "I'm glad we did that. Sometimes it's the only way justice gets done" (Nov. 10). Friedman advocates diplomacy in the long run, but not with "hard-core terrorists" who must be dealt with decisively by force, if necessary.

But "hard-core terrorists" are precisely Israel's dilemma.

Is the old double standard at work again?

Court stops MPs from speaking at Concordia

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Concordia University's ban on public events related to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict will be tested in the Supreme Court, if New Democratic Party MP Svend Robinson has his way.

Robinson, the NDP's foreign affairs spokesperson, took his message to the sidewalk outside the downtown campus last Friday afternoon after he, fellow Vancouver-area NDP MP Libby Davies, and social activist and writer Judy Rebick of Toronto were legally prevented from speaking inside the building.

Robinson said the moratorium shows "utter contempt" for free speech and the injunction is "a travesty of justice" that he says he will challenge to the highest court.

They had been invited by the Concordia Student Union (CSU) to take part in a panel discussion on peace and justice in the Middle East. But less than two hours before the talk was to take place in the main auditorium, Quebec Superior Court granted Concordia an injunction. The court agreed with the administration that the moratorium has legal weight, because it was instituted in accordance with the university's normal legislative process sanctioned under its charter from the Quebec government.

Concordia argued that to allow the invited speakers onto the campus and thereby defy the moratorium in place since Sept. 9 would be a security risk to persons and property.

"Mr. Robinson's previous stand in matters of freedom of speech is commendable, and therefore the university finds itself at a loss to explain why he would choose to oppose measures whose aim is to ensure that people respect the right to dialogue in constructive ways while respecting the rights of others to do the same," Rector Frederick Lowy said at a press conference.

The moratorium was imposed and upheld by the board of governors, Concordia's highest decision-making body chaired by Lillian Vineberg, despite requests from Lowy and the senate to have it lifted, at least gradually.

Lowy said the university resorted to legal means only after the CSU and the MPs refused repeated requests, including a lawyer's letter, to cancel the event.

CSU president Sabine Friesinger said the CSU would return to court in 10 days to try to have the decision quashed.

The CSU publicized the event as a deliberate act to "break" the moratorium.

All three speakers are outspoken supporters of the Palestinian cause. It is questionable whether the CSU actually believed the discussion would go ahead. The hall they said it was to be held in – the same one where Benjamin Netanyahu was to have spoken Sept. 9 – was, in fact, scheduled for a class at that time.

The CSU now has the support of the Canadian Association of University Teachers (CAUT). Its vice-president, Bishop's University professor Loretta Czernis, who joined the barred speakers, said the 32,000-member CAUT finds the moratorium "disgusting" and the injunction "outrageous."

Robinson, speaking to several hundred people on the street, charged that Concordia is afraid of losing "corporate money." He chided CanWest Global head Israel Asper for "bullying," citing his Oct. 30 speech in Montreal urging donors to withhold financial support from universities that "fail in their obligation of educational integrity."

Davies, the NDP post-secondary education spokesperson, said the "censorship" at Concordia is a result of the administration's pandering to "the corporate interests" represented on the board.

Rebick, a Ryerson University professor, said she is one of the "hundreds of thousands of Jews around the world" who oppose the occupation and and believe Ariel Sharon is a "catastrophe" for Israel. She denounced B'nai Brith Canada (BBC) executive vice-president Frank Dimant for accusing Robinson of "anti-Jewish hatred."

Before the outside rally, Hillel members and others from the Jewish community staged an unauthorized demonstration in the lobby, waving Israeli and Canadian flags.

Hillel condemned Robinson for "remaining silent while Jews and others were physically and verbally attacked and their rights to freedom of assembly and of speech were violently removed from them and, most importantly, for associating himself with those who condone such activity."

The Hillel demonstrators were rallied by Rabbi Reuben Poupko who blasted the CSU as a "rogue organization" and Robinson for his "extreme anti-Israel views.

"If anybody should be denied free speech, it is those who denied others that right on Sept. 9," he said.

Diversity delivers excellence in Jewish education

by Suzanne Wintrob

In a Jewish community as diverse as Toronto, it's not surprising there are so many Jewish educational choices. There are schools for the Orthodox, Conservative and Reform communities. There are schools with traditional curriculums and those focused on the arts. There are schools for children with learning disabilities and for those with special needs. There's a Jewish Montessori school and a certificate-granting school for adults only.

That's over 70 schools in all, catering to more than 17,000 day school and supplementary school students. Yet while they're certainly diverse, they have one important thing in common: preserving, enriching and promoting Jewish education.

"Toronto has possibly the finest Jewish educational system I've ever seen," said Simon Goulden, chief executive of the Agency for Jewish Education in London, England, on a recent tour of Toronto's Jewish schools. "Not only do you have a community dedicated to the education of its young but you also have a cultural mosaic, not a melting pot. You understand the diversity of cultures and ideas and are accepting and tolerant. Your schools all have the same mission - education as the future of the community - even though you may have different paths to get there. That's very special. It's a model for the rest of the Jewish world."

Associated Hebrew Schools (AHS), with 2,100 Nursery-Grade 8 students on three campuses, and the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, with 1,430 high school students on two campuses, are perhaps the best examples of Toronto schools that unite students from different backgrounds. AHS Educational Director Rabbi Abraham Soffer says the school strives to give students the best Jewish and Torah education possible so they can make informed decisions about how to live their lives as Jews.

"Being Jewish doesn't mean I was born Jewish," he says. "It means I know why I'm Jewish and what it's all about. If you're a Jew and you go to public school and then reach the age of 18 and realize you've learned very little or nothing about Judaism, how can you make choices as to what kind of Jew you want to be?"

The Downtown Jewish Day School caters to Toronto's growing Jewish community in the city centre. Principal Elysa Cohen says that, for many families, the arts-based school, with 70 students in Senior Kindergarten to Grade 4, is often their first or only experience with Judaism.

"In everything we do we recognize, understand and celebrate diversity in the ways we think and practice," she says.

The Toronto Heschel School, which uses the arts to teach everything from Chumash to science, takes a pluralistic approach. Says principal Gail Baker: "There are many expressions of Judaism so we don't promote one particular viewpoint. This is our chance to say Judaism can be a unifying force, not a divisive one."

At the Florence Melton Adult Mini-School, 65 adult learners gather once a week for two years to learn about Jewish history, lifecycles, concepts and ethics. They graduate with a certificate in Jewish studies from the Hebrew University in Jerusalem. Says student Alan Sandler, 62: "Other courses just cover a portion of a topic or take a particular point of view. But many of us came out of cheders because Jewish day schools didn't exist back then. I was never able to fit everything together. At Melton there's a continuum."

There's much to learn from Chanukah

By:
Marshall Kesten,
Chair,
UJA Federation
Board of Jewish Education

Dr. Seymour Epstein (Epi)
Vice-President for Jewish Education
UJA Federation of Greater Toronto

While it is obvious there are messages in Chanuka for all of us, there are some special aspects of the holiday that speak to our Jewish educational concerns.

The first is the name itself. Chanuka comes from the Hebrew word for dedication, which is also used in Hebrew for education. We have separate words in Hebrew for instruction, limmud or hora'ah, but education is chinuch. And by education we mean the comprehensive transmission of both facts and values that lead to dedication. Instruction merely informs, while chinuch forms whole Jews.

Another aspect of this holiday is the eight-branched Chanukiyah with its shamash. As we all learned, each added flame complements the holiness of the light produced by the Chanukiyah. Each day of the miracle is equally important and necessary to the total victory of spirit over matter - this holiday's key feature.

We at the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education feel that way about each and every school in our community. Day schools and supplementary schools of every persuasion constitute a holy community, united by its desire to educate our young to become dedicated Jews. We think of our role as the Shamash that helps the schools to light their fires of knowledge and passion in the hearts and minds of our youth. May Chanukah reflect the light of our past into our lives and those of future generations.

School system nurtures best beginnings

The right preschool education can set a child on the right path for a lifetime of success."The first five years of life are paramount in terms of helping children develop a sense of self-esteem and a love of learning," says Lorraine Sandler, a steering committee board member for the new Jewish Early Childhood Initiative at the Coalition for Advancement in Jewish Education (CAJE).

"We want to empower children. We want them to be well balanced, well adjusted, happy, problem-solving and useful members of the community."

That's precisely why Toronto's Jewish preschools are doing everything they can to ensure every child gets the best beginning possible. BJE's Early Years Principals Council meets once a month to identify best programs and practices for early childhood education. Says Anne Glickman, the BJE's Director of Early Childhood and Family Education: "As diverse as the community is, we do have the same concerns. The council ensures we get best practices and research out to all of our schools."

At Netivot HaTorah Day School, preschool students are learning entirely in Hebrew. Everything from math and science to Show and Tell is conducted in Hebrew, with "quite a bit of body language going on" to help children understand concepts and vocabulary, says Preschool Coordinator Eilen Goldstein. Given the school's strong commitment to Israel, the intention is to give children the skills they need to make Hebrew a living language, she adds. Holy Blossom Temple Preschool incorporates what principal Pam Hamovitch calls an "emergent curriculum" which takes the lead from both the teachers' and the children's interests. The story of Noah and the Ark, for example, was supposed to be the Torah Story of the week but one class was so enthralled, they spent weeks on the topic. They decorated the classroom with boats and animals, baked rainbow cookies, and talked about pairs, animals, things that float, and the meaning of promises.

"The children enacted the story over and over again in so many different ways," says Hamovitch. 'So much learning went on, it didn't matter what the teacher had originally planned."

Campaign funds provide access to Jewish education

Brian Cohen* was just nine when his father passed away. Naturally, it was a tough time for Brian and his two sisters, but perhaps even more so for their young mother Sandra who was thrust into the role of sole supporter for three school-aged children attending Jewish day school. Despite her own grief, Sandra knew she had to focus on her children's happiness and well being during those first few months. Stability was critical, she realized, and, among other things, that meant keeping her children in the school they loved so much and where they were learning how to live a proper Jewish life.

So Sandra did what any other parent would do: she asked for help, turning to the school's tuition committee for financial assistance. The subsidies helped Sandra put all three children through Jewish day school and high school. Her children are thankful for it.

"Having a day school education prepared me well for higher education and for my future, and many of my friends back then are still my good friends today," says Brian, a newlywed who hopes to send his own children to Jewish school one day. "Unfortunately, the cost of Jewish education is such that many families in difficult circumstances think they can't afford to send their children to Jewish schools. Financial assistance gives everyone the same chance at a proper Jewish education, just like my sisters and I had."

Brian's family was assisted by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, which, through its annual campaign, provides nearly $7 million a year in tuition subsidies for students in affiliated Jewish day schools whose families can't afford to pay full fee. This year's subsidies are being distributed to more than 2,500 assisted students (1,800 families). Additionally, several hundred thousand dollars are provided to affiliated supplementary schools in services and grants.

"The actual total cost of financial assistance is $10 million," says Bernard Shoub, Director of Finance at the Board of Jewish Education. "With the community's continued financial support, we are working to ensure that every Jewish child who wants a Jewish education will have access to it."

Names have been changed to ensure privacy*

Schools aglow for Chanukah

There was Chanukah magic in the air at the recent Jewish Book Fair when students of the Dr. Abraham Shore She'arim Hebrew Day School - Sara and Sam Hennick Education Centre performed their 10th annual Chanukah play for the community. This year's production, The Magic Pan, involved all 90 students in acting, singing, dancing, set design, or helping backstage.

"The experience gives our students a sense of responsibility," says principal Kathy Manoim. "It brings out their wonderful talents and really elevates their self-esteem."

Other schools are also basking in the Chanukah glow. The Toronto Heschel School will spend Chanukah examining issues relating to The Challenge of Identity using an integrated arts teaching model. Through movement, song and drama, students will present the Jewish response to Hellenism, demonstrate the role of Jewish women who used their Jewish identity as a source of courage, investigate the dilemma of how public a Jew should be, examine the plight of Marrano Jews, and discuss issues related to anti-Semitism. Leo Baeck Day School will hold a special Kabbalat Shabbat for families and teachers led by grade six students, weaving together songs, poetry and stories, while the United Synagogue Day School's Rosh Chodesh Buddying Program will focus on Chanukah by grouping younger and older grades together for arts and crafts projects related to the holiday. Toronto Jewish Academy (Ohr Menachem) will hold its first family Chanukah event with music, bingo, games and treats.

At Bet Sefer Solel, students will lead a Shabbat service featuring Chanukah songs from around the world. Meanwhile, United Congregational Schools' Round Robin event lets families enjoy a host of activities including learning songs, making latkes, playing Simon Says with Chanukah-related Hebrew words, and making crafts. The program, held several weeks before Chanukah, gives families unique ideas to use at their own celebrations.

Chabad Lubavitch of Markham will host its annual Chanukah on Ice program, November 30th at Thornhill Community Centre - skating fun for the whole family. The evening will include a visit from Yehuda HaMacabee on ice, a Menorah lighting ceremony, a Chanukah Carnival and, of course, refreshments.

New initiative embraces innovation

Who says history can't have popular appeal? Just wait until the Canadian Jewish History textbook goes to press. The project, funded by the Max and Beatrice Wolfe Family Foundation will give students in grades seven and eight a personal look at their heritage by exploring events that happened in their own cities. Topics will include the first Jew in Canada, the Jewish response to the rebellions of Upper Canada, the opening of Western Canada to immigration, and much more.

"We're graduating thousands of kids from Jewish schools but they don't know anything about local Jewish history," says co-author Meir Balofsky. "Their interest skyrockets when they learn about their own community. It makes history come alive."

ETGAR (Hebrew for "challenge"), a UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education initiative, supported by the Gross and Goodman Family Fund, gives day and supplementary school teachers the opportunity to create innovative Jewish educational programs, curricula and materials. Other ETGAR projects in various stages of development include Sephardic Jewish Heritage, Hebrew Language and Jewish Music and Firsts for Jewish Women.

"These are the kinds of projects where people would otherwise be sitting around saying, 'It's a really good idea but nothing much will come of it,'" says Balofsky. "ETGAR offers financial backing and motivation to bring what would otherwise be pipe dreams to fruition." Debbie Cohen agrees. She and friend Felicia Brooker are working feverishly on the Firsts for Jewish Women project, for grades four to six, which uses the Jewish calendar to explore the historical roles of several Jewish women.

"It's one thing to have an idea but another thing to have the opportunity to plan it," says Cohen. "ETGAR motivated us to go forward with our idea and make it easy for teachers to incorporate into the curriculum." Israelis invest billions in Canadian real estate that partners with Israeli firms in the acquisition of property. Feiler, a chartered accountant and consultant, runs the Israeli desk at BDO Dunwoody, a global accounting and consulting firm.

Both are Israelis who have made Toronto their home, the better to advise clients or to participate in the flow of capital investments to Canada.

And flow it has, into residential, commercial and office buildings, scooping up some familiar landmarks in Toronto and Montreal along the way. Israeli companies, both public and privately held, now control more than 100 shopping malls in Toronto and Montreal, Blutrich said.

Among them you'll find Eglinton Square in Scarborough, York Gate and Bridlewood. Israeli-owned office towers in Toronto include 5001 Yonge St. near Sheppard Avenue, whose major tenant is the Royal Bank. It was purchased recently by Israeli conglomerate Delek for $70 million. Malibu Israel, a development and construction company, is developing a high-rise condominium at 18 Yonge St., and is a partner with H&R Developments in the 1,500-unit Water Park City on Toronto's waterfront.

In Montreal, Amot Investments and Qeubec conglomerate Desjardins are partners in a multi-phase e-commerce office project in downtown Montreal. The first phase alone costs $100 million, Feiler said.

Delek recently purchased the $202-million Bell Tower office building in Montreal while Westmount Square, a suite of luxury apartments, offices and shops was acquired by a privately held company for about $80 million. Two office towers, Place Montreal Trust and Place du Parc, were purchased by the Dorban Group and its American partners for $40 million, he said.

While three times as many private companies invest in Canada as public ones, the list of publicly traded Israeli purchasers is extensive: Dorban, Amot Investment, Engel General Developers, Electra (Israel), Liberty, Delek, Isralom Properties, Malibu, Gazit and Shacham Construction and Israel Land Development Corporation. The latter is one of Israel's oldest property development firms, dating back to the earliest days of the Zionist enterprise in Israel. It is, along with Blutrich's privately held company, part owner of Skyline International.

To date, the smallest investment by Israelis in Canada stands at a modest $40 million, but the cumulative effect of all the investments is impressive. Blutrich and Feiler believe the inflow of capital from Israel has probably pushed real estate prices up by 20 per cent.

What's more, that trend shows no sign of levelling off. In fact, said Blutrich, it's likely to accelerate. For Israelis, who are now able to invest throughout the world, Canada is particularly attractive, drawing as much as one-third of the real estate capital Israelis invest abroad.

Though a recent report by Moody's Investor Services concluded that caution was warranted in the Toronto and Montreal markets, with supply currently outstripping demand for office space, for Israeli investors, the Canadian market still has plenty of appeal.

The reasons are many, Blutrich explained. For one, Canada is known for its political stability. For another, "the Canadian market is, we believe, undervalued compared to other western markets" like the United States and Europe, selling "under replacement value," he said.

Couple that with the relative ease of doing business in Canada compared to Israel and eastern Europe, low interest rates, the low Canadian dollar and continued, steady growth of the Canadian economy with its projected surpluses, and Canada offers tremendous opportunities for Israelis, he said.

Feiler, who headed BDO's international tax department in Israel before moving to Toronto, said Canadian investments also offer Israelis a good return. Investors can expect a return on equity of about 15 per cent in Toronto and a slightly higher one in Montreal, and a return on capital, which includes equity and loans, of 10 to 11 per cent in Toronto and 10 to 12 per cent in Montreal.

Blutrich said in its four years in Canada, Skyline has invested more than $130 million in nine different projects in downtown Toronto. The company has carved out a unique place for itself, offering fully furnished suites to short-term tenants. "Today we're the second largest in the city and in mid-2003, we will become the leader in this niche in Toronto," he predicted. "We feel the market still has lots of room to grow, and in our budget for the next year, we plan to invest $320 million."

Israeli investors are not fly-by-nighters, looking to flip properties and make a quick buck, he continued. On the contrary, "all the Israeli investors I know have a long-term view."

As Blutrich explains it, once the currency doors were flung open in 1998, Israelis began searching for lucrative investments abroad, "to diversify their portfolios, exercise their unused resources and put capital to use."

The early 1990s had been a lucrative period for real estate developers and construction companies in Israel, Blutrich said. Following the construction boom that followed the influx of one million Russian immigrants, they had plenty of surplus capital to invest.

For risk-taking Israelis, whose perspective is global, Canada looked very inviting, Feiler said.

Even in Canada, Israelis are starting to look farther afield, she added. They're beginning to show interest in other urban centres such as Ottawa, Saskatchewan, Vancouver, Calgary and Prince Edward Island.

Wife sheds 47 pounds and says:

"My husband can't keep his eyes off me!"

My name is Amy Ransom. I live with my husband and daughter. When my husband returned from six months at sea I was 47 pounds lighter. Now he can't keep his hands off me! This is my story. It's true and factual.

Amy Ransom before hypnosis

I lost 47 pounds with hypnosis. Six pounds the first week. Fifteen pounds the first month. My dress size plunged from an embarrassing 16 to an elegant size 10. I'm actually 7 pounds less than my original goal. It was that easy. I feel great.

Overweight hurts. I tried everything. Shakes, prepackaged foods, support groups and stupid diets. With every diet I only lost more self-control.

Food was my life. I lived on fast food. I made excuses for buying junk food. I once baked chocolate chip cookies to send to my husband. Only half the batch made it. The rest went to my bulging hips and thighs.

I used to avoid outings to the beach. I resented the other wives in their skimpy bikinis. I wouldn't even take off my shorts. I hid from cameras.

That all changed when I enrolled in Positive Changes Hypnosis. My weight loss was fast, easy and effortless. No hassle. No fuss. I noticed changes after my very first session. My confidence skyrocketed. I did it without stress. No cravings, NO DIETS, NO DRUGS. I didn't starve myself, count calories, attend group meetings or weigh food. I learned self-hypnosis. I enjoy 100% control over my eating behaviour.

Amy Ransom after Hypnosis

I urge you to call Positive Changes Hypnosis and schedule a free weight loss consultation. It's fun, informative and only takes 30 minutes. Don't suffer one more minute. I know Positive Changes Hypnosis can help you. Their fees are reasonable and their guarantee is the best in the business.

CMDA says it has deal on tax dispute

Caplan's office, however, denied that the minister intervened. Spokesperson Derik Hodgson told The CJN's Ron Csillag that "the minister would never intervene. There's been no special treatment here. That's not the way it works. The minister is aware and there have been representations made to her, but [there have been] no interventions."

What is certain is that the revocation notice was never published in Parliament's Canada Gazette. On the same day Bitton announced the agreement with the charities directorate – Nov. 12 – CMDA filed for leave to appeal the Federal Court of Appeal's ruling to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Bitton said that request would be withdrawn once the agreement has been received in writing.

The agreement followed a meeting between Bitton, CMDA immediate past-president Arnold Rosner and the organizations' accountant Donald Hersh and officials from the charities directorate, including director-general Maureen Kidd.

CCRA would not confirm or deny that an agreement exists, verbal or written, or even that a meeting took place.

"That would be violating confidentiality," CCRA spokesperson Colette Gentis-Hawn said. She said the revocation notice was not published because the matter is before the courts and thus not enforceable.

Bitton said CMDA representatives and charities directorate representatives discussed ways CMDA can ensure the ambulances and other equipment it donates to Israel's Magen David Adom (MDA) are used for medical purposes only. To comply with the Income Tax Act, CMDA must retain ownership of the ambulances it sends to Israel, something it did not previously do.

Bitton said CMDA presented documents supporting its contention that MDA, even when working beyond Israel's pre-1967 borders, is a strictly humanitarian emergency service working on a non-sectarian basis.

He said CMDA will "definitely keep more control" over the ambulances it donates.

"We are going to ask the chairman of the executive committee of MDA in Israel for a list of our ambulances and their location at any time," he said. "We will also have Canadian agents in Israel to check how things are being done. Before MDA disposes of old ambulances, it will consult us on what to do with them."

He said CMDA will work closely with the tax officials from now on. "The rules are so complex; it's difficult not to make an error."

CMDA lost its case in the Federal Court of Appeal in September. By a majority of 2 to 1, the court upheld CCRA's intention to revoke CMDA's registration as a charitable organization based on the absence of evidence that CMDA maintained control over the use of ambulance and other equipment it provided to MDA.

The CCRA mentioned that an old ambulance was given by MDA to the Israel Defence Forces (IDF) on June 14, 1999. The issuing of bullet-proof vests to MDA personnel was also raised as evidence that MDA was working in cooperation with the IDF.

CMDA says the vests were strictly for safety, not an indication MDA workers are engaged in any type of defence capacity, Bitton said.

The court, however, did not agree with CCRA that MDA's work in the West Bank, Gaza and East Jerusalem contravened Canadian "public policy." It ruled that using CMDA-donated ambulances in these disputed territories does not violate any Canadian public policy, because such a policy does not exist.

All three judges agreed "there is no Canadian public policy expressed in an Act of Parliament or in any publicly available government document that a Canadian charitable organization cannot operate in the Occupied Territories."

The ruling is significant for all Jewish charities in Canada that raise money for Israel, who for many years have been led by the tax department to believe that such a policy did exist.

CMDA's lawyer, prominent tax specialist Arthur Drache of Ottawa, said he was not directly involved with the latest talks with the charities directorate, but said he understands the deal is a kind of contingency plan. "It would kick in if the Supreme Court chooses not to hear the case or, if it is heard, rules against CMDA."

He said the Supreme Court has 30 days to respond to CMDA's request to appeal.

Drache thinks it is important that this case be taken to the highest court because bureaucrats "have got the law all wrong; there are big principles that must be established," that affect Jewish and non-Jewish charities.

Shuls on 'hit list' respond

Publication of the list came only days after an audio tape purported to be recorded by bin Laden threatened death to Canada and five other Western allies of the United States.

The list, which the Post said was part of a report on State Department letterhead compiled by U.S. intelligence in September, includes two synagogues in Toronto, the Beth Sholom and Temple Sinai, as well as one in Montreal, Temple Emanuel, and one in Winnipeg, Beth Israel HSBA.

"It is disturbing, but not surprising, that synagogues are mentioned," said Keith Landy, national president of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC).

How these four places of worship were selected out of the hundreds in Canada is unclear, said Len Rudner, director of community relations for CJC's Ontario region. What's even odder, he said, is that the Winnipeg synagogue no longer exists as an independent entity but was part of a three-synagogue merger that took place earlier this year.

Publication of the list prompted calls by Congress to local and national law enforcement officials. "Congress has spoken to the various intelligence sources in law enforcement agencies and asked if there are any developments that would warrant including these four synagogues on a list, and what I'm hearing is 'no,'" Rudner said. "We should take comfort in that."

The community remains on a high state of alert, which was first implemented when the second Palestinian intifadah erupted more than two years ago. Rudner refused to describe some of the procedures in place to enhance security.

Manuel Prutschi, Congress' national director of community relations, said he has been in contact with his colleagues in Montreal and Winnipeg and "everyone is puzzled as to what led to this [list]... There may be specific reasons that led them to mention the synagogues, but they're not totally accurate. So I'd keep that in mind," he said.

"We should certainly be cognizant of the list and be on the level of alert that we are, but we should not be especially alarmed by it."

In Winnipeg, community spokesperson Ian Goldstine called the Post report "disturbing."

"We in the Jewish community are at a heightened state of awareness."

In the wake of the terrorist attacks in Bali and Moscow, the world has learned that "terrorism is easily exportable," he said.

As to the inclusion of the Beth Israel Synagogue, Goldstine said "I don't know why the name is there." Beth Israel is now part of a new synagogue, Eitz Chaim and the building formerly inhabited by the synagogue is currently home to a day-care centre, he said.

Goldstine, who is president of the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg/Combined Jewish Appeal, said he has consulted with local police and RCMP officials.

The community continues to remain at "a heightened state of alert," pursuant to a protocol that was implemented following the Sept. 11 attacks in the United States, he said.

In Montreal, meanwhile, Rabbi Leigh Lerner of Temple Emanuel said "this congregation has led Montreal Jewry in trying to create amity and understanding among all peoples. Being on Osama bin Laden's list is a confirmation of the fact that we are directly opposed to what he is trying to do. We are proud of our record. We call on synagogues, mosques and churches to condemn terror and stand with us in friendship."

Barbara Berke, associate executive director of Toronto's Beth Sholom, said "we're taking [the list] seriously. We're taking measures to protect the synagogue and our members." Berke declined to elaborate on those measures.

In the last two years, several Canadian synagogues or memorial chapels have been hit by arson, including buildings in Toronto, Quebec City, Montreal, two in Edmonton, Saskatoon and Ottawa.

Yousef Sandouga, a Palestinian who acted alone in one of the Edmonton attacks, is currently serving a 2½ year sentence for arson. No arrests have been made in any of the other attacks. And last June, police in Ottawa warned the Jewish community they had information of a possible attack on a synagogue, but no attack happened at that time.

Cookbook traces the history of Jewish life in the Maghreb

By JUDY BART KANCIGOR
Special to The CJN

Celebrated cookbook author and chef Joyce Goldstein can trace her bloodline to a Russian shtetl, but her heart and soul lie in the Mediterranean.

In Cucina Ebraica and Sephardic Flavors she explored Italian – and Spanish – Jewish cuisine, and now, to round out the trilogy, in Saffron Shores she continues her Mediterranean culinary journey with the exotic cuisine of the Maghreb: Morocco, Algeria, Tunisia and Libya, even including related Judeo-Arabic countries like Syria, Lebanon, Iraq and Iran.

"I have been cooking this food for I cannot tell you how many years," says the former chef/owner of the renowned Mediterranean restaurant Square One in San Francisco.

"When I was doing research for Sephardic Flavors, I realized the subject was so huge I couldn't do it all in one book, so I covered the northern Mediterranean in Sephardic Flavors and the southern Mediterranean in Saffron Shores. Here the style of cooking changes, with a lot more spices and herbs and additional uses of fruit, but of course there is some overlap."

Notable for its absence is Israeli cuisine.

"I left it out because it's a hodgepodge," she explains. "The last time I was in Israel, I was served sashimi and Thai-flavoured something or other, and I thought, sorry, I didn't come here for that. Israeli cuisine is a melting pot, a lot like America. Whoever is there is cooking Romanian food, Italian food, Yemenite food. Is there Israeli cuisine? I think it's fusion, so I didn't give it much attention. It's not pure. I'd rather go back to the sources."

Indeed, each recipe reflects Goldstein's impeccable research and attention to detail, and regional differences are carefully noted. For example, for the cumin flavoured meatballs, Goldstein offers Moroccan and Syrian variations. But she never sacrifices flavour for authenticity, adding a touch of orange to the Sfenj (Moroccan Chanukah donuts), for example, and adjusting the spices in various dishes.

"The spices of North Africa are really vibrant, just incredible, much fresher and more intense than those we can buy here," she observes. "To make these recipes taste right, I often had to double them."

More than just a recipe collection, Saffron Shores traces the history of Jewish life in these exotic lands and its impact on the cuisine. Unlike the Ashkenazim, who preserved their Judaism by isolating themselves, we learn, the Sephardim were more involved in the communities in which they lived.

"They shared recipes and culinary traditions with their non-Jewish neighbours," she writes. "Their food reflected the cuisine of their homeland but adapted to follow the kosher laws."

Because the Sephardim were more active in the community, in trades, in business, there was a greater exchange of ideas between Jews and Muslims, and the similarity in recipes between Jews and their non-Jewish neighbours is striking, she notes.

A recipe for the latke-challenged

By RIVKA TAL

Chanukah without the crispy fried potato pancakes known as latkes would be like Purim without hamantaschen – unthinkable!

Fried foods commemorate the Chanukah miracle of the oil that lasted eight days, and the Hasmoneans' victory over the Greeks.

Confession time? I am latke-challenged. Try as I may, year after year, my traditional recipe for homemade from scratch grate-the-potatoes latkes has always been a dismal failure. They come out either burnt on the outside or raw on the inside or both. They fall apart, too, and are invariably greasy!

It must be genetic – my mother has always been daunted by the prospect of things frying in hot oil. I salute those talented individuals who successfully make their own latkes from scratch, while I truly understand those who buy the frozen, ready-made kind.

But for those of you who, like me, are latke-challenged, yet long for that indescribable Chanukah fragrance of fresh, homemade latkes, here is an alternative. Sort of halfway between store-bought and homemade. Don't tell, and no one will know your secret.

NO-FAIL LATKES

2 cups boiling water
3 cups instant potato flakes
3 tbsp. instant fried onions
1/2 tsp. salt
1 egg, beaten
oil for frying

Stir boiling water into potato flakes. Stir in onions, salt and beaten egg, mix until thoroughly combined.

Cover mixture and place in refrigerator for 15 minutes or more.

Heat about 1/4 inch of oil in a large, heavy frying pan. Using your hands, form somewhat flattish patties about 2 1/2 inches in diameter. Gently place in frying pan with a spatula, making sure not to crowd them. Fry over medium-high heat until golden brown on both sides. Drain both sides well on a few thicknesses of paper towels.

Makes about 1 1/2 dozen latkes. Serve warm with applesauce or sour cream or both.

Cookbook traces the history of Jewish life in the Maghreb

"On the other hand, certain [eastern European] dishes… you know they are Jewish. I have many Russian cookbooks, but I don't see too many recipes in there for brisket or tsimmes. There's not as much overlap between the Jewish and non-Jewish dishes. Some of the ingredients are the same, like cabbage and potatoes, but the recipes don't track the same way that the Sephardic ones do."

A tireless researcher, Goldstein combed cookbooks from the area, written in French, to capture the authentic tastes and aromatic flavors of such dishes as Iraqi Chicken and Chickpea Pastries, Lamb Tagine with Prunes and Honey and Moroccan Chicken and Almond Pie. The latter, known as B'Stilla, Goldstein calls "a masterpiece of Moroccan cuisine."

And while most of the recipes are easy to prepare, favouring the use of fresh, local ingredients over labour intensive method, the savoury pastries that Goldstein calls "labours of love" are worth the extra effort, she says. Teams of women would prepare them together for special occasions, a tradition that is sadly dying out.

Goldstein suggests families create their own traditions by preparing these bistels, briks or buraks together. "Anything that is fried is appropriate for Chanukah. The Tunisian briks are rounder in shape and contain egg, as compared to the bistels from Morocco and buraks from Algeria," she explains, "but they all can be fried."

For those who can't think of Chanukah without potatoes, we've selected potato filled briks from Tunisia, but Goldstein offers a variety of fillings for these pastries from beef or lamb to feta cheese to chicken with chickpea to spinach with pine nuts. Depending on the region, the dough may be filo, yeast raised, short crust or semolina, and the pastries may be baked as well as fried.

These spice infused pastries make an alluring addition to any Chanukah table. And for Ashkenazi Jews, what an exotic change from latkes.

Egg-filled briks must be eaten very carefully if you don't want to drip egg yolk on your shirt.

2 large potatoes, cubed
1 onion, finely chopped
3 cloves garlic, minced
2 tbsp. olive oil
1 tsp. salt
½ tsp. freshly ground black pepper
¼ cup chopped fresh flat-leaf parsley
2 tbsp. chopped fresh coriander (cilantro)
1 beaten egg (optional)
2 tbsp. capers, rinsed and chopped (optional)
8 sheets square egg roll wrappers or filo dough
8 small eggs
1 egg white, lightly beaten

Chanukah Foods

Bubbie's special dishes for the holiday

BY BEVERLY LEVITT
Special to The CJN

I can still see my granny, an apron protecting her good dress, her clunky laceups (the original Granny shoes) planted firmly on her linoleum floor, grating potatoes and onions, and crying.

"I'm not crying 'cause I'm sad," she'd sniff, waving the onion fumes from her face. "We're going to eat latkes. We're going to light the candles. And the presents – wait till you see what I got you!"

She was gleeful, giving us the best part of her, as we gathered in her kitchen on the first day of the joyous holiday of Chanukah.

My mother Celia, my Aunt Dorothy, and cousins of all ages, would crowd into Granny's cozy kitchen to watch the Chanukah ritual and listen to her annual instruction.

Granny, being the matriarch of our family, was a self-appointed teacher and doled out her common sense, Yiddish philosophy about latkes – and about life.

She would set each of us up with our own clunky graters, give us a potato, and in her trademark Latvian-Lithuanian-untouched-by-the-king's-English accent, ask, "So, vel, isn't it the same thing?"

To Granny, love and latkes were synonymous. Mama Celia has inherited Granny's role; she's even got the speech down pat.

"I use a combination of russets and new potatoes. Never just russets – too rough! It's like the brawn without the brains. Like comparing a dancer to a doctor. So, after they're grated, we drain off the liquid – don't want potato starch going straight to our hips."

Then Granny would pour peanut oil into a heated, cast iron pan.

"We'll wait until the oil gets blazing hot, that way the oil won't penetrate our latkes. Grease on Chanukah – your whole year is clogged!" Granny would roar at that line.

"But the most important thing, 'Make your latkes with love,' even if you don't love everyone who's gonna eat 'em". Uncontrollable giggling.

Granny Fanny's tips for the perfect latke: Hand grate the potatoes, celery and onions on a coarse grater. (You really can taste the difference.) Otherwise, use the grating attachment on the food processor. Grate the onion next to a running cold water faucet. It helps reduce the tears.

Shape the latkes with a rounded tablespoon or wooden spoon. Be sure to flatten them with your hands before putting them into the pan. Big fat latkes may look appealing, but chances are when they're golden brown on the outside, they won't be cooked enough inside. A Granny conundrum: although it's important to shape the latkes with your hands, don't handle them any more than necessary. The less they're handled, the lighter they'll be.

Use peanut or vegetable oil. Sorry folks, no olive oil – it doesn't heat hot enough. Make sure your oil is blazing hot. It really does help keep the oil outside the latke.

Make the latkes as close to serving time as possible. Keep the first batches warm in a low oven (200 degrees) while cooking the remaining batter.

Remove the latkes carefully from the frying pan, so they don't fall apart, then put them on layers of paper towels to drain. If necessary, pat the excess oil off the top.

Always taste the first few of the batch, then adjust the seasonings. Latkes tend to be bland, but salt, pepper, paprika, cayenne and various herbs will spice them up.

Since we are all concerned about our health, most of us don't do much frying anymore. On Chanukah, we eat fried foods to commemorate the miracle of the Temple oil. My mother is very health conscious but she taught me that moderation is key in all things. So Chanukah is one of the few times of the year I give myself the present of a juicy, delicious latke.

Another traditional item is sour cream; it is delicious on potatoes in general, and especially on latkes. On Chanukah, I eat sour cream on my latkes, but you can substitute yogurt or a combination of yogurt and sour cream, or even low-fat sour cream. Or simply use the traditional applesauce, or my favourite, caramelized apples.

Place potato mixture in large colander; rinse them with cold water and drain to remove excess starch and moisture. Sprinkle with lemon juice to prevent discoloration. Transfer mixture to clean bowl. Stir in remaining ingredients. Heat oil in a skillet over high heat. Using a mounded tablespoon, shape latkes into 4-inch circles, pat them thin, and drop into the hot oil. Flatten the latkes with the back of the spoon. Cook for 4 minutes on each side, or until golden brown. Drain on paper towels and serve immediately, or put into moderate oven, (250) until ready to serve.

SWEET POTATO LATKES

5 sweet potatoes or yams, peeled and grated
1 russet potato, peeled, grated and squeezed through cheesecloth
1 onion, diced
1 red bell pepper, diced
½ cup chives, chopped
1 tbsp. parsley, chopped
3 eggs, beaten
salt and freshly ground pepper to taste
1 tbsp. lemon juice
3 tbsp. flour
peanut or vegetable oil as needed

Since sweet potatoes don't have the watery consistency of their paler cousins, you won't have to squeeze them through cheesecloth. But the rest of the directions are the same.

CAULIFLOWER OR BROCCOLI LATKES

1 head cauliflower or broccoli, par boiled, then mashed
2 new potatoes, grated fine
1 sweet onion, grated fine
2 garlic cloves, pressed
½ cup fresh Italian or curly parsley, chopped fine
½ cup chives, chopped fine
½ cup bread crumbs
1 well beaten egg
½-1 tsp. salt
pinch of cayenne pepper
½ tsp. dried thyme
1 cup peanut oil or vegetable oil

Combine cauliflower or broccoli, potato, onion, garlic, parsley, chives, breadcrumbs, egg, salt, cayenne pepper and thyme. Mix ingredients thoroughly; pile mixture into a rounded tablespoon. Flatten with your hands, form into 4-inch circles, and drop into very hot oil. Fry on one side until golden brown, then flip onto the other side. Serves 4-6.

WALNUT LATKES

1 cup chopped walnuts
2 cups mashed potatoes
2 eggs, well beaten
1 tsp. salt
⅛ tsp. pepper
⅛ tsp. cinnamon
peanut oil for frying
parsley for garnish

Combine all ingredients and mix well. Fry as above. Garnish with parsley.

APPLE-TATO LATKES

3 medium russet potatoes, coarsely grated
1 large green apple, coarsely grated
½ cup onion, coarsely grated
3 tbsp. flour
2 eggs, beaten
1 tbsp. lemon juice
salt and freshly ground pepper to taste
¼ tsp. cinnamon
¼ tsp. ground nutmeg

Prepare as above.

Chanukah Foods

Cookbook traces the history of Jewish life in the Maghreb

Boil potatoes until soft and mash them. Add onion and garlic that have been sauteed in olive oil until tender. Season with salt, pepper, parsley and cilantro. Stir in egg and capers, if using.

If using egg roll wrappers, place equal parts of filling on each one, spoon a depression into the filling, and break an egg into each depression. Brush the edges of the wrapper with egg white and fold over to make a ½-inch rim. If using filo, brush each sheet with oil, place the filling in the middle, then fold in half, leaving 1 inch on either side. Brush the edges with egg white. Fold in the left side, then the right, then fold up the bottom third to cover.

In a deep saucepan or a wok, heat 3 inches of oil to 365 degrees. Deep fry the briks in batches until crisp and golden, Using a slotted spoon or wire skimmer, transfer to paper towels to drain. Serve hot and eat carefully. Serves 8.

CUMIN-FLAVORED MEATBALLS WITH ONION JAM AND SPICY TOMATO SAUCE

1 lb. ground beef
2 to 3 tbsp. olive oil
3 cloves garlic, minced
2 tbsp. chopped fresh flat-leaf parsley
2 tbsp. chopped fresh coriander (cilantro)
1 tbsp. ground cumin
¼ tsp. cayenne pepper
1½ tsp. salt
½ tsp. freshly ground black pepper
confiture d'oignons (recipe below)
spicy tomato sauce (recipe below)

Light a fire in a charcoal grill. (You may also use a skillet heated over medium-high heat.)

In a medium bowl, combine all the ingredients except the jam and sauce. Mix well. Form into 16 oval meatballs wrapped around skewers, or into 8 oval patties. Grill or cook in oil on a hot pan until browned on all sides. Serve with onion jam and tomato sauce. Serves 4.

CONFITURE D'OIGNONS (ONION JAM)

3 tbsp. olive oil
3 lb. onions, cut into half-round slices or chopped
1 tbsp. ground cinnamon
¼ cup sugar or honey
1 tsp. salt

In a large sauté pan or skillet, heat the oil over medium heat. Add the onions and cook, stirring often until very soft and golden, about 15 minutes. Add the remaining ingredients, reduce heat to low, and cook and stir until the onions are dark brown, aromatic and the consistency of jam, 35 to 45 minutes. Serve warm. Keeps in the refrigerator for about 1 week. Makes 2½ to 3 cups.

SAUCE AUX TOMATES (SPICY TOMATO SAUCE)

¼ cup raisins, plumped in hot water to cover for 15 minutes, not drained
1½ cups tomato puree
1 to 2 cloves garlic
1 tbsp. olive oil
1 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
½ tsp. cayenne pepper
pinch of ground cinnamon

In a blender or food processor, combine all the ingredients and puree. Transfer to a small saucepan and simmer for 20 minutes until thickened. Serve warm or at room temperature. Store, covered in the refrigerator for up to 5 days. Makes about 1¼ cups.

MOROCCAN CHANUKAH DONUTS

2 envelopes active dry yeast
¼ cup sugar
½ cup warm water
4 cups all-purpose flour
½ tsp. salt
2 eggs, lightly beaten (optional)
grated zest of 1 orange
¼ cup canola oil, melted margarine or melted unsalted butter (optional)
1½ to 2 cups warm water or part water, part orange juice peanut or canola oil for deep-frying granulated sugar for sprinkling or warm honey for dipping

Dissolve the yeast and sugar in the water. Let sit until foamy, about 10 minutes. Pour into a large bowl and gradually stir in the flour and salt.

Stir in the eggs, zest, and ¼ cup oil, margarine, or butter, if using. Stir in just enough water or water and juice to make a soft and elastic dough.

Knead well, with a dough hook or by hand on a lightly floured surface, until dough is elastic, smooth and shiny. Roll the dough into a ball, place in an oiled bowl, and turn to coat.

Cover with a damp towel or plastic wrap and let rise in a warm place until doubled, 1½ to 2 hours.

Oil your hands. Divide the dough into 20 balls about 2 inches in diameter. In a deep saucepan or wok, heat 3 inches of oil to 365. Take a ball of dough, make a hole in the centre, and pull it out to make a donut shape. Deep-fry a few at a time until the donuts are puffed and golden. Using a slotted spoon or skimmer, transfer to paper towels to drain. While still hot, sprinkle with granulated sugar or dip into warm honey. Serve warm. Makes about 20 donuts.

Life's an adventure for octogenarian

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Octogenarian Rupert Shriar describes his life as "a table of hors d'oeuvre."

"I just have to try everything. Life is an adventure," says Shriar, who retired in 1988 after a 19-year tenure as director of social planning for Toronto Jewish Congress, the predecessor of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

About six months ago, he heard about Shaolin Kempo Karate, which is basically about self-defence and discipline. "So I just wanted to try something new," he says.

He attends Fred Valeri's School of Self Defence at Bathurst Street and Sheppard Avenue, where he is the oldest member of his karate class. He says the owner, Greg Tal, who served in the Israeli Defence Forces, "has taught me a lot.

"I'm not just the oldest in my class, but the oldest in the affiliated schools across Metro. Two other schools have invited me to attend their classes. I think they'd like to show me off to their younger students – to show how you can continue working out."

Rupert Shriar blocks a punch during a karate class.

Karate disciplines his body and mind, Shriar says. "You learn how to keep your emotions in check."

His 80 years have been filled with diverse activities in his professional life, his hobbies and his voluntary activities.

Shriar was born in Montreal, and his family moved to Lac St. Jean when he was an infant. His father was an itinerant pedlar and young Shriar attended a French Catholic School where French was his first language.

He moved to Montreal in 1937 and studied at McGill University, where he received a master's degree in social work. He later earned a PhD in sociology at St. Andrews University College in London, England. He served in the RCAF from 1942 to 1946.

He began his working career at Montreal's YMHA in 1946. After working in Newhaven, Winnipeg and Thunder Bay, he moved to Toronto.

Shriar has been associated with a number of Jewish organizations including Co-ordinated Services to the Elderly, the Jewish Information Service, the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living, the Tel-Aide/Jewish Distress Line and the United Jewish Appeal Women's Division (Jewish Women's Federation).

"I guess I just can't keep a job," he says jokingly, adding that so many things interest him that when an opportunity or challenge appears, he grasps it and moves on.

He has been described by his colleagues as the "professional's professional who passionately believes in the welfare of his community," says Alyse, his wife of 55 years.

"He stimulates people around him with his energy," she adds.

He is studying Spanish "only because it is a lovely language," she says, "and we love to go to Mexico, where we also take Spanish lessons."

Shriar stressed the importance of keeping active – particularly in the face of adversity. He says that during the war he thought he would die. More recently, he has had major back surgery and angina, "but that's not going to stop me."

The Shriars had two sons. Their elder son Kael, a homosexual, died of AIDS in 1995.

"My son taught us a great deal about life – the acceptance of differences," says Shriar. "He was active at Holy Blossom Temple, and was generous and non-judgmental – always ready to help. A wonderful son and we have wonderful memories."

He says his son's death taught them to live every moment of life "for it is precious. We want to do many things and live it all. I've tried TV, radio, worked as an electrician, wellness teacher, editor, consultant, name it."

He says he hopes new things will continue to come along to present him with opportunities for even more growth and strength "and the ability to cope with what comes my way."

When asked what he would like to be, he answers, "Six-foot-two, blue-eyed and have a big crop of hair. But I don't think I'll make it."

He says he believes his energy and drive come from being deprived during the Depression years.

"I had to fight for every buck – for everything. So I learned to appreciate things and I learned to live."

PM says quickness needed in Hebron for Jewish safety

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ariel Sharon said Sunday that a window of opportunity existed in the coming 48 hours to establish a "compact" zone of Jewish territorial contiguity between Kiryat Arba and the Jewish enclave in the heart of Hebron, including the Tomb of the Patriarchs.

Touring the scene of last Friday night's battle in which nine Israeli soldiers and three security officers from Kiryat Arba were killed in an Islamic Jihad ambush, Sharon told leaders of the defence establishment, including Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz and army chief of staff Moshe Ya'alon, that it should reassess his 1996 proposal for "territorial contiguity" encompassing Kiryat Arba and the Jewish enclave.

Sharon originally presented his plan during 1996 negotiations led by then-prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu for the Hebron redeployment. "When I proposed it then, they threw me down the stairs," he said at a Sunday Cabinet meeting. But now he believes that the army must create a situation that will ensure the safety of the Jews living in the divided city.

According to Sharon's proposal, the Jewish zone would extend from Kiryat Arba to Tel Rumeida and Beit Hadassah, and would include the ancient Karaite and Sephardi cemeteries. That would create contiguity between Kiryat Arba and the Tomb of the Patriarchs, through the eastern Casbah. Prayer arrangements under which Jews and Muslims share the Tomb would not be affected. The Jewish area would be surrounded by a wall.

Under the plan, the number of Palestinians under Israeli military control would decrease from 20,000, on the basis of the January 1997 Wye River Plantation accord, to 2,000. Those Palestinians remaining in the Jewish sector would be able to enter and leave through gates in the walls, but there would be no Arab commercial ventures inside the walled Jewish area.

In last Friday's attack, three Palestinian snipers opened fire and tossed grenades at security forces escorting Jewish worshippers from the Tomb of the Patriarchs in Hebron to nearby Kiryat Arba following Sabbath prayers.

Sharon pushed for his territorial contiguity plan, saying that for 'operational and political' reasons, Israel must move quickly

Islamic Jihad claimed responsibility for the attack, which came several weeks after Israeli soldiers pulled out of most Palestinian areas of the city.

Mofaz told the Cabinet on Sunday that the cell believed responsible for the ambush was Hebron-based and had returned to the city following the recent Israeli troops redeployment.

Twelve Israelis were killed and 14 others wounded in the attack before Israeli troops killed the three terrorists during a lengthy gun battle.

Of the Israeli dead, four were soldiers and five were border police. Three members of Kiryat Arba's security response team who rushed to the site when the shooting began were also killed.

The dead included the commander of Israeli forces in Hebron, a colonel, who is the highest-ranking officer to be killed since the Israeli-Palestinian conflict erupted more than two years ago.

Funerals were held Sunday for most of victims.

They were identified as the brigade commander in Hebron, Col. Dror Weinberg, 38, of Jerusalem; border police Chief Superintendent Samih Sweidan, 31, of Al-Aramshe; Sgt. Tomer Nov, 19, of Ashdod; Sgt. Gad Rahamim, 19, of Kiryat Malachi; Staff Sgt. Netanel Machluf, 19, of Hadera; Staff Sgt. Yeshayahu Davidov, 20, of Netanya; Sgt. Igor Drobitsky, 20, of Nahariya; Cpl. David Marcus, 20, of Ma'aleh Adumim; and Lt. Dan Cohen, 22, of Jerusalem.

Also killed were three civilian members of the Kiryat Arba emergency response team: Yitzhak Buanish, 46; Alexander Zwitman, 26; and Alexander Dohan, 33.

Following what has been called the "Sabbath Massacre," Israeli leaders approved an anti-terror operation in Hebron.

As part of the operation, the army imposed a curfew and renewed patrols in Palestinian parts of the city. The army has arrested at least 40 Palestinian terror suspects since Saturday, said Mofaz at Sunday's Cabinet meeting.

"The IDF is in full control of Hebron," Mofaz said, adding, "We also spoke to the American administration asking they pressure Syria, which is harbouring the Palestinian terror command centres."

The weekend operation was seen as a prelude to a broader campaign against the terrorist infrastructure in Hebron.

The operation – while in line with previous army responses to terrorist attacks – seemed to dash hopes for gradually transferring areas in the southern West Bank back to Palestinian control, an initiative championed by former defence minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer.

At Sunday's meeting, Sharon pushed for his territorial contiguity plan, saying that for "operational and political" reasons, Israel must move quickly. An opportunity has been created and facts have to be created in the coming 48 hours, he said.

In response to a proposal by Housing Minster Natan Sharansky to annul the Hebron agreement, Sharon said, "It's now clear that the Hebron agreement is null and void. In any case it is not being kept, and has no significance."

Sharansky called for thickening the settlement presence between Kiryat Arba and the Jewish Quarter in Hebron. He said his ministry is working on a detailed plan that would include expropriating properties from Palestinians, who would be fully compensated.

Meanwhile, Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat voiced alarm on Monday over Sharon's plan.

Speaking to reporters at his battered West Bank compound in Ramallah, Arafat said, "This is a big crime," and added that Israel was out to "Judaise" Hebron.

Obituary Abba Eban, the voice of Israel, dies at 87

By Ha'aretz Staff

JERUSALEM — Abba Eban, the Cambridge-educated Oriental languages scholar who for decades used his fluency in 10 languages, extraordinary wit and deep knowledge of diplomacy to represent Israel as the country's leading spokesperson, died Sunday at the Rabin Medical Center in Petach Tikva at the age of 87.

Never a politician, always a statesman, Eban was born Aubrey Eban in South Africa, but was taken to England as an infant. He was in the midst of an outstanding academic career in Oriental languages at Cambridge when World War II broke out and he enlisted. Rising to the rank of major, he served in Egypt and British Mandate Palestine, becoming the liaison officer to the Jewish Agency.

But at the end of the war, rather than returning to England to resume either his scholarly activities or run for parliament – both opportunities were offered to him – he chose to remain in British Mandate Palestine, joining the Jewish Agency and becoming a member of its delegation to the United Nations.

He rose to international prominence in 1948, leading the struggle for Israel's entry to the organization and became its first ambassador to the United Nations. From 1950 to 1959, he served simultaneously as ambassador to the UN and to Washington.

He returned to Israel in early 1959, winning a seat in the Knesset on the Mapai ticket and serving in the successive Labor Party cabinets of David Ben-Gurion, Levi Eshkol and Golda Meir, as education minister, deputy prime minister and eventually foreign minister, a post he held from 1966 to 1974.

In 1967, he played a critical role in the formulation of Security Council Resolution 242, and later, after the Yom Kippur War in 1973, he played an equally critical role in Security Council Resolution 338. Together, those two Security Council resolutions have been the cornerstone of all political peace agreements since, including the original Camp David Accords signed by Menachem Begin and Anwar Sadat and the Oslo accords.

Eban remained in the Knesset from 1974 to 1988, serving for many years as chairman of the Knesset Foreign Affairs and Defence Committee. But in 1988, realizing that his dovish views put him in the minority even in his own party, he left politics to devote himself full time to writing, lecturing, and the production of these television documentary series: Heritage: Civilization and the Jews, about the history of the Jewish people; Personal Witness: A Nation is Born, his eyewitness account of the birth of the State of Israel, and Brink of Peace, an overview of the history of the peace process between Israel and the Arab world.

Eban's rhetorical skills won him membership in the Hall of Fame of the International Platform Association, including him in its list of the modern era's 10 greatest orators, alongside such figures as Winston Churchill, Martin Luther King Jr. and Franklin Roosevelt.

Over the years, he was awarded 20 honorary doctorates, membership in the American Academy of Arts and Sciences and the Israel Prize (in 2001), and he wrote many books, including an autobiography, histories of Judaism and Israel and political essays on diplomacy.

He is survived by his wife, Suzy, a son, Eli, and a daughter, Gila. He is to be buried Monday in Kfar Shmaryahu.

More coverage of Eban's life in next week's CJN.

Israeli college is geared to new millennium

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Back in 1994, Israel under then-prime minister Yitzhak Rabin was in the midst of an internal revolution. The country's constitutional system and the way it elects its leaders were being re-evaluated, while on the economic front, its high-tech industries were developing the technologies that were a big part of the global computer boom.

That same year, the Interdisciplinary Centre (IDC) was founded in Herzliyah, very much part of the "feeling of optimism" transforming Israeli society but also an answer to a perceived shortfall in the country's educational establishment, said Prof. Bernard Avishai, director of the school's entrepreneurship program.

When Prof. Uriel Reichman conceived of the IDC, he conceptualized a "small, elite college modeled on the America college system" that differed from other Israeli institutes of higher learning by being privately funded and organized as a non-profit corporate entity, Avishai said. It would be a college that would create a new generation of Israeli leaders able to prosper in the new international environment.

Dedicated to the pursuit of excellence in research and education, the IDC styles itself as an Israeli university for the new millennium, one "where personal achievement goes hand in hand with social responsibility." It firmly embraced "entrepreneurship – recognizing the value of market forces, private initiative and innovation," states the school's promotional material.

Social responsibility recognized

Though the school began with only a program in law, it expanded to include a business school and it encouraged contact between the two, so that lawyers would understand business issues and businessmen would have a grasp of legal matters.

The IDC has continued to expand and it now offers an educational program entirely in English through the Raphael Recanati International School (RRIS). The school is named for the late banker and shipping magnate who died in 1999.

For the 2003-2004 academic year, the RRIS will offer programs in law, business, computer technology and will introduce a new program in government, diplomacy and strategy.

Avishai, who also serves as dean of the RRIS, said the school is attempting to increase its profile and attract foreign students to its three-year degree programs.

The school's selling points are many and varied, he continued: a first-rate faculty, drawn in large part from U.S. campuses; an interdisciplinary approach to learning, where the worlds of business, high tech and government overlap; proximity to the business talent of Israel's "Silicon Wadi," home to familiar high tech names like Intel and Microsoft; and being "on the cutting edge of Western democratic life," where issues of security, diplomacy, conflict resolution, entrepreneurship and information technology are front and centre.

The course load is heavy but the rewards are extensive, Avishai said. Students can expect to graduate with the skills that are very much in demand in the new millennium. The school of government, for one, is modelled on the Kennedy School of Government at Harvard University, he added.

Business students will benefit from studying in a country that is a world leader in high tech development, where eight of 22 "critical technologies" related to the new information age were developed. "Israel is an incubator for the kind of team-based problem-solving that defines the post-modern international business world," Avishai said.

RRIS officials are hoping to attract some 50 international students to its class of 150 next year. Tuition is set at $6,200 (US) per year. Housing and health insurance amount to an additional $3,600 (US) . Compared to the fees charged by U.S. colleges, "it's a fabulous deal," Avishai said.

"Israel is too often depicted as part of the family that is in need," said Avishai, a native of Montreal. "Too often we think of Israel as an object of philanthropy and not as a world class competitor.

"This school is part of the good news, that Israel competes in some of the most important areas in the world. This is the part of Israel that works, that really connects to the rest of the world and competes successfully. We all want to be part of it. It's exciting."

Orthodox feminists hold conference in New York

By REBECCA NADLER
Special to The CJN

NEW YORK — "Orthodox Jewish women who challenge the status quo do not pose a threat to Judaism," says the president of the Jewish Orthodox Feminist Alliance (JOFA).

"[R]ather, [they] have an honest desire to engage in a dialogue that challenges ourselves and others to deal with things that cause difficulty for them in their Orthodox communities," said Blu Greenberg at the opening of JOFA's fourth annual international conference on feminism and Orthodoxy.

"We strive for a thoughtful blend of the best of Torah and Halachah with the best of the society around us."

The two-day event, held Nov. 9-11 at the Grand Hyatt in New York City, drew more than 1,000 women and men from around the world. Participants came from Israel, Canada, France, Australia, Holland, Spain, England and across the United States.

The conference, called Discovering/Uncovering/Recovering Women in Judaism, aimed to explore the ritual, spiritual, intellectual and political opportunities for women within the framework of Jewish law.

While workshops covered a wide variety of topics, the buzz at this year's conference was a new concept in Orthodox Judaism, female Torah readers.

Though female Torah readers are standard in non-Orthodox congregations, and most in the Orthodox community have long accepted that women can read from the Torah in women-only prayer groups, women now have opportunities to receive aliyot and read from the Torah in a few Orthodox, mixed services in Israel and New York.

These congregations and services – the Israeli synagogue Shira Chadasha; the Drisha Institute for Jewish Education, a women's centre of Jewish learning in New York; Darchei Noam in Manhattan; and a minyan that recently began in Yonkers – allow this new model of Orthodoxy on the basis of a number of recent halachic publications, most notably one by Rabbi Mendel Shapiro of Jerusalem that was published in the journal Edah in the spring of 2001.

In his article, Rabbi Shapiro argued the Talmud is clear that "all are eligible for receiving one of the seven aliyot," including women. The traditional Orthodox position is that a woman reading from the Torah is seen as diminishing the kavod hatzibur, the dignity of the community.

But today, Rabbi Shapiro argued, women are educated and work side by side with men in both religious and secular settings, so women reading from the Torah does not undermine the community's dignity.

While most of the conference's attendees and presenters felt their were no halachic barriers to this new practice, some argued that the Orthodox community was not ready to embrace this move and it would only create divisions.

Changing established norms will be difficult, said Rabbi Adam Mintz of Manhattan's Lincoln Square Synagogue, who spoke at the conference of the competing congregational needs that rabbis must balance.

Rabbi Mintz said he respects the new movement, but added that "the only way these services will in any way be accepted is" with the approval and support of at least a segment of the rabbinic community.

Rabbi Steven Dworken, executive vice-president of the Rabbinical Council of America, said he is "not aware of any acceptable halachic authority who has granted permission" for women to read from the Torah during a mixed service.

Since those behind the movement "do not represent a significant proportion of the mainstream Orthodox community," Rabbi Dworken said, he doesn't expect the issue to make much headway.

"I don't believe it's going to be universal, but I hope it won't separate communities that do and communities that don't," Greenberg said.

A number of workshops at the conference dealt with women's dress and behaviour. Presenters shied away from using the term tzniut to denote physical modesty, using it instead to refer to all behaviours and attitudes of both men and women.

Greenberg noted that over the past decade, women have made great strides in the Orthodox community. One area that remains a concern is the continuing struggle to discover a halachic solution to free agunot, women whose husbands refuse to grant them a get, or Jewish divorce.

Atara Grysman, a university student from Toronto, was impressed with her first JOFA event.

"I am returning to Toronto recharged," Grysman said. "I was very impressed by the strict adherence to Halachah and the seriousness evident at each workshop and discussion. It wasn't just ideas, everyone talked about texts. I walked away from the conference with sources and information."

The conference offered participants a choice between a morning of discussion about agunot, a morning of text and chevruta – study groups – at the Drisha Institute for Jewish Education, or a tour of the new Yeshiva University Museum, with a discussion of the works of Andrea Kalinowski.

El Al hijacking foiled

By AMOS HAREL, ALUF BENN and ZOHAR BLUMENKRANTZ
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

An apparent hijacking attempt on an El Al flight to Istanbul was thwarted Sunday night when airline security guards overpowered an Israeli Arab passenger who tried to burst into the cockpit of Flight 581 from Ben-Gurion International Airport to Istanbul, an El Al spokesperson said.

None of the 170 passengers on board was harmed in the incident and the plane landed safely in Istanbul.

According to some reports, the suspected hijacker was armed with a pocketknife, but Israel Radio reported that he was not carrying a weapon.

About 15 minutes after take-off, the suspect reportedly threatened a flight attendant with a knife and tried to approach the cockpit, but was overpowered by two security guards, one posing as a passenger, CNN-Turk television said. However, the circumstances of the incident are not yet fully clear.

The man was seized and handcuffed and the plane continued on its flight. Security guards "threw him to the floor with his legs spread and his face to the floor. The passengers were hysterical, but the flight attendants were very cool; they calmed us down," said a passenger identified as Menachem.

The director general of the Israel Airports Authority, Gabi Ophir, opened an inquiry to determine how the man managed to smuggle a pocketknife past the ground security guards.

An Istanbul airport official said one "terrorist" was being held in custody and would be handed over to Israeli security personnel.

German treaty with its Jews triples funding

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

BERLIN — The German government last week signed what it termed a "state treaty" to upgrade ties and boost financial support with the Central Council of Jews in Germany.

A statement said under the accord, Berlin will triple the amount of money it pays to the Central Council to $3 million (US) a year.

Germany's Jewish community now numbers about 100,000, said the council's president Paul Spiegel. Germany's overall population is 82 million, about three million of whom are Muslims.

Thousands of Jews arrive in Germany each year from the former Soviet Union under a 1990 deal by former German Chancellor Helmut Kohl that granted Soviet Jews the right to immigrate to Germany. The only other group that has such a right is ethnic Germans from central and eastern Europe.

The Central Council of Jews in Germany was founded with 15,000 members in 1950, just after the Nazis murdered six million Jews during the Holocaust. Before the Holocaust, Germany's Jewish population had been about 600,000.

Spiegel said the extra state funds would be used to train and hire more rabbis in order to increase religious services for Jews arriving from the former Soviet Union, where they had often faced persecution and been unable to practice their faith.

But Spiegel admitted that due to terror threats by radical Islamic groups, some people in the Jewish community refuse to go to synagogue unless police guards are posted outside.

Of Rocket Richard and thief lords: Gift book ideas

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Books as Chanukah gifts. Makes sense for the People of the Book – and their children.

Consider two recent volumes for the younger set.

Jewish brothers-in-law Avi Slodovnick, a Toronto lawyer, and Jack Siemiatycki, a Montreal epidemiologist, have breathed life into a misty memory for any man (and probably some women) of a certain age – especially if they're from Montreal.

The Hockey Card (Lobster Press, 32 pages, $21.95), richly illustrated by Doris Barrette, doubtless will be compared to Roch Carrier's classic The Hockey Sweater. But the newer volume rings truer, for it involves the timeless art of flipping hockey cards for keeps. The Hockey Sweater was a wonderful story for certain, but after all, how many of us have ordered a glorious Canadiens jersey (with a 9 on the back, of course) from an Eaton's catalogue, only to receive a dreaded Maple Leafs shirt (quelle horreur!) by mistake?

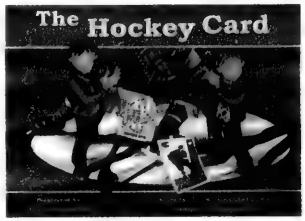
On the other hand, there are plenty of guys who can recall winning and losing precious hockey cards with those flipping and tossing games (whether playing odds or evens, or shooting them closest to the school wall).

This is a heartwarming tale told as a bedtime story by Uncle Jack to his nephew. While tucking the lad in one night after watching a hockey game on TV, Uncle Jack recounts the long-ago story of losing all but one of his hockey cards to "the biggest hockey card shark in the whole school." Forced to play his priceless last card – the one featuring number 9, the immortal Maurice "Rocket" Richard – young Jack begins a miraculous winning streak, thanks to the talisman-like qualities of the Richard card.

The story ends back in the present, with Uncle Jack presenting the Habs-mad boy with the dog-eared card as a birthday gift.

The CJN has the inside scoop on the narrative: it's a true story.

Seems "Uncle Jack," the co-author, really did have a magical experience while nearly losing his own vintage Rocket Richard card in the pre-1967 days of hockey (before expansion, when the game meant something), and he really did present it years later to his own nephew, Slodovnick's son Paul, now nine. The 1960 card, probably worth a pretty penny, is now safely sealed in a plastic sleeve at the Slodovnick homestead.



The Hockey Card combines nostalgia, romance, even suspense, and is properly respectful of a pasttime kids used to (do they still?) take seriously. As for the Rocket, well, he is paid rightful deference by being described as "the greatest hockey player who ever lived."

The first-time children's authors say a French version is due presently.

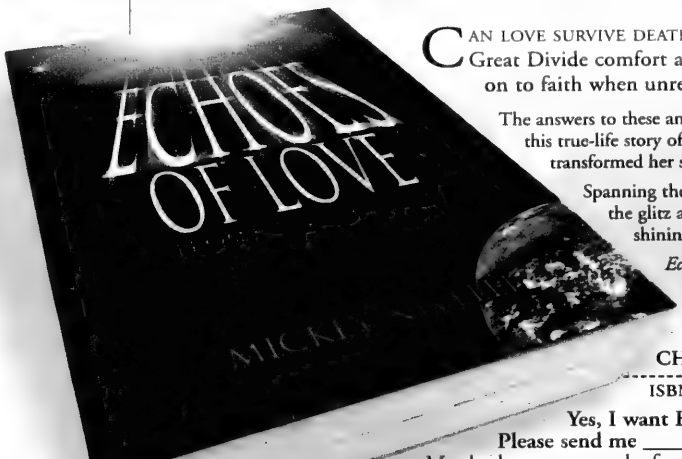
For older teens who are fans of fantasy but are beyond the Harry Potter books, consider The Thief Lord (The Chicken House/Scholastic Inc., 349 pages, $23.99) by Cornelia Funke. A huge hit in the author's native Germany, the book has sold over 130,000 copies in North America and reached number one on the prestigious New York Times' bestseller list – an amazing feat considering it was released here just last month.

This is no J.K. Rowling clone. The story is set in modern-day Venice, where two young boys, 12-year-old Prospero and Boniface, age five, are hiding out from a cruel aunt and uncle. They encounter the spunky leader of a gang of street urchins, who proclaims himself to be the "Thief Lord." He sets the boys up in an abandoned movie theatre and helps support them through his (supposed) crimes.

But the Thief Lord has secrets. He isn't what he appears.

Add to the mix an idiosyncratic detective, a mysterious count, the exotic canals of Venice and a carousel with magical powers, and it's little wonder The Thief Lord is a hit with nine to 12-year-olds.

AN INSPIRING TRUE STORY OF ETERNAL LOVE



CAN LOVE SURVIVE DEATH? Do the voices of those who cross the Great Divide comfort and guide the living? How does one hold on to faith when unrelenting hatred and evil assail one's life?

The answers to these and other pertinent questions are illuminated in this true-life story of Lotte, a German-born Jewish woman, who transformed her suffering into spiritual enlightenment.

Spanning the most terrifying period of human history, to the glitz and glamour of show business, this book is a shining testament to the power of love and faith.

Echoes of Love From Heavens Above is a poetic treasure and a rich resource for readers on a journey of personal and spiritual growth.

Anthology examines Disraeli's self-image

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

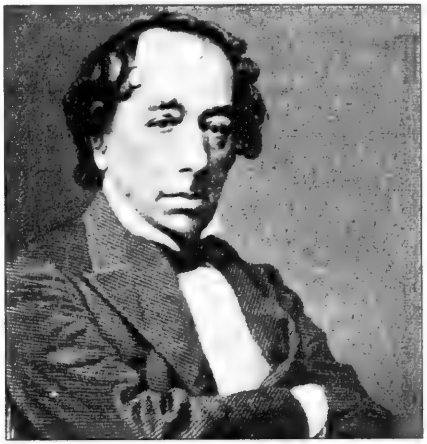
Although he was baptized at the age of 12, Benjamin Disraeli – the first British prime minister of Jewish origin – was acutely aware of his background.

Disraeli's consciousness of being Jewish, which changed over time, drew on a wellspring of sources: Sephardi pride, family traditions, racial notions and Christian doctrine.

Todd Endelman, an American scholar, examines this facet of Disraeli's development in an essay in The Self-Fashioning of Disraeli, 1818-1851 (Cambridge University Press), a useful collection of essays about his life edited by Charles Richmond and Paul Smith.

One of Disraeli's earliest biographers, James Anthony Froude, maintained that he was "a Hebrew to the end." Endelman, a professor of Jewish history at the University of Michigan, brings a more nuanced approach to the subject.

Disraeli's baptism made possible his illustrious political career, since professing Jews were not allowed to sit in parliament until 1858. But in the short run, Endelman theorizes, his baptism was not necessarily advantageous.



Benjamin Disraeli

Newly-minted Christians, particularly those with marked Jewish features, often fared worse than unconverted Jews.

Endelman claims that a trip to the Middle East, combined with a plunge into electoral politics, forced his Jewishness to the fore.

A visit to Jerusalem left an indelible impression of his ancestry, while canvassing for votes gave him a better appreciation of crass street-level anti-Semitism.

Disraeli's ascent to national prominence, as well as the publication of his novels, The Wondrous Tales of Alroy and Conigsby, attracted yet more attention to his Jewish antecedents.

But strangely enough, as a novice member of parliament, he voted with the majority against bills to remove anti-Jewish restrictions.

Endelman believes that Disraeli's "racial chauvinism," his early tendency to underline his Jewishness, was a "compensatory counter-myth" designed to combat feelings of social inferiority.

Identifying himself with Spanish and Portuguese Jews, Disraeli inflated his Jewish birth into a claim of noble birth.

Once he reached the top of the greasy pole, he ceased harping on Jewish themes, as he had for his first two decades as a politician.

Having gained the Tory leadership, he no longer felt the need to state his claims to nobility.

An interesting theory.

Jewish reference and history works great for book lovers

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Publishers unveil some of their finest books in the autumn.

This year's crop includes Jewish-niche reference works on Judaism, Jewish history, Israel and the Holocaust and books of general interest about Canada.

All are well worth adding to a library.

The New Encyclopedia of Judaism, edited by the late Geoffrey Wigoder, is published by New York University Press.

Covering every conceivable aspect of Judaism and representing current thinking about Judaism in Reform, Conservative and Orthodox circles, this is a magnificent volume, running to 900 pages.

Alphabetically, the lucid entries range from "Aaron" and "burial" to "pilpul" and "Leopold Zunz" (a pioneer in the scientific study of Jewish literature, liturgy and religious poetry).

This well illustrated compendium contains an excellent index and an annotated bibliography. In its genre, The New Encyclopedia of Judaism is a work to behold, admire and, above all, to read.

Culture of the Jews, edited by David Biale, a professor of Jewish history at the University of California, is an equally impressive tome. Published by Schocken Books and distributed in Canada by Random House, it contains a selection of literate essays.

The first section, entitled Mediterranean Origins, deals with the Israelites and with Jewish culture in the Greco-Roman world, Palestine in the Byzantine period and Babylonia and Arabia during the formative years of Islam.

Part two illuminates Judeo-Arabic culture and Sephardi culture in the Iberian Peninsula, Amsterdam, Ashkenazi Europe and Italy during the Renaissance.

The third section, which examines communities, ways of life and high and folk culture around the world, offers an eclectic mix of essays on subjects from Jews in the Arab world and Central Asia to Ethiopian Jewry.

The latest estimate of the Jewish population in the United States is 5.2 million, making it the world's largest Jewish community. Jews from every conceivable corner of the universe have converged on the United States, as a reading of The Golden Land: The Story of Jewish Immigration to America confirms.

Written by Joseph Telushkin and published by Harmony Books, this intriguing volume will be of interest to readers of all ages.

What is unique about The Golden Land, distributed in Canada by Random House, are its pullout documents and artifacts, ranging from George Washington's 1790 letter to the Jewish community of Newport, Rhode Island, to Irving Berlin's original, hand-written lyrics for his iconic song, God Bless America.

And, I should add, the black and white photographs of famous American Jews and of street scenes are most striking.

In 1998, Daniel Gordis and his family left Los Angeles for a one-year sabbatical in Israel. From virtually the moment he arrived, he began bombarding friends and family abroad with a torrent of e-mails about life in his new home.

These articulate missives, published in If A Place Can Make You Cry (Random House), transport you from the optimism of the Olso peace process to the gloom and doom of the post-Oslo era.

Readers will learn much from his penetrating observations

Elie Wiesel, in After the Darkness (Random House), distills a lifetime of knowledge about the Holocaust in a mere 44 pages. Mixing personal reminiscences with historical facts, he produces an impressionistic survey of a tragedy that shook the Jewish world to its very foundations.

This beautifully-crafted book is lavishly illustrated with graphic black-and-white photographs of pre-war Jewish communities, Nazi Germany and the concentration camps, both before and after their liberation.

Abraham: A Journey to the Heart of Three Faiths (HarperCollins), by Bruce Feiler, takes the form of a quest by an American journalist to better understand that great patriarch.

Feiler spent more than six months travelling through the Middle East on a 10,000-mile journey retracing the five books of Moses. It is a fascinating trip that readers are likely to enjoy.

Jacob Lawrence Cohen, known as J.L. to Canadian trade unionists, was one of Canada's first specialists in labour law and an architect of its industrial relations system.

Laurel Sefton MacDowell's biography, Renegade: The Life of J.L. Cohen (University of Toronto Press), is a comprehensive and empathetic account of a top-notch, though controversial, lawyer who died suddenly in 1950 at the age of 53. The Globe and Mail, in its obituary of Cohen, may have put it best: "He championed all the wrong people in all the right things."

Martin Friedland's magnum opus, The University of Toronto (University of Toronto Press), covers a lot of ground as it chronicles the history and development of Canada's leading institution of higher learning, including its once-hostile attitude to Jews.

Friedland, the former dean of U of T's faculty of law, has a knack for bringing ideas, events and personalities into a coherent and readable synthesis.

Firefly Books has published two handsome coffee-table books you can feast your eyes on.

Toronto showcases an evolving city through the prism of Tim Peters' exquisite colour photographs. His streetscapes brim with vitality and his closeups of ordinary people going about their everyday business are vivid and evocative.

An ideal gift.

Former minister reflects on politics in Not Bad for a Sergeant

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Barney Danson, who served as the Member of Parliament for York North from 1968 to 1979, has published a book of memoirs, Not Bad For A Sergeant, that is must reading for anyone interested in Canadian politics and the legacy of former prime minister Pierre Trudeau in particular. Jewish readers will find the book especially illuminating because of the light it throws on diverse matters regarding Middle Eastern politics and the Jewish world.

Born in Toronto in 1921, Danson quit school at age 16. A year later he joined the Queen's Own Rifles, an army regiment that was mobilized to fight in the war in Europe in 1940. Danson was severely wounded in Normandy in August 1944 and lost the sight in one eye, but he writes that he considers himself fortunate since four of his close friends were killed in battle.

After the war, Danson ventured into industrial plastics and established the Danson Corporation, which blossomed into a multi-million-dollar concern. Holding the belief that "if you fought for your country you had a right to play a part in shaping its future," he joined the Liberal party in the closing days of the Lester Pearson administration and made a failed bid for a parliamentary seat in October 1967.

Fortunately, he tried again in 1968: "With the campaign on, and Trudeaumania sweeping the country, we could smell victory in the air right from the start." The day he took his seat in the Commons, he "looked around at the elegant carvings and stained glass windows" and felt a sense of awe and respect.

In 1970, Danson became parliamentary secretary to Trudeau, and though he had not yet penetrated the former prime minister's innermost circle, he observed how fully the October Crisis preoccupied Trudeau. Danson describes subsequent travels around the globe with Turdeau and his entourage, and meetings with former Indian prime minister Indira Gandhi, the Shah of Iran, Soviet premier Alexei Kosygin and other world leaders.

Since the trip to Russia occurred at the height of the global Jewish campaign to free Soviet Jewry, Trudeau raised the issue with his Soviet counterparts. He was quite persistent, Danson recalls, and linked it with matters of genuine interest to the Russians. Danson credits Trudeau, along with former U.S. president Richard Nixon, for helping to open the floodgates of Jewish immigration from the monolithic communist state.

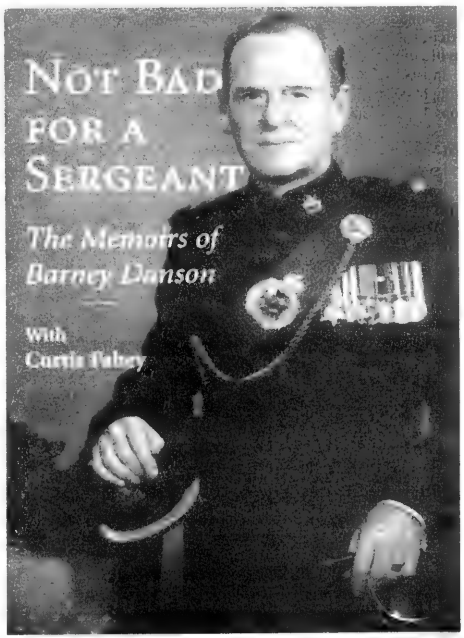
Danson, who subsequently held the high-profile cabinet portfolios of urban affairs and then defence, was rarely idle. He chaired Habitat, a UN forum on human settlements that was marred when the Arab delegates walked out as the Israeli delegate rose to speak. Much later, he helped to establish Katimavik, an innovative and much-lauded program for Canadian youth.

Visiting the Middle East in his role as defence minister, Danson endured "what was probably the most difficult official visit of my life" with Syrian defense minister Mustafa Tlass. Days earlier, Tlass had apparently declared publicly that Syria intended to kill every Israeli and that he was personally prepared to "rip out their throats" with his teeth.

"A sweet guy," Danson observes of the man who likely knew full well that Danson was Jewish. Tlass still heads Syria's defence ministry.

Egyptian president Anwar Sadat gave Danson a decidedly brighter message: "If the Israelis want to talk peace, we are ready." Danson duly relayed those words to Israeli officials, and Sadat's famous visit to Jerusalem occurred a few months later. "I like to think that, in my capacity as a courier, I may well have contributed to this historic development," he writes.

Danson also gives readers his impressions of a spectrum of Israeli prime ministers from Golda Meir to Ehud Barak. He is most critical of Benjamin Netanyahu and most complimentary to Shimon Peres.



Not Bad For A Sergeant touches upon many aspects of a full life. It's well written, perhaps surprisingly so for someone who has been legally blind for the last five of his 80 years. Danson credits his writing partner, Chris Fahey, for the book's even flow and readability.

My only disappointment was that Danson glosses over his family history in only a couple of paragraphs. Certainly, more could have been made of a grandfather – also named Barney Danson – who came to Toronto in the 1870s and left an estate that in 1919 was valued at about a quarter of a million dollars.

Not Bad For A Sergeant is published by Dundurn Press and costs $39.99 in Canada.

Account of wartime refugees in Shanghai

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

A new book out just in time for the Chanukah gift-giving season recounts a Toronto resident's story of her mother's escape from Vienna to Shanghai.

Approximately 20,000 European Jews found refuge from Nazi Germany in Shanghai, China. Although most of them spent the war years in severe poverty amongst the worst of diseases, it wasn't until after the war they realized, in retrospect, how "good" they had it, compared to the millions left behind in Europe.

What makes Ten Green Bottles, by Vivian Jeanette Kaplan (Robin Brass Studio, 2002), stand out from other similar books is the author's style. Kaplan writes from the first-person viewpoint of her mother; "a creative non-fiction," as she says. The author was born in Shanghai just after the war.

Kaplan's mother, Nini Karpel, was one of four children growing up in pre-war Vienna. They lived a comfortable existence, assimilated into upper-middle class Austrian life. They skied, took holidays and lived an idyllic lifestyle.

In 1938, after the Anschluss, which brought with it Kristallnacht, restrictions, humilation and hardship for all Jewish residents, the Karpels realized that Vienna would never be the same and sought to escape.

Kaplan's prose is simply stunning, especially for a first-time novelist.

"We are Jews, and the gaiety of Vienna is no longer available to us," she writes. "The treachery that has befallen our city forces us to hide from anything of joy or beauty. Even a casual stroll is a danger that we do not attempt. We leave only for the most crucial of necessities and then hurry back like frightened rodents to seek shelter again in the hot, darkened rooms, curtains pulled to hide from the eyes of our enemies, who are lurking everywhere."

With this danger "lurking everywhere," news travels fast about sanctuary in Shanghia, and Nini, now in her 20s, decides it's time for her family to leave.

She boldly walks into a gentile lawyer's office – a stranger – and through one of those twists of fate that many survivors encountered, finds that he feels sorry for her and gets them the necessary exit visas.

One can imagine the absolute culture shock a Viennese family like hers would experience in China. Kaplan's descriptions bring wartime Shanghai, its people and smells, to life.

"We dissolve into the flooding humanity, a population of four and a half million that throngs in the streets, so dense with people that walking through them is like wading in living quicksand... Dead bodies litter the sidewalks, having perished from hunger and heat exhaustion or the ravages of leprosy, malaria, cholera, dysentry or typhoid. Others have succumbed to the numbing opium that has permeated their veins and gnawed at their brains with its poison."

Life in the filth of Shanghai was hard. The only good news was that her lover from home, Poldi, was able to join her there. They married in 1940.

The family survived by operating a bar that catered to sailors. But after Pearl Harbour, the Japanese seized Shanghai, and to appease their Nazi allies, they deported all Jewish refugees to a ghetto in Hongkew, the poorest part of the city.

The Karpels managed to survive despite meagre diets, plagues, thyphoons and later, the Allied bombing. It was only after the war, when they heard about the tragedy of the Holocaust, that they realized that they were some of the lucky ones.

"Only then do we comprehend our own good fortune, despite the hardships, having survived as we have done. Suddenly we feel guilty to have complained of our circumstances, ashamed of our comparative ease."

The Karpels left Shanghai in 1948 with their two-year-old daughter, the author, and settled in Canada.

Although non-fiction, Ten Green Bottles reads like a novel. Kaplan captures the mood and feelings of her mother's experiences as if they were her own. The combination of descriptive writing and its unique setting makes this book well worth reading.

Reminiscences in time for Chanukah

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

A new book about a mother's kind deeds is a perfect Chanukah gift for book-lovers.

Mama and Her Mitzvahs: Stories and Reminiscences, by Sophie Stransman, provides a loving, anecdotal portrait of a golden-spirited woman who, with her husband, operated a small dry-goods store in the heart of Toronto's Cabbagetown during the Depression.

Rachel and Elia Siegel were the proprietors of Siegel's Groceteria, an authentic mom-and-pop operation that stood on the corner of Oak and Sumach streets. The store occupied the ground floor of a small house and the family lived upstairs. The store windows were crammed with canned goods and its front was decorated with signs for Coca-Cola, Orange Crush, Salada Tea and Winchester Cigarettes.

Rachel Siegel was an industrious businesswoman who snapped up bargains at Eaton's and offered them for sale in her store. She had her own way with the English language and comically fractured many a fine English phrase: "Just between me, you and the barbershop pole," she would say when addressing someone in confidence.

Above all, she was renowned for her kindness and charity. She extended credit to many families with hungry children at home, dispatched chicken broth (by way of her daughter Sophie) to sick neighbours, and directed friends, customers and deliverymen upstairs to help themselves to the pot of coffee that was always brewing on her stove.

As the author nostalgically relates, Mama revelled in doing mitzvahs. She did so much on behalf of others that it took her years to attain her own simple dream, the purchase of a fashionable but used dress-suit.

Along with her kindness, she was the dispenser of much homespun advice and Yiddishkeit to those around her. "Never fight over children," she once cautioned adults quarreling over their youngsters. "In an hour, the children will be friends again, but the parents will remain enemies forever."

Because of her warmth and wisdom, people were drawn to her "like nails to a magnet," the author relates. "The way she holds an audience in the palm of her hand, she should be on the stage," a neighbour once remarked.

Stransman relates that her mother "felt a strong sense of kinship" with another immigrant storekeeper, Timothy Eaton, and would gaze at his bronze statue in admiration on her weekly visits to Eaton's.

Although we may draw comparisons between this real-life character and the fictitious storekeepers in stories by Bernard Malamud and other Jewish-American writers, we are always keenly aware that Mama is a uniquely Canadian figure, a Torontonian through and through.

For example, the author relates an incident that could only have happened in Toronto. A policeman once observed a girl leaving Siegel's Groceteria on a Sunday with a bag of charcoal under her arm, and ticketed Mama for violating the Lord's Day Act. She plied the officer with sour cream cake and explanations: was the girl's family supposed to freeze until Monday, she asked?

Further, she had taken the charcoal on credit and "we should make in a week what her father owes us." Recognizing defeat, the officer retrieved the ticket and tore it up.

Stransman shows impressive skill for a novice storyteller. While some of her anecdotes seem lightweight, each has a certain avoirdupois, like a quantity of butter, sugar or flour wrapped in paper. Only when you hold the collective weight of all these stories in a single grocery bag, as it were, do you appreciate their substantiveness.

Several of the reminiscences are extensive enough to be almost considered as short stories. My favourite, "A Cousin from Germany," falls into this category. It tells the story of a sullen young visitor from Germany during the war era who finally breaks his silence and tearfully relates the fate of his family.

Taken as a whole, Mama and her Mitzvahs is as tasty and heimish as a pot of chicken soup warming on a stove.

Mama and Her Mitzvahs is available for $20; phone 416-482-4334, email sophiestransman@hotmail.com

Book confronts German-Americans' shame about Holocaust

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Ursula Hegi's Tearing the Silence (Distican) is a meditation on a dimension of the Holocaust not heard before – the legacy of shame borne by some German-born Americans about Germany's ugly past.

The core of Tearing the Silence consists of 15 interviews with such hyphenated Americans, and Hegi's introductory remarks set the tone of this frank, thoughtful book.

Hegi, who was 18 when she settled in the United States, writes that neither her parents nor her teachers ever discussed the Holocaust during her formative years.

It was simply a taboo topic.

"We grew up with that silence," observes Hegi, a 55-year-old novelist who lives in the Pacific Northwest.

"As a young woman," she adds, "I tried to shed my German heritage, to make myself nationless." Only later did she come to terms with her background.

Like Hegi, her interviewees are sensitive souls.

Ulrich, 55, recalls that his parents disapproved of Nazi crimes, but claimed that the number of Holocaust victims has been exaggerated.

Anneliese, 59, is torn between her German heritage and her revulsion of the Nazi era.

Joachim, 54, whose father was in an SS division, criticizes Germany's postwar schools for their "maddening silence" about the Holocaust.

Marika, 60, says she has worked very hard to overcome the " blatant anti-Semitism" of her childhood.

A skillful interviewer, Hegi succeeds in drawing out her subject's deepest feelings, and in doing so, she makes Tearing the Silence a useful exercise in history, sociology and, perhaps, psychoanalysis.

PLAYWRIGHT TELLS GREAT-AUNT'S TRUE STORY

Toronto playwright Sonja Mills has written a play about her great-aunt, Agnete Ottosen, a heroine of the Danish resistance who helped to smuggle hundreds of Jews to Sweden during World War II. Mills, who translated Ottosen's diaries after inheriting them from her mother, travelled to Denmark and interviewed other resistance fighters to learn more about Ottosen's life.

Nightwood Theatre presents the world premiere of The Danish Play – A True Story of Resistance, at Tarragon Theatre's Extra Space, 30 Bridgman Ave. Previews Nov. 19 and 20, runs Nov. 21 to Dec. 15. $16 to $30; Sunday PWYC. 416-531-1827.

Calgary Mezzo-Soprano: Inspired by the courage of her grandmother who survived the Holocaust singing for the commanding officers in Auschwitz, Tsepora performs uplifting Yiddish and Hebrew classics. For the past three years, she has sung on the High Holy Days at Temple B'nai Tikvah in Calgary, and last year released a CD and began performing across the country.

Timeless Journey Through Jewish Song is an evening of Yiddish and Hebrew melodies. Vaughan City Playhouse, 1000 New Westminster Dr., Thornhill. Adults $20, children and seniors $15. Sunday, Dec. 22, 7 p.m. 905-709-4057.

Klezmer Concert: Their name may seem strange but Hu Tsa Tsa's music is familiar enough: authentic klezmer characterized by elegant arrangements and passionate improvisation. Hu Tsa Tsa consists of Jonno Lightstone (clarinet, flute), Eric Stein (mandolin, cimbalom, piano) and Rona Goldensher (violin).

Eastminster United Church, 310 Danforth Ave. Adults $15, students and seniors $10, children $5. Saturday, Dec. 7, 8 p.m. 416-461-6681; e-mail empmusic@interlog.com.

Cogan sings traditional Israeli songs

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Lovers of traditional Israeli songs will enjoy their contemporary folk treatment by veteran Canadian-Israeli singer Susan Cogan.

Cogan, who's been performing for over 30 years, was a huge star in Israel in the early '70s.

A singer/songwriter in her own right, Cogan decided on her latest release Mayim (Water) to showcase old Israeli favourites.

The CD begins with Hatizkor (Remember), first heard on Israeli radio on Independence Day in 1948.

Other songs include the Middle Eastern Sabbath prayer song Dror Yikara, a Hebrew version of the Yiddish song Dona Dona, the horah Sovi, David Zahari's Desert Song and seven more songs.

Cogan's voice shines throughout this CD, lending the songs a breath of fresh air. Overall, it is a wonderful compilation of early Israeli folk tunes.

Mayim is released by Nomad Music. You can order it at www.saltspring.com/Susan.

Jazz pianist/composer Steve Holt has decided to switch genres on his new release, a pop/rock CD called The Dream.

Holt is no stranger to change. He was a consumer-product analyst for 15 years before becoming a full-time musician. He recorded four CDs in the jazz milieu, and his debut, The Lion's Eyes, was nominated for a Juno Award for best jazz album.

Holt calls The Dream the album he always wanted to make, and you can definitely feel the passion and soul on these songs. He felt brave enough to tackle The Beatles' classic Let It Be with a passionate, almost a cappella first verse, and he delivers a soulful rendition of Blind Faith's Can't Find My Way Home. Liz Tansey's backup vocals on this and other tracks really help round out his sound.

The other 11 songs are all Holt originals – very tightly arranged, structured songs. He co-produced the album with Darius Szczepaniak, who has worked with Barenaked Ladies and Jann Arden.

The Dream is released by Trilogy Records and Inner Music. Order at www.steve-holt.com

Photographer explores Orthodox Judaism as it relates to women

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

To meet and talk with Carrie Bacher is uplifting. The 25-year-old Montreal-born photographer whose exhibition, Perspectives: Explorations of Jewish Ritual, is at the Justina M. Barnicke Gallery until Dec. 12, possesses a spirituality tempered with questioning that adds distinction to her works.

After earning a bachelor of fine arts degree at Toronto's York University where she won the Kodak Canada Scholarship in Photography, she returned to Montreal to pursue a master of fine arts degree at Concordia University. There, within her work, she began to explore Orthodox Judaism as it related to women. She is currently preparing her MFA exhibition thesis for Concordia and is simultaneously enrolled in the bachelor of education program at the University of Ottawa.

In the Justina M. Barnicke exhibition, Bacher features two aspects of Judaism in two different series. The first is a collection of small inventive digital photographs examining the place of Orthodox women behind a mechitzah or divider in a synagogue.

To achieve this effect she explains, "I layer images on top of each other, partially obscuring certain elements from view as they are obscured from where the women sit."

The second series, large gum bichromate photographic prints, shows individual women lighting Shabbat candles.

"Women are typically released from time-bound rituals [such as putting on tefillin in the morning]," she notes, "with the exception of this one, which women are obliged to perform and men do not if there is a woman present. I took this as an empowerment — showing these women welcoming the day of rest."

Each series makes a statement. The first involving the mechitzah indicates a kind of withdrawal, the second grants a privilege.

Both series are exacting. Creating them demands time, precision and an extraordinary understanding of colour.

Outstanding is the empathy that Bacher feels for each of her candlelighting subjects, among them her grandmother, regal in hues of purple, and her mother, surrounded by earth tones, her hands cupped over her eyes. The artist has caught moments of awe, pleasure, contemplation.

In reflecting on her own growing affinity with Orthodoxy, Carrie Bacher cites a sense of serenity on the Sabbath, happiness in the beauty of belief and security in the warm welcome of community.

The Justina M. Barnicke Gallery is located in Hart House, University of Toronto. For hours and more information, call 416-978-8398.

240 EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITIES

SEARCH for HEAD OF SCHOOL
Greenfield Hebrew Academy - Atlanta, Georgia

The Katherine and Jacob Greenfield Hebrew Academy, a 50-year-old, PK-8, Jewish community day school in north Atlanta, seeks a head of school to begin work July 1, 2003. The head of school reports to the board of trustees and oversees the work of some 100 faculty and staff and the education of 550 students.

As Atlanta's first day school, it has a long tradition of educational excellence and of service to Atlanta's entire Jewish community. Within recent years, GHA has been awarded the Jerusalem Prize by the World Zionist Organization and also twice named a Blue Ribbon School of Excellence.

GHA's mission is to provide Jewish students an outstanding Jewish day school education, integrating Judaic and general studies in a traditional curriculum that is both challenging and stimulating.

GHA's handsome and secure 18-acre campus in north Atlanta includes athletic fields, terraces, playgrounds, and 118,000 square feet under roof, all dramatically built into and around a series of ravines. Facilities are outstanding.

Currently, GHA is poised to move to its next level, at which the school's many strengths can be consolidated into a focused, highly effective, and well-established institution of education (both general and Judaic). The school's next head will have the pleasure and privilege of working the transformation, in the context of the school's rich traditions.

The Academy requests both applications and nominations, which may be sent to:

Eliot Arnovitz and Shelley Cooper
GHA Search Committee Co-chairs
c/o Fitzgerald + CO.
3060 Peachtree Road
Atlanta, GA 30305

Applications consist of a resume and a letter of interest explaining how the individual's experience, skills and interests correspond to the leadership statement (available in response to e-mail request). Applications received after December 18, 2002, when the search committee begins its candidate review, cannot be guaranteed full attention. The search is confidential.

Chanukah Gifts

More Precious than Gold

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

We hear a lot about anti-Semitism these days. Many people, for no particular reason, just don't like Jews.

This is not something new. In fact, hundreds of years ago, a terrible institution was created, called the Inquisition. It was especially powerful in Spain and Portugal.

The Inquisition gave Jews two choices: either become Christian, or leave the country. Those who stayed had a very hard time, as the priests and other people didn't really trust that they had truly become Christians.

Indeed, many kept their Jewish religion secretly, lighting Shabbat candles in the cellar, and trying not to eat pork. They were called Marranos.

More Precious than Gold, by Evelyn Mizrahi Blatt with Eve-Lynn Gardner, illustrated by Eli Toron (Hachai Publishers, 2002) is about the other Jews – the ones who chose to leave.

Sarita Mizrahi lived a very pleasant life in Seville, Spain, with her parents and her younger brother Yosef. They had lots of beautiful things in their house, and servants to look after them.

Her mother, Mazal, was determined that her family should practise Judaism openly, and she convinced her husband that they should leave Spain for the Ottoman Empire, what we now call Turkey. There, Jews were welcomed.

The Spanish didn't make it easy for the Jews to leave. They made them sell nearly all their goods and property. Because they had to leave very quickly, they couldn't get very much for what they sold.

Sarita was just learning how to make challah. Her mother promised her that when she did learn, the family's beautiful silver challah plate would be hers.

Just before their last Shabbat in Spain, soldiers broke into the house to take the last few treasures remaining.

Sarita grabbed the challah plate, and ran into the backyard. Trying frantically to find a safe place to hide it, she found a young girl in the yard who offered to keep it for her.

Although she didn't know the girl, Sarita felt there was no choice and gave it to her.

The girl, Devorah, later came to return the plate and told the family that she was an orphan who lived with a Jewish family that had decided to stay in Spain. But Devorah desperately wanted to be able to live as a Jew and begged Sarita's father to take her with them.

When her father couldn't get permission to take Devorah, Sarita decided to help her. She hid Devorah in one of her trunks, which was loaded into the cargo hold of the ship. During the voyage, she snuck food and water to her friend.

To her joy, Devorah told Sarita that she had hidden the precious challah plate in the trunk with her.

When they finally landed in Smyrna, in Turkey, they were met by members of the Turkish Jewish community who helped them settle in. Finally, Sarita could tell her parents about Devorah and the challah plate.

More Precious Than Gold is not just a good story, although you will enjoy it very much, especially seeing how Sarita becomes so capable. You will learn about how the Spanish Jews, called Sephardim, lived, the kinds of food they ate, and some of their language.

Shell shines at McGill; Toronto boy enters senior year

By ADAM GRACHNIK
Special to The CJN

OTTAWA — There are only a handful of Jews playing university-level hockey, but one of them – a grizzled veteran of the hockey wars – will again suit up for one of the top schools in the country.

Thornhill native Adam Shell patrols the blue line for the McGill Redmen of Canadian Interuniversity Sport (CIS) and this season he is in his final year with the historic school.

The experience, he says, "has been amazing."

"[There are] so many good positive aspects. You learn a lot," says the 5-foot-10, 205-lb. defenceman. "The experience was fantastic."

In his first year with the team, Shell played with 11 other rookies. The Redmen finished 26-5, good enough for fifth in the country. While he managed to score six goals that first year, he admits the transition wasn't easy.

After a strong junior career on defence, Shell was suddenly given some shifts at forward.

"I came from two places where I was the first defenceman," says Shell, who idolizes retired rearguard Ray Bourque. "Going back and forth between forward and defence is tough. It takes your confidence away."

Adam Shell

Another adjustment Shell was forced to make was getting used to the amount of French spoken in the dressing room.

"It's the first time I have ever played on a team where another language was used," he says.

Balancing his academic and sports involvements – being on the ice every day and travelling on weekends – became another major demand.

"It's tough if you have an exam Monday morning but you're in Toronto for the weekend," says Shell. "Practising every day takes its toll. You have to be diligent in what you do. You can't sit and watch TV. You have work to do. The coaches know we're students first. [They] above all, care more about us as individuals, than as hockey players."

As a youngster in the Metro Toronto Hockey League (now the Greater Toronto Hockey League), Shell played with many Triple-A teams, but he started his Junior A career with the Shelbourne Wolves, a team that was "giving young kids a chance."

In one off-season, the Thornhill Rattlers bought his playing rights.

"[Playing for] Thornhill was the best thing that could have happened to me. My confidence started happening," says Shell about the season that saw him score seven goals and and 43 assists as part of the Rattlers' top defensive pairing.

In his last year at Thornlea Secondary School, Shell graduated with an 82 average, even though he spent a lot of time visiting U.S. schools to plan the next step in his career.

"I could have gone to other programs," he says. "[I was] recruited heavily… I knew I wasn't going to be a pro and education was a definite must. I wasn't interested in playing out my junior eligibility and getting a big-time scholarship," he said, referring to the increased odds of going to a U.S. college if he spent another year in Junior A.

He decided instead to enroll at McGill and study management. "I wanted to go to school with my friends and graduate with them," he adds.

Having chosen McGill for its academic program, Shell took the initiative and phoned the coach, who arranged for Shell to be scouted.

In 1999-2000, Shell was signed and he suited up for his parents' alma mater.

Even though he had injury problems in his sophomore year and was still being shifted around to forward in his third, Shell doesn't regret his decision for a second.

"I never stopped enjoying it. I have a passion for the game," he says. "We're treated with a lot of respect. Travelling is good… It's all been great."

While Shell maintains a tight bond with the friends he grew up with, his friends on the Redmen are very important to him now.

"My teammates are my best and closest friends," he says. "There is nothing like walking into the room and seeing the guys. That's what I like the most."

Adam Shell (foreground) patrols the blue line for the McGill Redmen.

And for many of his teammates, Shell is the first Jew they have ever met.

"Most guys on the team have never come across a Jew," he says, explaining that some of his teammates hail from small towns like Weyburn, Sask. or Crystal City, Man. "I enjoy educating them about it."

For the last few seasons, though, Shell wasn't the only Jew on the team. His defence partner at times was Matthew Singermann, now a McGill law student and assistant coach.

"We're probably the only all-Jewish defence pairing in the league," he says with a broad grin.

Though Shell loves the game of hockey, he'll have to decide whether to "hang 'em up" after this season concludes.

"After this year, depending on how good a season I have, I might have some pro aspirations," says Shell. "I really enjoy coaching and really love teaching. [I've] always been a student of the game."

Goodbye Champions Cup, hello UEFA Cup for Haifa

JERUSALEM — Maccabi Haifa's fabulous European soccer adventure shifted from Champions Cup play to the third round of the UEFA Cup following a 3-3 draw against Olympiakos in Athens.

In a performance bristling with self-confidence and what can only be describe as bare-faced impudence, Haifa effectively ensured itself third place in the group and continued European soccer competition with two goals in the first 10 minutes of the game.

In the ninth minute, Giovanni Rosso sprang the Olympiakos offside trap with a perfect through ball to Walid Badir, who calmly put the ball past goalkeeper Dimitrios Eleftheropoulos.

If that stunned the home supporters, Yakubu Ayegbeni provided the killer blow just a minute later, also in a rapier-like counter-attack. His finish was as cool as Badir's, leaving Olympiakos needing to score five goals to steal the UEFA Cup place.

Alexandris managed to cut the home team's deficit to just one goal in the 37th minute, finishing from close range, before Yaniv Katan scored Haifa's third goal in its third attack – on another counterattack, this time orchestrated by Alon Harazi, who found Katan in a good position.

In a one-on-one with Eleftheropoulos, Katan gently knocked the ball in to give Haifa a 3-1 lead at halftime.

Haifa took its foot off the gas in the second half, allowing first Andreas Niniadis and then defender Paraskevas Antzas to score. Antzas evened the score by heading in a Djordjevic corner from the left.

The 200 Maccabi Haifa fans who ventured to Greece were treated by the Olympiakios supporters to a colourful barrage of abuse throughout the game. But they were able to leave safely because of the draw and still celebrate Haifa's continued presence in European competition.

Haifa entered the match with Olympiakos – its final game of the first group stage of the Champions Cup – with no chance of advancing to the second stage. A win, however, assured Haifa of a place in the UEFA Cup as the third place team in Group F. Manchester United, which Haifa defeated 3-0 in a monumental upset recently, and Bayern Leverkusen finished first and second in Group F.

Haifa won the "home" leg of its contest with Olympiakos 3-0 in a game played in Nicosia, Cyprus on Sept. 24. Haifa, along with other Israeli teams, have had to play their home games in neutral locations because of the security situation in Israel. Haifa entered the Olympiakos game in a position where it could afford to lose 2-0 and still finish third in Group F.

The career dilemma

By JODI KOVITZ

As we develop our identities in our 20s, we make some very significant decisions about our education, careers, spiritual and political beliefs and relationships. From my experience, I've learned these types of decisions can be agonizing.

I have been thinking a lot about my career lately, probably because I am in school and working toward my professional goal. But before I choose an area of law to pursue, I have to figure out where and how my career will fit in with my values.

I find this process very difficult because, I think, of my need to find a balance between happiness and financial stability. It is not that these goals are necessarily mutually exclusive; nonetheless, prioritizing them seems to create a lot of tension. Through talking to many of my peers, I have learned that I am not alone in dealing with this conflict.

How should we deal with the pressure? It's pretty hard when it's embedded in our culture.

Our grandparents worked very hard to provide better opportunities for their children. It seems that our parents, in turn, were compelled to do the same for us. Regardless of what we actually had or did not have, we were also taught to work hard and to provide for our own children. Jewish education, summer camp, life in a Jewish community, lessons and travel experiences have all helped to shape my identity. It is impossible for me to imagine not being able to provide these things for my children. The question becomes, at what price?

Sometimes when I contemplate pursuing a career in law, I shiver. Don't get me wrong – so far, I'm really enjoying studying law. It's just that I dread eating take-out meals at the office every night, and giving up my community involvement and personal interests and time for relationships even if I absolutely love the work.

Then I wonder, wouldn't it be nice to open a small flower shop, raise children without a nanny, read some law journals, enjoy my relationships and family, develop my spirituality and play a role in my community? It would be nice. But could I really do it? If I love what I do, both at work and at home, would that be enough? And if it weren't, would I be okay with that? What if it were at the expense of certain educational opportunities and experiences for my future family?

Being fulfilled in life is just as important to me as developing professionally. But being financially secure enough to provide opportunities (that tend to be quite expensive) for my children is also very important to me. Given that both of my desires stem in part from my Jewish culture and values, how do I know which is more important?

I am sure that I will eventually find a satisfying middle ground. Yet, the conflict that I experience in working through this process is very real.

Can you relate? I welcome you to share your insights with me. I plan to write a follow-up column next month to share your experiences and suggestions on this issue. Please send your thoughts to jlkovitz@hotmail.com.

Epi on Education

Seymour Epstein

What do we mean by pluralism when we apply it to Jewish education? Clearly, different Jews use it in different ways. Each individual school has its own working definition that either admits it as part of its philosophy or considers it treif.

Without prejudice, one can identify schools that see themselves as serving a broad spectrum of Jewish beliefs and practices, with a form of pluralism becoming part of the school's method. Some of those schools define a level of Jewish observance that they stand for and teach, even while children from homes that do not maintain that level of observance are welcome. Others not only welcome children from diverse backgrounds, but alter the curriculum to teach to a variety of Jewish beliefs.

One can also find schools that limit themselves to one interpretation of Judaism and wish to create a particular homogeneous environment. Even among these schools, there are varying levels of tolerance and respect for other systems based on the host ideology.

Of course, it falls on the organized community and its institutions (for example, the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education) to develop the broadest interpretation of pluralism. We try to go way beyond mere tolerance to deep respect for each and every school in the city (even those not yet affiliated with the BJE). Our approach is one that allows for individuals, families and groups to hold fast to the core beliefs and practices that they consider essential to Jewish life.

More than that, we at the BJE believe that the more passionate schools are about teaching their own curriculum, the more effective they will be. We recognize that every institution has ideals and knows where it falls short of its own goals. Our job is to help that school get from where it is to where it wants to be within its own ideological framework. We at the BJE are an interesting mix of pareve, passionate pluralism!

Epi (Seymour Epstein) is the vice-president of Jewish Education at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

ZAKA

In 2001, the United Nations named Zaka its Volunteer Organization of the Year.

Biological and Chemical Warfare

It's a scenario no one wants to think about...
Fortunately, someone in Israel is preparing for it.

ZAKA

ZAKA Biological Warfare Preparedness Campaign

With the world community now extending its war on terror to Iraq, the threat of biological and chemical warfare is becoming increasingly real. This is especially true for Israel's residents, who remain Iraq's prime target in the case of a U.S.-led attack.

There is no telling when Iraq may strike, but Israel, no stranger to armed conflict, must be ready. Fortunately, ZAKA, its premier rescue and recovery organization, is already preparing for the worst-case scenario.

ZAKA is a humanitarian voluntary organization whose 600 volunteers work with police, military and emergency medical personnel to assist in search and rescue efforts, provide first aid through its rapid-response moped unit, and recover and identify victims of unnatural deaths. What motivates these volunteers? The belief that every Jewish life is precious – even in death.

Since the start of the intifada two years ago, Zaka volunteers have been working around the clock to help victims of terror. Now, with the threat of war with Iraq looming near, these same volunteers have undergone extensive training to prepare for biological and chemical warfare, and have already been inoculated against biological diseases.

In the event of a war, ZAKA will work alongside Israel's emergency and rescue forces. Its responsibilities will include distributing food and water, providing shelter to those who have been displaced from their homes, and creating special centers for blood distribution. In addition, ZAKA, working in conjunction with police and forensic agencies, will be responsible for recovering and identifying victims.

Though the situation seems almost too bleak to consider, Zaka understands that it needs to be prepared for every eventuality. In particular, the organization must ensure that, in the event of biological or chemical warfare, its volunteers can protect themselves so they can assist and protect others.

ZAKA needs to purchase protective suits and panoramic masks that will enable its volunteers to do their work when war strikes. Each suit costs $400 and each mask costs $250. ZAKA needs to raise $240,000 to purchase suits for all of its 600 volunteers, and $150,000 to purchase the masks.

But ZAKA can't do it alone. We need your help.

By helping ZAKA, you are helping the people of Israel.

CIC says Canada subsidizes purchase of anti-Israel books

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Canadian taxpayers are helping subsidize the purchase of school textbooks used in Palestinian refugee camps, which "demonize, delegitimize and deny Israel's place in the region," the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) says.

$10-$12 million per year to UNRWA

Canada contributes $10-$12 million per year to the UN Relief and Works Agency (UNRWA), which in turn purchases school textbooks and operates schools in Palestinian refugee camps, said Joseph Wilder, CIC's national chair. The textbooks are acquired from the Palestinian Authority (PA) and they depict "Jews as pigs, greedy, not to be trusted," Wilder said.

In a telephone interview from the General Assembly in Philadelphia, Wilder said he and a number of other CIC officials visited Israel and the Palestinian territories recently. They were briefed by David Bedein of the Israel Resource News Agency, whom they had asked to investigate the use of school texts in refugee camps, and they met with UNRWA officials and with Steve Hibert, the Canadian government representative in Ramallah.

UNRWA officials confirmed that the agency operates 256 schools in refugee camps, whose curricula is set by the PA education authority, and UNRWA provides the school books.

UNRWA operates on a $300-million US budget (Wilder called that sum "absolutely astounding"), which is funded by voluntary contributions from UN member states and not from the United Nations itself. It employs 24,000 people, the vast majority of them Palestinians.

Canada condemns Egypt's Protocols

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Canada says it is "appalled" by reports that a 41-part television series based on the notorious anti-Semitic forgery Protocols of the Elders of Zion is now airing on Egyptian television.

Employing unusually strong language, a spokesperson for the Ministry of Foreign Affairs told The CJN the government is "appalled that a major new television series being watched in Egypt and around the Arab world contains strongly anti-Semitic undertones. Such messages are simply unacceptable."

Marie-Christine Lilkoff added that Canada's ambassador to Egypt, Michel de Salaberry, "has been actively pursuing the issue" with Egyptian authorities since last month and that Canadian diplomats in the region "continue to monitor the series" and "speak out against anti-Semitism at every opportunity."

Controversy continues to swirl around the series, known as Knight (or Horseman) Without a Horse, which began airing earlier this month on Egypt's state-run channel and two other domestic stations. The series is timed to coincide with the Muslim holy month of Ramadan, when families tend to stay home in the evening.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Shapiro Appointed

MONTREAL — McGill University principal Bernard Shapiro has been named by United Jewish Communities, the umbrella group of U.S. Jewish federations, to head a task force examining problems with the National Jewish Population Survey 2000-01. Its release, slated for last week's UJC General Assembly in Philadelphia, was postponed after the research firm that conducted it lost some data. Parts of the study, showing a five per cent decline in the number of U.S. Jews since 1990, were released earlier.

WJC Knocks Leftists

OTTAWA — Canadian leftists and liberals are aligning themselves with Islamic extremists to delegitimize Israel and promote an atmosphere of anti-Semitism, a leader of the World Jewish Congress said here last week. "What is really shocking is that you have here today an unholy alliance between liberals, intellectuals from the left and the most extremist forces of Islam," Secretary-General Avi Beker was quoted as saying at a WJC board meeting held in Ottawa.

ISRAEL

Artifacts Discovered

JERUSALEM — Papyrus scrolls dating to the second-century Jewish rebellion against the Romans have been discovered in a Judean desert cave. Rappelling into the cave in the Ein Gedi reserve, researchers from Hebrew University, Bar Ilan University and Stanford University discovered the scrolls. They also found crude arrowheads and coins bearing the Hebrew name "Shimon," a reference to the leader of the rebellion against the Romans, Shimon Bar Kochba. A researcher said the items probably belonged to Jews from the Ein Gedi region who hid in the remote cave to escape the Romans.

Kibbutz Dismantled

JERUSALEM — The Israeli government decided last week to dismantle a cash-strapped kibbutz. Located on the eastern shores of the Sea of Galilee, Kibbutz Ha'on was established in the early 1950s. The government took action after the kibbutz became engulfed in financial difficulties. The kibbutz's assets will be used to pay outstanding debts and to insure pension plans and provide lodging for kibbutz members. Eighty per cent of the kibbutz's members supported the decision.

Sadat Visit Recalled

JERUSALEM — Israel last week marked the 25th anniversary of the late Egyptian president Anwar Sadat's historic visit to Jerusalem. Israel's Foreign Ministry said the visit, and the peace treaty it led to, show how former enemies can make peace.

Civil Marriages Jump

JERUSALEM — The number of Israelis marrying in civil ceremonies in Cyprus has increased sharply in the past decade. Some 1,400 Israelis couples were married in Cyprus in 2000, compared to less than 200 in 1990, the Central Bureau of Statistics reports. The phenomenon has been linked to the influx of immigrants from the former Soviet Union. Many claim no religious affiliation, and only religious weddings are conducted in Israel.

WORLD

Duke in Bahrain

MANAMA, Bahrain — Ex-Ku Klux Klan leader David Duke was to speak in Bahrain earlier this month, where he was to repeat his belief that Israel was behind the Sept. 11 attacks in New York and Washington, D.C. During his stay, he was to deliver two lectures, titled "Global Struggle against Zionism" and "Israeli Involvement in Sept. 11." Muhammad Zuhair, Duke's host, was quoted by the Gulf Daily News as saying: "We are aware of his background. We focused on the Zionist issue. Not many people are prepared to speak out against Zionism."

Scholarship Deadline

RIVER EDGE, N.J. — Funds are now available from the Alisa Flatow Memorial Scholarship Fund for those studying Judaism at an Israeli post-secondary institution. The fund is dedicated to Flatow, a 20-year-old student who was killed in a 1995 terror attack in Kfar Darom in the Gaza Strip. Deadline is Feb 10. For applications, visit www.alisafund.org, or call 201-488-6800.

Killer Sentenced

PITTSBURGH — A man who killed a Canadian rabbi because he looked Jewish was sentenced Nov. 13 in Pittsburgh to 10 to 20 years in prison. Steven Tielsch received the maximum sentence for third-degree murder under guidelines in effect in April 1986, when Rabbi Neal Rosenblum was shot five times after leaving a synagogue, Associated Press reported. Prosecutors had sought a first-degree murder conviction at Tielsch's fourth trial for the slaying. Three earlier juries were unable to reach a unanimous verdict.

Rabbi Convicted

FREEHOLD, N.J. — A New Jersey rabbi was convicted last week for arranging the murder of his wife. Rabbi Fred Neulander, 61, could receive the death penalty for hiring two hitmen to kill his wife, Carol, in 1994 so he could carry on an affair. The verdict came nearly a year after his first trial ended in a hung jury.

Call For New Israeli Arab Lawmakers

JERUSALEM — A group of Israeli Arabs criticized their political representatives last week, saying their radical stances are ruining relations with Israel's Jewish majority.

Incitement by Arab Israeli legislators "seriously damaged the interests and reputation of the Arab community," poet Rifat Assadi said at a rally last Monday in the Galilee village of Deir al-Assad, the Jerusalem Post reported.

Addressing mostly young academics, Assadi said Israeli Arab leaders were partially to blame for October 2000 riots with Israeli police in which "13 of our best men were killed."

According to the paper, many Israeli Arabs believe Arab legislators' actions and statements in recent years have hampered the community's efforts to achieve full equality in Israel. Some participants at the rally criticized the Arab legislators for identifying with Syria, the Palestinian Authority, Hamas, Osama bin Laden and Hezbollah, instead of looking after their constituents' interests.

Israeli lawyer sues PA on victims' behalf

'If you can cut funding, you can cut terrorism'

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Nitsana Darshan-Leitner is hitting Arab terrorists where it hurts – their pocketbooks.

Since an Israeli army reservist was murdered by a mob in the West Bank town of Ramallah two years ago, she has launched about two dozen lawsuits against the Palestinian Authority (PA) and Muslim states that funnel funds to groups such as Hamas and the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade.

She has also sued the European Union, charging that its PA economic assistance program has inadvertently aided and abetted terrorism.

Darshan-Leitner, a petite, dynamic 28-year-old Israeli lawyer who represents more than 100 victims of terrorism through her Israel Law Center, was at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation recently to explain her work.

The talk, Taking Terror to Court, was sponsored by Israel's consulate general and the Toronto Zionist Council.

Edward Greenspan, the Toronto lawyer who introduced her, described Darshan-Leitner as "a voice for the victims of terrorism." He suggested that her "extraordinary pursuit for justice" has paid dividends.

Several weeks ago, Darshan-Leitner won a historic victory against the PA – a 64 million shekel ($13 million US) lien on its assets.

The money, minus her fee, will go to the family of Vadim Nordizh, a Russian-born reservist who was fatally beaten by Palestinians on Oct. 12, 2000 in a PA police station in Ramallah.

"There was almost nothing left of his body after he was killed and mutilated," she said angrily. "The PA was responsible for his murder, and had to pay."

Nitsana Darshan-Leitner

She believes that the case, filed in a Jerusalem district court, will benefit other Israeli families who have sued, or plan to sue, the PA.

It was a serious defeat for the PA. "Each bullet costs Palestinian terrorists one dollar. The lien we have placed on the PA's assets will deprive terrorists of 13 million bullets."

Darshan-Leitner explained that the lien was placed on $500 million (US) worth of PA funds that Israel froze after the outbreak of the Palestinian uprising in September 2000.

Since then, she claimed, the majority of Palestinian terrorist attacks have been mounted by the Tanzim and the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade, both of which are supported financially by the PA.

"If you can cut this funding, you can cut terrorism."

When the Israeli army stormed the West Bank last spring in Operation Defensive Shield, it found documents and bank cheques that Israel said proved beyond a reasonable doubt that the PA had channelled funds to terrorists, including Fatah leader Marwan Barghouti.

He was subsequently captured, and now faces terrorist charges.

From the editor's desk

In view of the concerted effort by some academics and other professionals around the world to isolate Israel and Israelis, we announced after Rosh Hashanah The CJN Book Review Project, aimed at encouraging our readers to read books by Israeli authors. In the last issue of each month, therefore, this space will be dedicated to publicizing new Israeli books.

It's a good thing The Crime of Writing by Haim Lapid (The Toby Press) is a relatively short novel. For as soon as the reader turns the last page, there is an urge, if not a need, to start all over again.

That is because the ending of the tale is momentous. It arrives, without warning, like a thunderclap on a quiet summer night. In fact, it becomes something of a rosetta stone, a key unlocking some of the sealed rooms, as it were, of the preceding narrative.

In that sense, the end can truly be said to have been the beginning.

It is thus not surprising to discover that Lapid is a psychologist who teaches social and behavioural psychology. Only someone familiar with the intricacies and inter-relationships of the mind's many complex chambers could have imagined, let alone written, the compelling story that quickly and deftly unfolds.

The novel is actually a story within a story. There are two narrators.

The first narrator "speaks" at the outset of the novel, but only for a handful of pages. He introduces the tale by recounting a chance encounter his wife had with an elderly stranger in a restaurant in London, England.

That encounter brings about the delivery to his wife of a manuscript written by the older man, which the narrator reads surreptitiously, without his wife's permission.

The stranger's manuscript, of course, comprises the central story in the novel. It flows like a river on sloping landscape, slowly, even tentatively, at first, diffusing into smaller, seemingly innocuous tributaries, but arriving at its spectacular conclusion with the force of a waterfall spilling over the face of a steep cliff.

The narrow nub of the plot focuses on the elderly stranger's lifelong search to discover the secret of his mother's disappearance. "In my ceaseless longing for my missing mother, I never discounted any possible place where she might be," muses the second narrator.

And in his search for his mother, the narrator leaves no place unexplored. Wherever he imagines she might possibly be is where he searches.

Lapid weaves the narrative with delicate, crafty skill. He plants clues and hints of the plot's ultimate resolution throughout the story, but I discovered them only retrospectively after I turned the final page and then I trekked backward through the story to notice for the first time what I had missed all along.

My bookmark, I amusedly realized, in a piercing echo of the line by songwriter Paul Simon, had only "measured what was lost."

Because the plot moves so effortlessly and smoothly through the tightly written prose, one must also pay tribute to the translation from the Hebrew by Yael Lotan.

Although beautifully descriptive passages abound in the novel, its essence is narrative. The key components on which the story relies for its coherence are the disposition of the storyline and the introspection of the storyteller.

Thus, the linguistic structure of the Hebrew itself, with its core reliance on root meanings of words, is not an issue. There are frequent moments of arrestingly insightful and image-laden writing, such as the following passage in which the old man sincerely and pitifully comments on his sad life.

"That's it. Most of the years that followed – whole decades, the better part of my life – were almost devoid of events worth narrating. What is there to tell about someone to whom loneliness had stuck like a beggar's only shirt? Now and then you bathe with it on, or take it off momentarily, scrub it and put it on again, still wet, to dry on your body."

The title of the novel is a conundrum. It ostensibly refers to the narrator's feelings about the utility or even propriety of writing. And yet, the narrator goes to great lengths to record his own story, in seeming violation of this purported credo. "I sip the good hot cocoa. It's so tempting to live in the present. The tap in the basin drips: one drop and then another, adding up to a full glass of fresh water. What do words add up to, one after another? The white page overflows, the words fall into darkness."

But as the reader eventually comes to understand, like so much of the detail that the narrator shares with us regarding the search for his mother, a great deal lies beneath the surface in this novel.

Next week, I resume recording some of my observations from my recent trip to Germany. Next month, I will write about Husband and Wife, by Zeruya Shalev.

Sri Lankan peace process compared with Israel

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

While the world was focusing its attention on Palestinian-Israeli strife, a conflict that seemed just as intractable and emotion-laden has seen the adoption of a historic peace process with potential ramifications for the Middle East.

That's the assessment of Montreal-area Liberal MP Irwin Cotler, who was honoured recently by the Quebec Coalition for Peace in Sri Lanka for "his extraordinary contribution to peace in Sri Lanka and in the world." Cotler was honoured in a ceremony at the Durkai Amman Koyil Temple in Montreal.

The Sri Lankan peace agreement ended one of the longest running disputes in Asia, a 19-year conflict that left 65,000 dead, 1.5 million displaced and 12,000 "disappeared," the latter figure second only to the number of missing people in Iraq, Cotler said.

This "untold human catastrophe" was brought to an end by a process similar to the one adopted by Israelis and Palestinians at Oslo, but with one important difference, Cotler said.

While the Palestinian Authority (PA) reaped the benefits of the peace agreement without being compelled to do anything substantial in return, the Sri Lankan approach was based on reciprocity, he said.

In Sri Lanka, "you had a situation with express undertakings organized around reciprocal obligations with a timeline." So when the Tamil Tigers renounced terrorism and said they would not seek an independent state, the government of Sri Lanka "un-banned it" and released prisoners, Cotler said.

Fulfillment of those terms led to a next set of commitments, and in that way the peace process progressed with both sides making concessions.

Under Oslo, "the exact opposite occurred." The PA, he said, never complied with its commitment to cease and desist fomenting hatred of Jews. "Not only was this obligation honoured in the breach, but the culture of hatred intensified," Cotler said.

Palestinians also violated the terms of Oslo by ignoring Israeli requests to extradite terrorism suspects and by refusing to bring them to justice within PA jurisdiction. Meanwhile, the limited police force contemplated by Oslo took "a quantum leap in numbers and a veritable army was created," Cotler said.

"Not only was there a pattern of institutionalized breaches by one side, but on the Israeli side, regrettably, they didn't take these breaches seriously enough."

Israelis, he continued, "were psychologically and politically invested in the peace and so they engaged in wilful blindness to these violations."

Cotler commended former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu for demanding Palestinian compliance with the terms of Oslo before making concessions. Commenting on the proposal by newly-crowned Labour leader Amram Mitzna to unilaterally dismantle Gaza settlements, Cotler said "I think that approach will not work, because it will end up rewarding terror."

On a related issue, Cotler said the newly-constituted organization, "Justice for Jews from Arab Countries," is more than "a crie de coeur of survivors. It dovetails with the emerging norms of international humanitarian law."

In an address to a meeting of the organization last week, Cotler said 900,000 Jews were expelled from Arab lands in the postwar period in an early example of "ethnic cleansing."

This "forgotten exodus" is absent from the "Mideast narrative, from which it has been utterly expunged," similar to the assault on Jewish memory undertaken by revisionists who deny the Holocaust, he said.

Cotler said a satisfactory resolution of the claims of Jewish refugees must be "part of the reconciliation process" between Arabs and Jews, along the lines of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission in post-apartheid South Africa.

"As long as the Arab ethnic cleansing of Jews is replaced with the myth of Jews creating Arab refugees," there can be no peace or reconciliation, he said.

Last week, Cotler rose in the House of Commons to memorialize former Israeli foreign minister and UN ambassador Abba Eban as "one of the greatest statesmen and diplomats of the 20th century."

Cotler characterized Eban as "a distinguished academic, a prolific scholar, the unparalleled chronicler of his people and his country and of civilization itself."

Eban had emerged not only as the voice of Israel "resonating with its unique combination of Churchillian rhetoric and Shakespearian literacy...[but as] the voice of humanity, and his entire being was suffused with the commitment to peace between Jews, Arabs and Palestinians," Cotler stated.

Prof says peace requires territorial concessions

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Being stronger than its Palestinian adversary, Israel must take the initiative to end its conflict with the Palestinians, says an Israeli academic.

In a recent talk sponsored by Canadian Friends of Peace Now, Emanuel Adler suggested that Israel needs peace to perpetuate "the Zionist dream."

But to achieve peace, the Hebrew University political scientist said, Israel should be prepared to withdraw from most of the West Bank and Gaza and give up the bulk of the settlements there.

In exchange, the Palestinians must accept Israel's existence unconditionally and drop their demand for the right of Palestinian refugees to return to their former homes in what is now Israel.

An agreement must be guaranteed by the United Nations and the United States, noted Adler, a visiting professor at the University of Toronto who holds the Andrea and Charles Bronfman Chair in Israeli Studies.

Speaking at Temple Emanu-El, Adler explained that a withdrawal from the West Bank and the Gaza is essential if Israel is to preserve its identity as a Jewish and democratic state.

The demographic imperative – the prospect that there will soon be more Arabs than Jews in the area encompassing Israel and the territories – makes it crucial for Israel to pull out, he warned.

To maintain peace within its borders, he added, Israel must reform itself.

Israel should provide Israeli Arabs with full rights and accept them as equal partners. And, as much as possible, Israel should separate religion from state.

"This is not a call for a post-Zionist state," he said. "I still believe in a reformed Jewish state."

Adler said there is no chance for genuine peace unless Israel changes itself internally.

He urged Israel's prime minister, Ariel Sharon, to embrace "a historic compromise" within the parameters of a two-state solution. But he expressed doubt whether Sharon is capable of moving in this direction.

Sharon's idea of "painful compromise," he noted, is a bantustan-like Palestinian state broken into bits of land.

Three quarters of Israelis are ready to relinquish the territories and the settlements under a viable agreement with the Palestinians, Adler said.

However, most Israelis do not believe Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat is a reliable partner. This perception accounts for Sharon's popularity with the electorate, Adler said.

Israel and the Palestinians came close to resolving their differences at the Taba talks in 2000. But with Sharon's election as prime minister, the talks ended.

Adler cited a litany of reasons for the failure of the Oslo peace process:

- The Palestinian Authority did not control terrorism and Israel continued to enlarge settlements beyond the Green Line.
- Benjamin Netanyahu did everything possible as prime minister to sabotage Oslo, while his successor, Ehud Barak, did not live up to the obligation of carrying out a third withdrawal from the West Bank.
- The Palestinians insisted on the right of return.
- The United States did not engage in forceful diplomacy.
- Former Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin's assassination ruined the spirit of Oslo, and Israel's continuing occupation, with its web of humiliating checkpoints, had a devastating effect on ordinary Palestinians.
- Oslo's incremental character enabled extremists on both sides to derail the process, while deep political divisions within Israeli and Palestinian societies crippled it.
- The Palestinians, taking their cue from Israel's haphazard withdrawal from southern Lebanon in May 2000, mistakenly concluded they could drive Israel out of the territories by force.

On the basis of Palestinian and Israeli attitudes, Adler said, peace may be hard to achieve.

Palestinians view Israeli Jews as colonizers in their land and believe time is on their side, he said, while Palestinian terrorism induces a belief among Israelis that a compromise is impossible.

And both sides, he lamented, demonize each other.

Lecture series to honour Rosenzweig

David Rosenzweig, who was murdered last July, will be honoured by a yearlong lecture series called The David Rosenzweig Learning Legacy.

Rabbi Mendel Kaplan, senior rabbi and spiritual leader of Chabad@Flamingo, will deliver the lectures, which are intended to highlight Rosenzweig's unique characteristics. The project will be launched at Chabad@Flamingo, 8001 Bathurst St. in Thornhill, on Dec. 3, at 7:30 p.m. It will be preceded by an outdoor menorah lighting ceremony. A reception with light refreshments will follow the lecture.

A media release said the series will centre on "the themes of morality, decency and spirituality that were all so outstandingly embodied by David."

The first lecture will be titled Ethics, Morality and Religion. Other topics will include treating others with respect, recognizing God's presence in nature, learning to be non-judgemental, creating harmony in the home and parenting.

The David Rosenzweig Learning Legacy will be conducted under the auspices of the synagogue's Robinson Family Institute of Jewish Learning.

For information, call Chabad@Flamingo, 905-763-4040.

Canada condemns Egypt's 'Protocols' TV show

There have been international appeals to keep the series off the airwaves, including criticism from the U.S. State Department, which called it "racist and untrue." Last week, 46 members of the U.S. Congress wrote to Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak urging him to take the series off the air.

One of them, Jerrold Nadler, a Jewish Democrat who represents a New York district in the House of Representatives, circulated a letter proposing all U.S. military aid to Egypt be cut off because of the series.

Although there have been a number of voices in the Arab world that have condemned the series, including an Egyptian human rights group, they have been drowned out by the 22 networks airing the program, including Abu Dhabi TV, Hezbollah's al-Manar TV, and Yemen TV, among others.

An Internet petition protesting the series to Egypt's foreign and information ministers, spearheaded by the Simon Wiesenthal Center, has yielded more than 20,000 signatures.

In this country, Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) has written Foreign Affairs Minister Bill Graham, calling on him to protest the broadcast to his Egyptian counterpart.

For its part, Egypt is denying the series is anti-Semitic.

The CJN's requests for comment from Egypt's ambassador to Canada, Sallama Mahmoud Shaker, were referred to the embassy's press office, which relayed a statement issued by the government. The statement contends the series "does not contain in its dramatization nor its discourse what could be taken for as a 'call for anti-Semitism.' "

The statement says Egypt's "media policy ensures equal respect for all religions and beliefs. It also does not allow for any dramatic work or program to contain innuendos aimed at religious institutions.

"We would like to note that stirring up an allegation of 'anti-Semitism' at this time of crisis is an old tactic and since the allegations have not been proved truthful, we think there is a hidden agenda," the statement reads.

"In regards to the allegations that 'anti-Semitism' is growing within the Egyptian society, we would like to clarify that there is a big difference between anger towards Israeli politics and 'anti-Semitism.' "

The series has passed through a "rigorous censorship governmental committee," the statement says, adding, "it is our position that certain Zionist circles have created this propaganda to [divert] attention away from the Israeli occupation of the Palestinian territories and its daily consequences on the Palestinian people's freedom and right to practice their religious rituals and to earn a living."

The series purports to portray the history of the Middle East from 1855 to 1917. It tells the story of an Egyptian man who leads the struggle against the British colonizers until he finds a book written in Russian that turns out to be the Protocols of the Elders of Zion.

The Protocols, which purports to depict Jewish leaders plotting world dominion, has long been recognized as a hoax concocted by the czarist secret police and used in early 20th-century Russia, and later in Nazi Germany, as a pretext for persecution of Jews. It has been a pillar of anti-Semitic hatred for about a century, and, according to many scholars, appears to be gaining a new foothold in the Arab world.

Israel and Jewish groups in several countries say the show, which was approved by Egypt's information ministry, breaches the 1979 Israel-Egyptian peace accord, which calls on both sides to prevent incitement against each other.

In the growing war of words, an Egyptian government newspaper told Israel last week to stop the "series of massacres" of the Palestinians before criticizing the program.

The Egyptian press office's statement said the nation's "media policy respects the right to freedom of expression, that being a human right. Denying individuals this right would not be synonymous with the democracy that the Egyptian society has proved to follow and that allows this society to respect the cultural practices of others as well as their religious and sacred beliefs."

Part of living history

As these words were written, shivah for the victims of the latest atrocity committed against the people of Israel had not yet concluded. Indeed, this most recent seven days of mourning had overlapped with an earlier one. Kaddish for the 11 people murdered on a Jerusalem bus last week mingled with the kaddish for the 12 people killed in Hebron the week before.

Israel's security forces prevent most of the terrorist attempts on the lives of Israelis. But, alas, they cannot prevent them all. There seems to be no shortage of young, hapless Palestinians in the long queue of murdering "martyrs" whom the craven Palestinian leaders recruit and keep in their files.

It does not seem to concern the Palestinians that the more they attempt to perpetrate their terror, the farther away they distance the creation of a Palestinian state. They are willing to wait, their leaders say. For in truth, the establishment of a Palestinian state is subordinate in priority for them to the elimination of the Jewish state and the killing of Jews. The leaders of Hamas, Islamic Jihad, Hezbollah and their sponsors openly say so. The leaders of the Palestinian Authority prevaricate. But their actions place the matter no less in doubt.

Last week, Ha'aretz reported that the Israel Defence Forces had seized secret documents showing "the PA's Preventive Security Organization in the Gaza Strip has set up a factory for producing large quantities of nitric acid, the most important chemical in making explosives." These explosives are distributed by the Preventive Security Organization to all armed Palestinian camps, including Hamas. Needless to say, acquiring or producing such explosives is strictly forbidden under the Oslo accords.

It is this inversion of priorities by the Palestinian leaders and the disregard of all humane and humanistic values that will doom their enterprise and bring them to ruin. The imperative of life, in this case, Jewish life, is a stronger force by far, than the obsession to destroy. That is Jewish history's key and everlasting message. And it is a message we bring to the fore especially now on the eve of Chanukah.

It is the melancholy and yet great might of Jewish fate that once again, we are able to prepare – indeed we must prepare – to celebrate our holiday, even in the midst of our mourning.

Israel will mourn its dead. But it will also light the candles. We will show the world; we will show our enemies; most importantly, we will show our children that we are the mysterious, impenetrable blue of the inner flame of the hot orange and red of the fire at the very heart of the Chanukah candles. We are part of living history.

We thank God "for the miracles, for the rescue, for the heroism, for the victories, for the wonders, for the consolation, and for the battles He waged for our ancestors in ancient times and in our own as well." We also thank God "for granting us life, for sustaining us and for bringing us to this day" to be able to say to ourselves and to our children that the mysterious, impenetrable blue of the inner flame of the Chanukah candle will never be extinguished.

Asper's assertions correct

One example that supports Izzy Asper's assertion about biased media comes from a CTV News report posted on CTV News' Web site (dated Nov. 15). The news item reports on Concordia's effort to obtain a court injunction to prevent the one-sided anti-Israel "forum." The item refers to the demonstrations opposing the visit by Benjamin Netanyahu in September.

The CTV report stated: "The school imposed a moratorium on public events related to the Middle East in September, after competing Palestinian and Israeli groups staged violent protests, forcing the cancellation of a speech by former Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu."

So, according to CTV News, Jewish Montrealers staged violent protests. CTV News is so biased against pro-Israeli advocacy that it resorts to pure fabrication of the facts. The facts are that it was the pro-Palestinian side that undertook violence against Jewish Montrealers.

Christians support Israel too

I would like to add a P.S. to the article "Arab American journalist," by Paul Lungen (CJN, Oct. 31). At the end of the gathering at the Shaarei Shomayim synagogue in Toronto, a young woman next to my seat stood up and blew a shofar for quite a long time. When I approached and complimented her on being able to do so, she replied that she is a Christian and that she loves Israel, having been there many times. There were many other Christians at the meeting as well.

Questions Rector Lowy

I do not accept the comments of Frederick Lowy in "Rector asks Jews not to abandon Montreal's Concordia University" (CJN, Oct. 10), that the alleged "mini-riot" in Sept. 9 was entirely attributable to unruly non-students and the Muslim immigrant population.

Past and current riots against Jews and the State of Israel, as reported in the press and viewed in television, are artfully devised and supported by Arab and Muslim groups. These groups operate in every part of the world as benevolent organizations with a hidden predisposition for evil purposes.

From time immemorial, Jews have been mistreated and hated. They have been robbed of their birthrights, they have been expelled, they have been restricted and they have been confined. They have been killed and blamed for the atrocities and damage caused by others. They have been demonized for their entrepreneurial acumen and insight into practical affairs.

Their achievements and triumphs in arts and design, medicine and medical sciences, literature, music, entertainment and philanthropy have been ignored and obviously not appreciated by the vast majority of the world's inhabitants.

It is ironic that Jews apologize endlessly for the chaos created by others. We turn the other cheek repeatedly to avoid physical contact and unnecessary heated arguments.

Now is the time to say "no" and "no more" to the rector. The endless dialogues and conferences carried out between Arabs and Jews over the years and across Canada have always met with disdain, lies and curses and more often with greater calamities. Now is the time to paraphrase "never again" in letters, books or compositions, invitations and everywhere.

We should make our views widely known to those who do not like us and we should not ask for their affection.

Banning Hate in Canada

In the Nov. 14 edition, The CJN reiterated its call to ban Hezbollah, the infamous Lebanese terrorist organization. I strongly believe in this cause and I am writing to express my support for this important action.

I believe that Hezbollah's ability to conduct fundraising activities in Canada for its social wing is a gaping hole in our country's ban on terrorist organizations, and I believe that we should ban all its fundraising in Canada, preventing this network from operating in Canada altogether. I have already made my views on this important topic known to the government and I will continue to press this cause.

Weinfeld's Republican omissions

Morton Weinfeld's Nov. 7 column, "Jews, U.S. politics and the left," praises Paul Wellstone, the late Democratic senator as a rarity – a Jew elected in a non-Jewish state like Minnesota.

Weinfeld claims that Wellstone's success signals that "Jews continue to resist the neo-conservative political agenda." But Wellstone's predecessor, Rudy Boschwitz was Jewish, as is his successor, Norm Coleman. Did Weinfeld omit these key facts because Boschwitz and Coleman are Republicans?

Eban - our brilliant man of reason

By HANAN BAR-ON

It is not easy for those who remember Israel's earliest years to realize that Abba Eban is not with us any more.

How difficult to imagine that nearly the last of those few who were not only "present at the creation" but part of the creation is dead.

During the 1950s, Eban, as befitting the fledgling state and the tender age of many of its leaders, was the youngest ambassador in Washington and the youngest permanent representative to the United Nations. He was, throughout much of the world, the embodiment of the young emerging and fascinating state. He was the country's resounding "Voice," considered by so many to have been, together with Britain's Gladwyn Jebb, not only the best orator at the United Nations but also frequently the most interesting one. The passionate but cultured "Voice of Israel."

Few recall today that during those years, many throughout the world, West and East, believed Israel might be a passing phenomenon.

It took more than the prowess of Israel's armed forces to persuade the world and its powers that the new state was a factor in the Middle East that had to be taken permanently into account.

More often than not, Israel's case was made in Abba Eban's words, words steeped in Jewish history, underpinning the political arguments that needed to be made, whether in New York City at the United Nations, in Washington, D.C., or throughout the United States. His speeches sometimes seemed to render the existence of Israel credible to a world in which reborn Jewish independence was not accepted without question.

Eban will be remembered as Israel's superbly brilliant ambassador to the United States during the Eisenhower administration. He will live in the nation's annals as Israel's foreign minister, a giant on the world stage, during some of its most turbulent and most historic years. He also served as president of the Weizmann Institute and the originator of the Rehovot Conferences that were such an important element in Israel's relations with Africa, Asia and Latin America.

But, perhaps more than anything else, he was one of the country's major voices of reason. Because of his profound understanding of Jewish history, he knew that a measure of humility is one of the hallmarks of statesmanship. He also knew that the setting of an achievable political goal must be the beginning of any action, even if the action must, of necessity, include the use of military force.

When Eban, as foreign minister, negotiated with world leaders in three key Western capitals during the days preceding the Six Day War, his skills, culture and experience were probably taxed to the utmost in what were some of the most crucial diplomatic conversations he had conducted since the days surrounding the establishment of the state. The history of these discussions is well known, but it might be worth recalling what he said to Charles de Gaulle: "Israel without honour is not Israel. Our nation faces a stern choice."

There is no doubt that an important part of his approach to diplomacy is anchored in those few words. On one hand it is a very down-to-earth observation, that there are stern choices that have to be discussed. But, on the other hand, these must be recognized, too, and dealt with from the perspective of the moral questions involved. The choice of a word like "honour" was very much designed for a personality like De Gaulle, for whom the honour of France was a leitmotif.

Eban will be missed and not only by those who knew him and of him. His voice of reason, his passion for his country and people – and therefore for peace, to be achieved by a tolerable compromise with our neighbours – will continue to resound among those who choose to deepen their understanding of his legacy.

On a personal level, all who did know him are poorer for the fact that his humour, culture, his belief in manners and his friendship will not be with us any more.

Hanan Bar-On is a retired senior Israeli diplomat.

Eban quotes

On Israel in the Middle East

"Israel learned in 1967 that its physical survival depended on its organic relationship to the science, technology, social cohesion and democratic ethic which marked it off from its neighbours. The very qualities which it did not share with them were those which enabled it to withstand their assault. Israel would be part of the Mediterranean world and of the Jewish spirit rather than of the Arabian hinterland... Israel's roots and geographical environment are older and just as authentically Middle Eastern as are those of the Arab... Israel will be itself and utterly specific. It responds to the natural diversity and not to the spurious homogeneity of the Middle Eastern world. The question is whether the region can recapture its higher moments, when Judaism, Christianity, Islam, Hellenism, and Roman civilization were all considered as part of its accumulated legacy. For it to be Middle Eastern does not involve being Arab or Moslem. It is not an offense against the Middle Eastern tradition for a non-Arab and non-Moslem sovereignty to live and flourish in the original home of Hebrew memory and thought. The question is not whether Israel will change its special nature, but whether the Arabs will come to terms with Israel as it is."

On Jewish Destiny

"In the larger context of its peoplehood, twentieth-century Jewry faces the same dilemma as in its early dawn. The tension is between the universal and the particular, between matter and spirit, between quantity and quality. The influence of Judaism on the life and thought of mankind bears no relation to the number of its adherents or to their achievements in any domain of temporal power. Its vocation has rather been to preserve and develop an intense vitality of spirit. Religion, philosophy, literature, science, political systems, and moral ideas have all been profoundly agitated by the currents of the Jewish mind."

Memories of World War II

November is a month when memories are brought into sharper relief for many people in our community. Holocaust Education Week combines with Remembrance Day and many of us are transported back in time to a period that now has a permanent hold on our memories and our hearts. As November fades into December, I, too, share some memories.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

In 1939, I was living in Cincinnati, attending rabbinical school, but I could not join the U.S. armed forces as a chaplain because I was still stateless – bereft of German citizenship, but not yet an American citizen.

Finally, on March 30, 1942, I became a U.S. citizen, and the next day, I joined the army and became a chaplain. I was privileged to participate in the conquest of Nazi Germany and was among the first soldiers to meet our Russian allies across the Elbe River.

In the spring of 1945, we were quartered outside of Berlin, when the news reached us that Adolf Hitler had committed suicide. A few days later, World War II was over.

At this time of year, I remember with gratitude that I and so many others were privileged to survive the armed conflict and enjoy life.

Yet, sadly, it often seems that few people are aware of the abiding significance of World War II. After all, it ended 57 years ago and is remembered by only a relatively small number of Canadians and Americans. For most, it has become part of ancient history, which, as any teacher will tell you, is not a favourite subject for today's students. Our kids grow up with a truncated vision of the past. Many feel it is something they no longer need to know.

Winston Churchill said a nation that forgets its past is doomed to repeat it, and it might be of some interest to younger news watchers to find out how veterans view their war experience. We will recall a lot of suffering and only a little joy. What we prize today is the abiding comradeship that still binds us in some cases. I myself have a staccato correspondence with only one World War II buddy, who lives in Jerusalem.

Of course, with the passage of time, we veterans are no longer as emotionally tied to our war experience and our emotions flatten out. But for me and the rest of my fellowship, there is still meaning in the remembrance. In addition, as a Jew raised to see memory as an important part of life, I have a special reason to appreciate its value.

So I send my greetings to former comrades-in-arms, and to all my readers a reminder that the past must be remembered and incorporated into our consciousness.

Speed dating in the shadow of the Rockies

Recently I endured a long and painful break-up with my boyfriend of 4½ years.

Although it finally meant the end to a string of infidelities on his part, coupled with more dishonesty than anyone should ever endure, it took me a while to get over the slump. As one day followed another and the world stubbornly refused to stop functioning just because I was down in the dumps, the ache grudgingly began to subside.

Barbara Balfour in Calgary

So when I hit the final stage of the grieving period for this relationship, I timidly began my foray into the outside world. I set off in pursuit of something I have never had but my mother has always wanted for me: a nice Jewish boy.

I have never dated anyone Jewish before. This is partly because I had limited exposure to the Jewish world while growing up. When I finally did get more involved in Calgary's tiny Jewish community in university, I never came across anyone who seemed right for me.

And partly it was because I had never placed a whole lot of importance on dating – especially marrying someone – of the same race or ethnic background. In fact, I felt such an attitude was dangerous in today's world, as it reeked of ethnocentrism, maybe even racism. I always felt that you fell in love with the inner person and everything else was just circumstance.

Save from the occasional grandmother crossing my path, I never fell into the hands of the anxious matchmakers so prevalent in every Jewish community.

But I thought that perhaps I could take life into my own hands and finally find someone who understood me. I don't think it's a coincidence that my best friends in high school and university have always been either immigrants or the children of immigrants. We were all driven by the same ethic: a basic principle that hard work means success.

Since many Jewish young adults I've met fit the bill in terms of being either immigrants or first-generation Canadians, and therefore might share some of my core values, I thought I could give dating Jews a try.

So I looked in the phone book and called up "Six Minute Dates," an agency that had advertised a speed-dating event for members of the Jewish community.

Apparently, a rabbi who wanted to avoid intermarriage among young Jewish adults came up with the idea for speed dating. This particular agency offers events in which adults in certain age groups get together in a coffee shop for a series of quick, painless six-minute dates.

At the end of each event, the men and women tick off who they were interested in on a sheet, and if there was a "match," the agency would release their e-mail addresses to one another.

Unfortunately, because the Jewish community in Calgary is so tiny and there are so few Jews my age who openly identify themselves as Jewish and actually want to date each other, the event for Jews was cancelled due to lack of interest.

But I decided to attend a similar event for non-Jews. What did I have to lose? On my way to the coffee shop downtown where the event was being held for singles aged 21 to 31, I heard my heels clip-clopping on the sidewalk, a sound that seemed to echo my self-doubt.

What if no one ticked my name off? What if the guys were all weird? Did I look okay? What if we ran out of things to talk about?

In the end, it wasn't that bad. It turned out that six minutes was just the right amount of time to talk to a stranger, though I came away feeling exhausted after talking to 10 in one hour.

I didn't really find anyone that day, and don't expect to for a while, but I have discovered that the whole process is less about reaching the destination than it is about making the journey.

And it appears that for me, the journey is just beginning.

Defending anti-Semitism?

Unfortunately, Chanukah time coincides with exam time. So instead of looking forward to latkes and dreidels, I find myself consumed with essay writing, theory, and the unique stress that only university life can provide.

Joanna Grossman in Halifax

For the past week, I have been wholly, utterly and completely engrossed in one paper. Every time I sit down to write it, I find myself thinking about another source that I want to read. The paper is on Wagner and the anti-Semitic implications of The Ring Cycle, his four-opera masterpiece.

Throughout the semester, I have listened to the 16 hours of opera, studying both music and text, considering its historical, political and philosophical connections. As the semester comes to a close, I am caught trying to find a decisive answer to one question: Can the beauty of this work be truly appreciated, considering the great evil it inspired?

The history of the West is one in which anti-Semitism has been an ever-present reality. The greatest of minds, from Voltaire to Kant to Heidegger, all espoused the most abhorrent hatred of the Jews. Their blatant irrationality in this one area, however, cannot de-legitimize the greatness of their intellectual successes.

Interestingly though, it is Wagner, and Wagner alone, whom Hitler saw as the precursor to his Nazi revolution.

And so, this one paper has my mind spiralling, because, of course, nothing is ever so simply contained in the form of one solitary question. Thinking about my paper has elucidated a far greater concern: As Jews trying to make our way in the secular world, how far must we go to achieve a sense of equality and belonging without relinquishing all that makes us distinct?

Wagner wrote at a time when the Jews of Europe were just beginning to flourish in secular society. Many of his greatest supporters were themselves assimilated Jews. Today, we find ourselves in a far different situation. We are no longer engaged in a struggle to be recognized and we don't face the same virulent hatred that was a reality just a generation ago. As a result, we don't see our Jewish identities threatened. We feel secure in our secular lives.

Listening to Wagner is hardly an issue of grave concern, for he is a musical genius. But if we look even further back into history, as Chanukah time encourages, we can see the danger of assimilation, as the Maccabees fought to retain a life that was distinctly Jewish. The question we must ask ourselves is where does that fight begin for us today?

As Jews, do we have a responsibility to ensure that the virulent anti-Semitism of Wagner's music does not meet with standing ovations in our nation's concert halls or should we continue to bask in the anonymity that secular life provides us, whatever the consequences may be?

I have to say that the very fact this paper drove my mind from Wagner to the Maccabees provides me with my answer. While it is so easy for us to distinguish our secular lives from our lives as Jews, we may be risking something we haven't even considered. The reality is that we cannot lead two separate lives. How can one turn Wagner off Friday afternoon and then walk to synagogue to celebrate Shabbat? We live as Jews, and we cannot draw the line on any given day, or at any time of year.

We have the ability to seek the Jewish answers to the most secular of questions. We can strive to be the most influential members of society without masking an inherent part of our dignity. In order to do so, we have to come to understand that the mass answer, the secular answer, doesn't have to be right.

So often we think we know what we should say, and we manipulate what we do say in order to meld to those expectations. However, with each contortion, with every little bend, we relinquish a little piece of who we are as Jewish individuals.

We don't even consider it, or stop to think, but in trying to be accepted by what we are not, we can so easily lose touch with who we are.

The Kirshner File

The odyssey of Sylwia Szymanska

Until 1996, Sylwia Szymanska had never met a Jewish person, and her knowledge of Jews, being extremely skimpy, was coloured by a tangle of myths. Since then, she has made amazing amends.

Born and bred in Poland, she is a 26-year-old Catholic who, like some Poles, harboured anti-Semitic stereotypes, passed inexorably from one generation to the next.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

As an example, she bought into the calumny that Jews had formed an international conspiracy to take over and dominate the world. This myth was popularized by a notorious 19th century tract, Protocols of the Elders of Zion, which was exposed as a forgery in the 1920s.

When Szymanska, petite and soft-spoken, reminds herself of this phase of her life, an aura of embarrassment wreathes her sunny face. "Poles know very little about Jews," she said, acutely aware that Poland once had a Jewish population that exceeded three million. "And anti-Semitism is quite common. We repeat what we hear."

Szymanska, who considers herself a philo-Semite today, drastically revamped her skewed views when she began studying Polish history at Warsaw University in 1995. It was then that she learned that Poles and Jews had coexisted for a millennium and that Jews had made stellar contributions to Polish society. As far as she can tell, no Jewish blood runs in her veins.

As she delved deeper, reading the posthumous diary of Calel Perechodnik, a Jew who had been conscripted into Otwock's German-appointed ghetto police force, she reached a fateful decision. She would write her MA thesis on the Jews in Otwock during the Nazi occupation.

But in order to do the required research, under the supervision of her academic advisor Jerzy Tomaszewski, she would have to master Yiddish. This she proceeded to do with zest. "To me, Yiddish was like Latin," she said, smiling sweetly.

While gathering data in the Jewish Historical Institute in Warsaw, Szymanska encountered a Jewish librarian named Adam Bielecki, the first Jew to make her acquaintance. Subsequently, she improved her Yiddish – first at the Centre for Judaic Studies at Vilnius University in Lithuania and successively at the Oxford Institute for Yiddish Studies in Britain, the Jewish Historical Institute in Warsaw and the Uriel Weinreich Program in Yiddish Language, Literature and Culture at Columbia University in New York.

When she enrolled at Columbia University's summer course, she had already begun teaching Yiddish at Warsaw University and working at the Institute of National Remembrance–Commission for the Prosecution of Crimes Against the Polish Nation. It is a government body charged with two overlapping tasks: to preserve documentation about the Nazi and Communist eras and to investigate crimes committed during those totalitarian periods.

Little could she have known that the Columbia University interregnum would alter her life in ways she could never have foreseen. While immersing herself in the intricacies of Yiddish, she fell in love with a fellow student, Mitch Smolkin, the artistic director of the Toronto-based Ashkenaz Festival for New Yiddish Culture, which finished its latest run on Labour Day. During Ashkenaz, she delivered a lecture on the state of Yiddish in contemporary Poland.

On Aug. 30, the day Ashkenaz opened, she and Smolkin went down the path of ecumenical matrimony, getting married in a civil ceremony in Toronto. On Sept. 21, the couple were wed in a church in Warsaw, and in December, they intend to consecrate their vows in a Toronto synagogue.

Since this flurry of events, Szymanska has left her position as an education official at the institute and applied for Canadian citizenship. She plans to live in Toronto and hopes to complete her PhD at the University of Toronto as she deepens her grasp of Yiddish. "I want to perfect my Yiddish so I can speak with a proper Polish dialect."

She was born in Jozefow, a town near Warsaw. Her parents, Andrzej and Anna, were workers until they retired. Szymanska's older sister is a seamstress.

Prior to the Holocaust, Jozefow's Jewish population hovered around the 100 mark. "Today about 20 Jews, including an Israeli doctor, live there," she said.

Although Szymanska was raised in what passes for a tolerant home, she adopted anti-Semitic stereotypes during her adolescence – one of which, a perennial favourite of Polish reactionaries, claims that all Jews are Communists.

In her estimation, such crass stereotypes are largely rejected by Poland's new generation, who, she observed, are increasingly interested in its Jewish and German minorities.

When she told her father about her interest in Jews, he was none too overjoyed. "He thought it would bring me problems. But now he's pleased, because he knows it makes me happy."

Szymanska wrote her MA thesis at The Mordechai Anielewicz Center for the Study and Teaching of the History and Culture of the Jews in Poland, at Warsaw University.

She was drawn to the subject, the Jews of Otwock, after reading Perechodnik's book, Am I A Murderer? published in translation by Westview Press in 1996. Perechodnik entrusted his diary to a Polish friend in 1944, before he was rounded up and murdered by the Nazis.

Otwock, a health resort popular among pre-war Jews, was populated by 14,200 Jews when the German army occupied the town in 1939. The Germans set up a ghetto in 1941, and then proceeded to deport Jews to the Treblinka death camp and the Karczew labour camp. By 1942, the ghetto and Karczew had been liquidated. Seven hundred Jews who had found shelter in the adjacent forests were caught and killed.

Sylwia Szymanska

In August, Otwock marked the 60th anniversary of the final deportations in a special commemoration. Szymanska and a few colleagues founded the committee that sponsored the ceremony.

Currently, she is hard at work finishing a research paper she started in Poland. The topic turns on an anti-Semitic massacre that took place in the northern Polish town of Jedwabne in 1941.

The notorious incident, which triggered a national furor in Poland two years ago, was the subject of Jan Tomasz Gross' book, Neighbors, published by Princeton University Press in 2001. In dry, clinical prose, Gross chronicled the cold-blooded murder of some 1,600 Jews at the hands of the town's Polish inhabitants.

Accurately described as "an act of genocide" by the current president of Poland, Aleksander Kwasniewski, until recently the planning of the pogrom had been blamed on the Gestapo.

In a trial in 1949, a dozen of the Polish perpetrators were handed prison sentences ranging from eight to 15 years.

Last summer, the Polish government erected a monument in honour of Jedwabne's Jewish victims. But, as Szymanska noted, the carnage in Jedwabne was not unique. Similar pogroms unfolded in Wasosz and Radzilow.

Since these disclosures of pogroms on Polish soil, Szymanska has read Polish documents pertaining to the 1941 massacres and translated them into Yiddish. She hopes to publish a monograph.

Szymanska wants to write her PhD dissertation on the attitude of the wartime Polish police toward Jews. "In most cases, the police were hostile to Jews and often betrayed them to the Germans. But some helped, even hiding Jews."

Generally speaking, though, ordinary Poles were indifferent to the fate of Jews during the Holocaust. "Some thought that Hitler was solving the 'Jewish question' in Poland."

As for modern Polish-Jewish relations, Szymanska believes they are problematic, better abroad than in Poland itself.

A new restitution law, enacted by the Polish government to enable Jews to reclaim stolen or expropriated property, has aggravated underlying tensions.

Szymanska believes that John Paul II, the first Polish pope, has tried to smooth over the troubled relationship between Poles and Jews. But in her opinion, his sentiments are not necessarily shared by Poles at the grassroots level."Maybe it's because they grew up with the belief that there can't be peace between Poles and Jews."

Not content to rest on her laurels, Szymanska has embarked on a quest to find permanent quarters for the Centre for Yiddish Culture in Warsaw, the only institution of its kind in Poland. The objective of the centre, established by the Shalom Foundation – a Polish American Foundation – is to disseminate knowledge of Jewish history and culture to Poles.

It is a daunting task, given the burdens of the past, but Szymanska, who has come a long way in the past six years, has every intention of seeing it through.

How Do We Meet Your Child's Needs?
Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto
"As the day school for the community, we strive to accommodate each child," says Educational Director Rabbi Abraham Soffer. To do this, we use a vast array of tools, including early identification, ongoing tracking, and speech and occupational therapy screening. A resource teacher works with children who need extra help; a special talents coordinator works with children who need more challenge; and other specialists work with teachers. Excellence in education means meeting the educational, emotional and social needs of the child. "We evaluate and enhance our programme on a regular basis to continue to meet this challenge," adds Soffer.

ALEGRIA! celebrates Spain: then and now

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

At the beginning of the last millennium, Spain was a social, cultural and religious centre in a world that hadn't yet distinguished between Sephardi and Ashkenazi Jews.

Over the next few hundred years, Jewish scholars, artists and financiers spread their Spanish heritage as they made their homes around the world.

In Egypt, Rabbi Moses ben Maimon (Maimonides) became one of the most renowned Jewish philosophers ever to live and the Portuguese widow, Dona Gracia Nasi, established herself as one of the most powerful female European merchants of her time.

This culture is being recalled on Dec. 3, when the State of Israel Bonds Women's Division and the Sephardic Kehila Centre's women's auxiliary present ALEGRIA! – a women's-only event in celebration of Judeo-Spanish roots.

"The evening will focus on the Golden Age of Spain before the Jewish expulsion [in 1492] when Jewish rabbis, writers, musicians and artists were establishing a unique blend of traditions," State of Israel bonds spokesperson Raquel Benzacar-Savatti said.

> 'The art of that time and place'

After that, Spanish Jews dispersed into different countries and took their cultural backgrounds with them as they integrated into new homes.

"We want this evening to focus on their common Spanish heritage" – on the music, the food, the art of that time and place, Benzacar-Savatti said.

It is an opportunity for women to celebrate their past and, at the same time, take responsibility for their future by investing in Israeli bonds, she said.

The event includes a dinner, a performance by The Paula Moreno Flamenco Dance Company and a lecture by guest speaker, Dominique Tomasov-Blinder.

"Dominique is an Ashkenazi woman who lives in Barcelona today and has committed herself to understanding the the Spanish Jewish community – past and present," said Vivien Sharon, co-chair of the event with Luna Igelman.

"Dominique is an inspiring speaker who will talk about being Jewish today in Catalonia," Sharon said.

In order to participate in the event, which includes sangria wine and Spanish food – a collection of tapas, such as bocorones, calentita, chorisas, paella (to name but a few) – the women must purchase a minimum Chai bond ($136), as well as pay a couvert of $36, Sharon said.

When the event took place for the first time two years ago, more than 450 Ashkenazi and Sephardi women attended and more than half a million dollars worth of bonds were sold.

The event provides women with an opportunity to learn about each other and discuss with knowledgeable people how bonds work.

"Some women had never purchased a bond before the last event," Sharon said.

Guests will also be able to take part in a silent auction as they walk through hallways that will be decorated to look like streets in a village of Cordoba, she said.

Proceeds from the auction will go to Or Haemet Sephardic School.

Benzacar-Savatti said they hope to be able to host ALEGRIA! – which means Joy in Spanish – on an annual basis and focus on different Sephardi communities – Iraq, Turkey, India – each time.

Judy & David are back for another Chanukah party

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

There will be singing, dancing, candle-lighting and lots of surprises when Juno Award-winning children's entertainers Judy & David throw their Chanukah Party 2002 at York University.

This is the second year the married singing couple – the stars of TV's Judy & David's Boom Box – have celebrated the holiday with a show.

They originally decided to create one because of the lack of holiday family entertainment geared to Chanukah. After the tremendous response to last year's shows at the Leah Posluns Theatre, the couple has moved the production to a larger venue to accommodate their ever-growing fan base.

Fun lights... special effects

"We were very pleased with the success of the show last year, so we wanted to do it this year and take it to the next level," Judy (Adelman Gershon) said.

"This show is bigger and better with a higher production value with fun lights and special effects happening. We kept some of the favourite things from last year, and our buddy Bommie the Boom Box has taken on a new look this year – he's become a little magical. And CharActor's Kids' Choir will be performing with us."

Judy & David are celebrating a decade of playing children's music together, so their young fans will be also be treated to a medley of their hits from the past 10 years, including the oft-requested My Little Yellow Bus, along with the duo's Jewish musical numbers.

"The show has our signature interactive element to it – every song gets the audience involved as always. It's also a great opportunity for us to do some of the Jewish songs that we love," Judy said.

The duo is being honoured with an award from the Society of Composers, Authors and Music Publishers of Canada (SOCAN) because their children's compositions are the most publicly performed in Canada.

For more information on Judy & David, their upcoming tour schedule, their online store and the latest on Judy & David's Chanukah Party 2002, visit their interactive Web site at www. judyanddavid.com.

The Chanukah Party show runs Nov. 30 at 1:30 p.m. and 4:30 p.m. and Dec. 1st at 10:30 a.m. and 1:30 p.m. at Burton Auditorium, York University, 4700 Keele St. Tickets are available through Ticketmaster at 416-872-1111.

A portion of the proceeds are going to Jewish day schools and synagogue charities that are selling show tickets to raise funds.

Rabin memorial service recalls years of hope

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

How would Yitzhak Rabin handle the current situation in Israel?

"I can only guess," said Eitan Haber, who headed the late Israeli prime minister's office. Speaking at a recent memorial service at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation that was sponsored jointly by almost a dozen organizations, Haber recalled asking Rabin what would happen if the peace process stewarded by the then-prime minister were to collapse and Israel were to go to war.

"In that case," Haber recalled Rabin saying, "I'll be able to look straight into the eyes of every mother in Israel who sends her son to war and say, 'At least we tried everything.'"

Haber, a former military correspondent for the Israeli daily Yediot Achronot, suspects that in light of ongoing violence and suicide bombings, Rabin would "beat them without mercy, but at the same time he would pursue peace."

Rabin was a statesman with a long-term vision for Israel, Haber said. "In his eyes peace was almost a condition for the continuance of our existence, and he was ready to pay for it a high price, but not the price of the security of Israel."

The late prime minister, a native of Jerusalem born in 1922, distinguished himself as a military leader early on, said Rachel Korazim, director of professional development programs for Jewish educators at the Jewish Agency's department of education, and MC for the evening, which included songs of peace by the Bialik Hebrew Day School choir and individual youth, as well as readings by members of some of the six youth groups – Hashomer Hatzair, Habonim Dror, Canadian Young Judaea, BBYO, Bnei Akiva and Betar Tagar – that organized the event.

Rabin served as prime minister from 1974 to 1977 and again from 1992 until he was assassinated at a 1995 Tel Aviv peace rally by a right-wing Jewish extremist.

His leadership was marked by two historic events, Korazim noted: the Oslo agreements that led to the 1993 signing of the Israeli-Palestinian Declaration of Principles in Washington, D.C., and the 1994 peace treaty between Israel and Jordan.

Rabin's assassination was a crime not only against the man, said Meir Romem, Israel's consul general in Toronto, but against the State of Israel, Israeli democracy and the Israeli soul. Romem recalled Rabin as a man of courage, careful consideration and wise judgment and lauded his contributions to Israel's defence and development.

Korazim said Rabin's funeral was moving not only because of the loss but also for the reactions of world leaders. "We cherished the eulogy by King Hussein of Jordan," she said.

Rabin made a historic decision to "trade clasping a finger to a trigger for clasping a hand for peace," said Haber, who was Rabin's closest adviser and confidant for the last 10 years of his life. He recalled how difficult it was emotionally for Rabin when his decisions resulted in loss of soldiers' lives.

Even winning the Nobel Peace Prize in 1994 did not lift Rabin's spirits when he was deciding whether Israeli forces would storm the house where kidnapped soldier Nachshon Wachsmann was being held, said Haber.

"It resembled, on a different scale, the tension before the Entebbe operation. He was gritting his teeth. His warm eyes went frozen for a moment. 'Attack them,' he said."

After Wachsmann was killed, Haber and Rabin were on their way to a press conference when Haber entered the men's washroom where Rabin was spending an unusually long time. "I'm willing to swear," said Haber, "that his eyes were soaking wet."

The years in which Rabin pursued peace were the best years for the State of Israel, said Haber, citing economic growth, a 50 per cent reduction in unemployment, visits by 80 world leaders and new investment by 200 international companies.

"The journey to peace was ended by three shots," he said. "We are left only with a small legacy: to dream of peace and to pursue it, and to protect democracy, without which we have no life in Israel."

Noah Brotman, Hashomer Hatzair mazkir (national youth leadership co-ordinator), asked that people "remember not only a great man but also a time when there was hope... Only when we have made lasting peace in Israel will we have truly honoured [Rabin's] memory."

Jewish Life

A look at two giants of philosophy

Wittgenstein's Poker, by David Edmonds and John Eidinow, Faber and Faber, (Paperback), 2001, $17.99.

Books
Bernard Baskin

The time was October 25, 1946, the place was a small, crowded tutorial room at Cambridge University and the combatants were two renowned philosophers, Ludwig Wittgenstein (1889-1951) and Karl Popper (1902-1994).

Popper had been invited by the prestigious Moral Science Club to address the question, "Are there philosophical problems?" Wittgenstein became so enraged by Popper's remarks that he picked up a red-hot poker from the fireplace and waved it threateningly at his opponent, who held his ground. Bertrand Russell stepped in to end the argument. Wittgenstein dropped the poker and stormed out of the room.

Using this 10-minute encounter as a point of departure, two journalists with the BBC have written an entertaining and thoughtful book about the lives, personalities, ideas and influence of two intellectual giants, the highly Jewish Vienna from which they came and their relationship to Judaism.

Both men were descendants of converted, almost totally assimilated families. Wittgenstein was extremely wealthy, while Popper came from a modest middle class background.

Sixteen of Popper's relatives from his mother's family were killed in the Holocaust. But he made it clear that he did not consider himself Jewish.

For Wittgenstein, "In western civilization the Jew is always measured on scales that do not fit him." His litany of nonsense included the characterization of Jews as dangerous foreign bodies in a nation's bloodstream. For Wittgenstein, apparently there could be no assimilation for the Jew and only danger for the host culture in an attempt by Jews to assimilate.

The Anchluss (the merger of Germany and Austria) brought Wittgenstein face to face with his Jewishness (as classified by the Nazis) and he was forced to give up much of his fortune to have his sisters declared mischlinge, or of mixed race, to save their lives.

The several chapters largely concerned with philosophy are not beyond the comprehension of the average interested reader. Wittgenstein's major contributions were in the field of linguistics. He argued that all judgments about moral and aesthetic matters cannot – ever – be meaningful uses of language. The same is true of philosophical generalizations that we make about the world as a whole. They are meaningless if they cannot be broken down into elementary sentences, "which really are pictures." The world can only be spoken about by careful description of the individual facts of which it is comprised.

In a major work, Popper attacked Plato, Hegel and Marx as false prophets. He considered democracy as the only viable possibility because it was the only from of government that embodied the scientific, trial-and-error method and allowed society to modify its politics in the light of experience, and to change government without bloodshed.

With the passage of time, Popper's reputation has dimmed. Wittgenstein's, by contrast, is unsurpassed. A poll of professional philosophers put him fifth on a list of those who had made the most important contributions to the subject, after Aristotle, Plato, Kant and Nietzsche. Say the authors: "Students pore over his texts like Talmudic scholars divining wisdom from the Torah."

This book on an unusual subject is idea-filled, informative and engaging.

Batya: Israel's one-woman search bureau

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Roots & Remembrance

He was a British soldier and she was a Jewish nurse in British-mandate Palestine: they met in Egypt about 1940. She was killed in an accident and he vowed to let her family know. But how to find them?

He knew that she had been born in Bremen, Germany, and once had sisters. After many years of searching, he provided these scanty details last year to Batya Unterschatz-Landsman, then head of the Israeli Search Bureau for Missing Persons in Jerusalem.

Using her extensive arsenal of research techniques, Batya eventually found a niece of the deceased nurse on an Israeli kibbutz. "I sent him [the ex-soldier] the message that I had found her, and at first he didn't believe me," she recounts. "He never imagined that I could do it, because he knew almost nothing about the family."

In her 30 years as director of the Search Bureau, Batya earned a reputation as a sort of Israeli Sherlock Holmes. Because of her persistence, she usually finds the person she is looking for, or a descendant if the person is deceased.

The Jewish Agency established the Search Bureau in 1945 to help reunite Jewish families torn apart by World War II. Until this year, it was still receiving an average of 300 search requests a month.

Born in Lithuania after the war, Batya immigrated to Israel in 1971 and took work in a department store. "I had been working in the tourist section, and talked to each person in his own language – Hebrew, English, German, Russian, Yiddish, Polish, and so on," she recalls. One day, a man from the Jewish Agency spotted her and offered her a job on the spot.

The Search Bureau had a staff of 17 when she started there in 1972. Within five years, she had become its head, only to witness its staff begin to shrink dramatically. Seven years ago, she gave up her last remaining assistant. Frustrated and overworked, she left last January but continues to conduct searches privately for paying clients.

She often consults old phone books and records from landsmanschaft societies, trade unions and chevrah kadishahs (burial societies). Also useful are immigration records in the Israel State Archives, and Holocaust records at Yad Vashem.

"The most important factor behind a successful search is to put your heart into what you are doing," she says. "It's a great deal more than just sitting around a desk and looking up information. You must be inventive!"

After her talk last summer at the Jewish genealogical seminar in Toronto, several people rose to praise her for finding their long-lost relatives in Israel. As one person recounted, her research had even saved someone's life by facilitating a last-minute bone-marrow transplant in the United States.

Batya says she passed by her old office one day and saw mounds of unopened mail inside the door. Her claim that the Jewish Agency had forgotten about her is corroborated by the fact that, despite several attempts, I could find no one from that organization who knew anything about the Search Bureau or could comment on it.

In these troubled times, uniting the Jewish people by reuniting the branches of its family tree is still important, isn't it? To contact Batya, e-mail her at batya1@netvision.il.

Jewish Life

Chanukiyot and the Web

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

It is one of the loveliest moments in the Jewish calendar. For eight nights, families gather to light the chanukiyah to commemorate a miracle that occurred more than two millennia ago. And though the tradition is widely observed, people have practical questions about the lighting ceremony and a deeper curiosity about meaning of the holiday. Today, some answers from the World Wide Web.

Let's start with the basics. If you get confused about which blessing to say while lighting the candles, you can read them in Hebrew and transliterated English on the TorahTots pages. And for extra help, click on the link to hear the blessing recited. [http://www.torahtots.com/holidays/chanuka/brachot.htm] For people who are confused by the right-to-left candle placement and left-to-right candle lighting tradition, you'll find clear instruction on the Being Jewish site. [http://www.beingjewish.com/yomtov/chanukah/menorah.html] And if you like, you can watch the Torah.org Online Menorah as it is updated daily during the holiday to illustrate that night's candle configuration. As the site mentions in a tongue-in-cheek fashion "Note! Rabbinic authorities agree: you CAN'T fulfill the Mitzvah by looking at a computer screen!" [http://torah.org/learning/yomtov/chanukah/] For some thought-provoking articles about menorahs, see Eliezer Segal's home page [http://www.ucalgary.ca/~elsegal/Shokel/Calendar_Index.html#Hanukkah]

If you don't have a Jewish museum in your town, you can visit some gorgeous menorahs online. Many of us may be familiar with the traditional ornate silver menorahs, such as one 19th silver menorah on display at the Adler Judaica Collection in Memphis, Tenn. [http://rj.org/uahc/congs/tn/tn002/Judaica_Exhibit/Chanukah_Menorah.html] Or take a look at the 1767 bronze Chanukiyah that former Israeli prime minister David Ben-Gurion presented to U.S. president Harry Truman as a token of esteem for the president's recognition of the State of Israel. [http://www.trumanlibrary.org/israel/menora.htm]

Of course, modern artists have been inspired to craft Chanukah menorahs using a multitude of materials into countless stunning designs. [http://uahcweb.org/ny/tinw/ReligiousLiving/RelgiousObjects/MenorahImages.htm] Nowadays, it is not uncommon to see massive menorahs on public display in major cities throughout the world. Chabad's impressive Virtual Chanukah site includes pictures of menorahs from Boston to Bologna and from Denver to Disney World. [http://virtualchanukah.com/lights/video/menorah_stills.asp]

But I feel one of the most remarkable menorahs on the Web is a miniature silver chanukiyah that was made in the Lodz ghetto. As the Yad Vashem Web site describes, "when closed, the folding lamp has the shape of a book. It contains nine small oil-holders and tongs. As it is portable, it enables the owner to fulfill the obligation of kindling the Chanukah lights even under difficult conditions." It was dedicated on Chanukah 1944. The menorah was found after the war in the ruins of the home of Mordechai Chaim Rumkowski, chairman of the ghetto's Jewish Council. [http://shlk.com/237]

Although the tradition of lighting Chanukah candles may seem obvious, the Ohr Somayach Web site tackles plenty of contemporary questions about the commandment. [http://www.ohr.org.il/special/chanukah]

Here's one the Maccabees probably never had to face. How can you fulfill the mitzvah if an overnight flight from the U.S. to Europe means you won't have the opportunity to light a menorah? The response: "in this case there is no obligation to light Chanukah lights. The Talmud describes the mitzvah to light Chanukah lights as 'a candle for a person and his home' (Shabbat 21b). The obligation to light Chanukah candles applies only if you are based in a home at the appropriate time for fulfilling the mitzvah. But if you're riding with your family in a car or plane the entire night – and there's nobody residing in your home – you're exempt from lighting Chanukah candles."

If you are earth-bound during the holiday, you may want to try your hand at making your own menorah. The Mazornet.com site has four plans, including the Builder's Special (which uses ceramic tiles and shot glasses) and the Seaside Special (which calls for seashells and driftwood). [http://www.mazornet.com/jewishcl/Holidays/Chanukah/menorah-building.htm]

Have a very happy holiday.

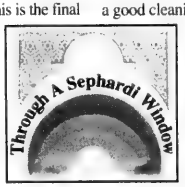
The revered Rabbi Yitzhak Kadouri

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON



He is more of the times of the Babylonian Talmud than he is of this century. He is revered as the elder within a community that is itself comprised of venerable old sages.

In the realm of Kabbalah, his is the final word. For the sick, the poor and the troubled, his counsel and his blessing are considered to be in a category of their own. For many he is seen as the oracle of our times.

He lives in Jerusalem's Bucharian Quarter. Rarely does he venture from his residence – an apartment inside the synagogue built for him by the Safra family. As a centenarian, his health is rigorously guarded and the public is generally kept from him.

He is Rabbi Yitzchak Kadouri.

How does one gain his blessing, or indeed even catch a simple glimpse of the man? The best chance, I am told, is to join him for morning prayers, preferably Mondays and Thursdays.

So, I set out to do just that.

What is the address, I inquire? Just tell the taxi driver: "Rabbi Kadouri." True enough, the driver knows, winding his way through alleys, a market and the many children making their own way to school.

Inside, the Sephardi synagogue looks common enough: tiled, large and airy, with a massive crystal chandelier in dire need of a good cleaning.

It is about 7:30 a.m., relatively late by Israeli standards. Some 20 men sit and wait patiently.

Evidently, the service doesn't begin without the Rav.

Not until close to eight does a door in the back wall of the synagogue open.

On cue, all assembled stand in silence. Ever slowly out of the door, walking backwards, the shammas emerges with both hands stretched out, holding those of the rabbi.

In this way, the rabbi is brought in. All one can see of him are those hands emerging from the tallit that drapes his body, head and shoulders. What must have once been a man of tall stature is now one severely stooped.

Slowly shuffling his slippers, he is shown to his seat on the Torah reading platform. As he makes his way, there is an undeniable aura. As with a Torah, people gently touch his passing body and kiss their fingertips. Whispering and and gasping can be heard from the ladies' balcony.

The rabbi sits, and his body seems to blend into the seat. A stand holds the siddur that he cannot. Even the turning of its pages must be done for him. When one must sit or stand, he is lifted.

The service continues. The Torah is to be read. But first the third aliyah is auctioned. It is understood that whoever purchases it will honour the rabbi with it. In return, the rabbi will recite the Mi Sheberah, bestowing his blessing on the individual.

The bidding is brisk and energetic. A feeling of inadequacy prevents me from participating. Who am I to take this blessing away from the sick that are here today. The honour goes to the highest bidder. Although I do not bid, I am full of regret.

As the rabbi says the Torah blessing, everyone gathers near to hear a faint and barely audible voice, eager to respond with "Amen."

The "moment" for me is when he recites the concluding Kaddish. An intense surge of emotion overpowers me, as it has many times since.

I have yet, however, to receive his blessing.

BAYT solidarity mission dedicates guidance centre

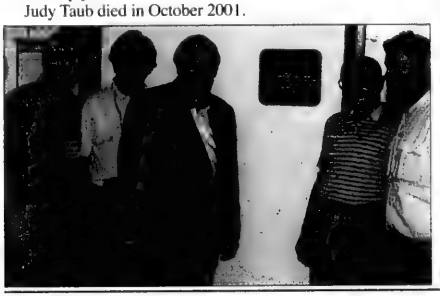
By STACEY STEIN
Special to The CJN

The dedication of a guidance centre in honour of Rabbi Baruch Taub's late wife Judy was one of many remarkable experiences shared by a group of congregants from Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto (BAYT) on a recent solidarity mission to Israel.

Located in the West Bank community of Bet El, with which BAYT is twinned, the guidance centre will counsel teenage girls and provide assistance in areas such as interpersonal and family relationships, careers and religious issues. It was dedicated on the first day of the group's mission, which began on Nov. 3 and ended Nov. 10.

"It's a reflection of what Judy Taub did," said Moishe Posner, who planned the synagogue's mission to Israel with Larry Zeifman, chair of BAYT's Bet El twinning committee. "Judy devoted her life to helping women in the community. She had a tremendous impact on young women in the community. Her loss is felt deeply."

Judy Taub died in October 2001.



"One lady came on the mission because of what Judy had done for her. That was her reason for coming on the mission, out of respect for Judy," said Zeifman.

About 200 people attended the dedication ceremony, which featured speeches by Rabbi Zalman Baruch Melamad, Bet El's chief rabbi, Yaakov Katz, the executive director of Bet El's Yeshiva Centre and co-founder of Arutz Sheva, a popular Israeli news channel. Other speakers included Zeifman, BAYT president Leon Rucker and Rabbi Taub.

At the ceremony, Rabbi Taub affixed a mezuzah in one of the guidance centre's rooms with the late Mrs. Taub's brother, David Blustein.

The community of Bet El, located north of Jerusalem, is comprised of more than 1,000 families.

BAYT's Israel mission was "a trip to show solidarity to our fellow Jews all throughout Israel, especially Jews who had been victims of terror attacks," said Zeifman.

The group, which consisted of 24 people, also visited the victims of terrorist attacks. Some of the victims they visited included the family of a 52-year-old man who was murdered the day before the group's arrival in the community of Rafiach Yam in the Gaza Strip. The group also visited the community of Atzmonah in Gaza, the site of a terrorist attack that claimed the lives of five yeshiva students in March.

Throughout the mission, the group was struck by the strength and resilience of Israelis.

"We went on a solidarity mission and these people ended up giving us strength. They showed us how strong Jews can be," said Zeifman. "We were taken with the bravery of our soldiers and the resoluteness and unity of the Israelis."

Rabbi Taub and Judy Taub were the founding spiritual leaders of the BAYT congregation of 12 families, 23 years ago. It has since grown to become one of the largest Orthodox synagogues in North America.

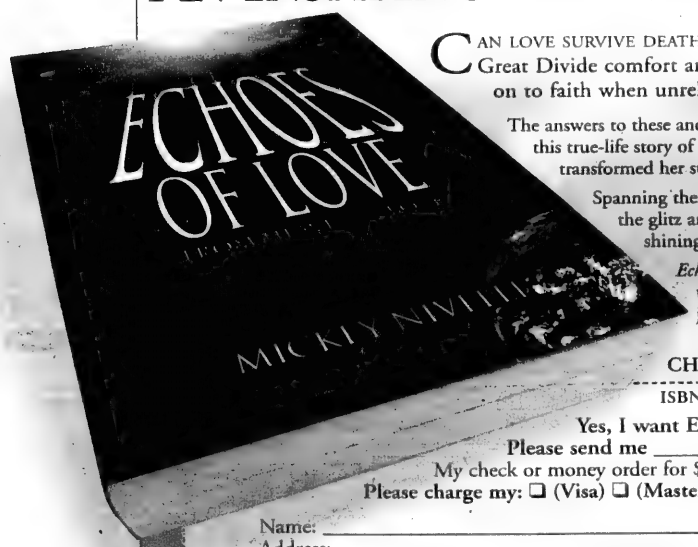
AN INSPIRING TRUE STORY OF ETERNAL LOVE



CAN LOVE SURVIVE DEATH? Do the voices of those who cross the Great Divide comfort and guide the living? How does one hold on to faith when unrelenting hatred and evil assail one's life?

The answers to these and other pertinent questions are illuminated in this true-life story of Lotte, a German-born Jewish woman, who transformed her suffering into spiritual enlightenment.

Spanning the most terrifying period of human history, to the glitz and glamour of show business, this book is a shining testament to the power of love and faith.

Echoes of Love From Heavens Above is a poetic treasure and a rich resource for readers on a journey of personal and spiritual growth.

Israeli lawyer filed suit against Syria, Iraq, Iran

Darshan-Leitner has also hit Syria, Iraq and Iran with lawsuits. All three countries support and/or fund Palestinian organizations ranging from Hamas to Islamic Jihad.

Taking her crusade one step further, Darshan-Leitner filed a 100 million shekel ($20 million US) suit in a Tel Aviv district court against the European Union last May.

The plaintiffs are members of the Bloomberg family who were attacked in a drive-by shooting in the West Bank in August 2001 that killed a pregnant woman and severely wounded her husband and daughter.

The suit contends the EU – which has transferred more than $1.5 billion (US) to the PA since 1994 and continues to assist the PA to the tune of some $10 million a month – is an unintentional sponsor of terrorism.

In its defence, the EU argues that it cannot be sued because of its so-called sovereign immunity.

"I have urged the EU not to hide behind its immunity and to face the facts," she said. "I want to make sure that European taxpayers know how their tax money is spent."

She added, "Don't take European visitors [in Israel] to Yad Vashem. Take them to cemeteries where terrorist victims are buried."

If her case is rejected by the Tel Aviv district court, she said, she will take it to Israel's Supreme Court and, if necessary, to the EU court in Brussels.

Darshan-Leitner has also sued Abu Abbas, whose group, the Palestine Liberation Front, murdered American tourist Leon Klinghoffer aboard the Italian cruise ship Achille Lauro in October 1985.

But Abbas, who currently resides in Baghdad, has not bothered to defend himself.

In addition, Darshan-Leitner has sued Mohammed Dahlan, a security advisor to PA President Yasser Arafat.

She claims he planned an attack on a bus in the Gaza Strip that killed two Israeli teachers.

The United States, she noted with bitterness, is grooming Dahlan as Arafat's successor. "He is nothing but a murderer, and the U.S. should not do business with a terrorist."

In closing, Darshan-Leitner declared that Israelis are "sick and tired" of attending the funerals of fellow citizens who have been gunned down or blown up by terrorists.

On their behalf, she is fighting back.

"We can win these cases. We're winning them already."

Sam Gotfrid: 70 years of service at age 95

Samuel ("call me Sam") Gotfrid turned 95 this October and the former practicing lawyer has spent 70 of those years performing volunteer work throughout Toronto's Jewish community. In 1925 he was elected treasurer of the UJA Federation - then known as The Federation of Jewish Philanthropies – Jewish Youth Branch.

"I've always been a community-minded person," says Gotfrid who has also served as the former chair of UJA's Lawyers Division during the 1960's; on UJA's Executive Board for 10 years, and on UJA Federation's Bequest and Endowment Fund, now The Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto.

He continues to volunteer as a canvasser even today for UJA's Lawyers & Accountants Division.

"I've been doing it for many years. The last number of years I've canvassed mainly the people who the younger canvassers wouldn't have a chance to get to; established lawyers and judges mainly. I wanted to be a good example to the others."

"I think it (community volunteerism) started when I was in university. I wanted to join the fraternity, but it cost money, and my parents didn't have it. I wanted to help with the Jewish Boy's Club that some of the older kids were involved in. Fortunately, I received a scholarship that paid me $100 cash and free tuition. I used the scholarship money to join the fraternity."

Gotfrid, who was born in 1907 on Gerrard Street, became active in Toronto's Jewish community when he accepted an invitation to teach Sunday School at Holy Blossom Temple, then on Bond Street, for the impressive stipend of $5 per month.

"It was a great experience," he says. "It forced me to go back to the library and brush up on my Hebrew. I had a great time with the boys and girls. In 1927 I received the Temple's scholarship for teachers. I spent six incredibly enlightening weeks at the Hebrew Union College in Cincinnati."

95-year-old Samuel Gotfrid, still an active member of Toronto's Jewish community.

Still active on the membership committee of Toronto's Oakdale Golf and Country Club, and on the Board of Governors at Mount Sinai Hospital, Gotfrid says UJA's role hasn't changed that much over his 70 years of service.

"We all know that Israel needs a lot of money. Everyone knows how bad the situation is over there. There are still many needs that must be taken care of. That's what UJA tries to do, and that's the reason it was originally formed, and it is still counted on," says Gotfrid.

Finding love on the Kinneret

Boaz Willinger and fiancée Esther Benquesus

When a birthright israel trip left Toronto's Pearson Airport on December 27, 2001, 26-year-old Torontonian Esther Benquesus was hoping to return with a sense of connection and belonging to Israel.

It's safe to say that Benquesus got more than she bargained for. Not only did she come home with a new and deeper understanding of Israel; she also brought back her beshert (marriage partner).

It was on that trip when she met St. Catharines resident and birthright staff member, Boaz Willinger. The two will be married on December 1, 2002 at Thornhill's Sephardic Kehilla Centre. Their Jamaican honeymoon will begin almost one year from their initial encounter in Israel.

Benquesus first noticed Boaz once they hit the tarmac in Tel Aviv.

"I noticed this guy across the room at Ben Gurion," she says. "He had these amazing green eyes, and there was a connection right away. I guess you could say it was love at first sight."

The couple didn't have the chance to actually meet until a few days later when they were enjoying themselves on a disco boat in the middle of the Kinneret.

"I first noticed her on that boat," says the soon-to-be-married, Israeli born Willinger. "We spoke for a few minutes, and I told my roommate that she was the type of girl I could marry. I never expected it to happen like this."

Willinger left St. Catharines in September, moving to Toronto to be closer to his fiancée.

"To me, birthright is an incredible experience in itself," says Willinger. "It's amazing to see the emotions displayed by people the first time they see the Kotel. I never expected anything else like this to happen to me. To meet someone and know so quickly that I want to spend my life with her is an unbelievable feeling."

"Boaz and I want to thank birthright israel personally for its incredible contribution and commitment to Israel, to the Jewish community and to us personally," adds Benquesus. "Boaz and I know that we are each other's soul mates and our souls have been searching for each other; however, because he lived in St. Catharines and I live in Toronto, we don't know how we would have met if not for birthright."

birthright israel is a world-wide partnership between leading philanthropists, the Government of Israel, North American Federations and locally by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. Be sure to watch birthright israel - a story of Jewish self-discovery on Vision TV Monday, December 2, 8-9 pm.

Visiting the land I cherish

Israel mission reflections

by Michael Diamond

I joined the 85-person strong UJA Federation-Israel Bonds Solidarity Mission from Toronto this October. The group included people from Ottawa, London and Toronto, ages 1-60 and more. Some had been there many times before, and others were there for their first time.

I would have no qualms in recommending a solidarity mission to any family member or friend who wanted to visit Israel cost-effectively, with a group of like-minded people. It's a wonderful opportunity to absorb together large amounts of historical and current information about Israel and the Middle East in only a few days.

Israel continues to be one of the most, if not the most, incredible places in the world to visit and experience- for a Jew or a non-Jew. We were greeted warmly, and as friends, everywhere we went. I can say that, after a 25 year hiatus, my four return visits over the past eight years or so have made my life more enriched as a result.

One of our speakers was Rabbi Donielle Hartman of the Hartman Institute. He spoke about many of the prevailing feelings among Israelis these days, most notably, their sense of isolation and loneliness- from the world.

We spent a good deal of time with soldiers at their bases, and around their lunch tables. Other than the officers, they are all young kids, 18-21 years old, carrying a burden that they handle with varying degrees of comfort. Most are there for their required years, fighting for their country. And some see a larger picture- that they are fighting for the Jewish people.

We visited the Emergency Terror Unit at Shaarei Tzedek Hospital, which takes about 40% of the terror victims in the Jerusalem area. We met two terror victims who had survived- one who had sustained burns all over her body and another who still had nails and other metal implements embedded forever within his body as a result of a homicide bomber whose intention was not just to kill, but to maim. Both of these young people were upbeat, optimistic and despite being permanently scarred, were moving on with their lives in positive ways.

We visited an elementary school and were greeted with a large group of children waving Israeli flags and applauding our arrival. These sweet children showed their appreciation for our presence with a short performance of singing and dancing, and interacted with us using English as much as they were able. The kids are bright, upbeat, and generally optimistic about the future.

Michael Diamond at Jerusalem's David Citadel Hotel.

I could go on - but the bottom line is that Israel is stressed but alive and well; and that going there is something that you will benefit from. Those people who believe you have to be brave to visit Israel are incorrect - no more than you need to be brave to drive on our highways or get on an airplane. And the benefits of a visit to Israel, however short, are so significant that if you do need to be brave, it is indeed worth it!

Record gift for UJA's Foundation

UJA Federation is receiving its largest gift ever from a philanthropic family. Barry and Honey Sherman, two long-time supporters of UJA Federation and other charitable causes, are bestowing a $50 million endowment on the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto, which houses Jewish community bequest and endowment funds. The Jewish Foundation is a key component of a broader UJA Federation initiative called Jewish Toronto Tomorrow (JTT).

Jewish Toronto Tomorrow, which is an unprecedented program to address the Jewish community's burgeoning growth, is matching philanthropists with worthy projects in order to raise more than $1 billion within the next eight to ten years for capital projects, the annual UJA Federation campaign, bequests and endowments.

"In every generation, there are philanthropic leaders who set a new standard for generations to come. Barry and Honey Sherman are two of those philanthropic pioneers. Barry and Honey strongly believe that other men and women with the financial ability to support people in need have an undeniable obligation to do so," says Jewish Foundation chair Neil Nisker. "We greatly appreciate the Shermans' generosity and vision in bestowing this tremendous gift."

"Endowment gifts keep on giving year after year for the community. We are pleased to be able to make this contribution and we hope our gift encourages others to contribute," says Dr. Sherman, the chair and CEO of Apotex, a major Toronto-based pharmaceutical company. The Shermans, active volunteers with UJA Federation, are among Canada's leading philanthropic families.

The Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto houses $150 million in bequests and endowments for the future of Toronto's Jewish community. The Jewish Foundation is one of three JTT components: the UJA Federation Annual Campaign (wrapping up with a record-breaking total of approximately $66 million this year); the Jewish Foundation (endowments/bequests); and Capital Campaigns (with $350 million in projects underway in three regions (downtown, central and York region).

Holocaust survivors celebrate life at the Bernard Betel Centre

Two of UJA Federation's beneficiary agencies – Jewish Family & Child Service and The Bernard Betel Centre – have teamed up on behalf of Toronto's Holocaust survivors who have expressed an interest in more social and cultural activities.

Based on a program started several years in Phoenix, Arizona, the Betel Centre's Café Europa is a monthly social and cultural get-together for survivors, providing them with two hours of music, storytelling, and lunch.

The launch of Toronto's Café Europa took place last week, and despite some typically cold Toronto winter weather, the joint was jumping with close to 40 participants singing and dancing to a live band.

"I feel so fresh, so incredibly alive here," said Regina Herskovics. "This is so wonderful for all of us."

Participant Rosie Pollak, who showed some savvy moves on the dance floor could barely contain her enthusiasm. "I just can't say enough about this program," she said. "I never expected to come here and dance like this. This touches me right in the heart, this is the music I grew up with."

The idea of following the Phoenix example here in Toronto developed from an annual conference sponsored by the Association of Jewish Family and Children's Agencies.

"When I came back from that conference, I encouraged my staff to implement that program here," says Gordon Wolfe, Executive Director of Toronto's JF&CS. "This was such a wonderful way of reaching out to survivors, and to provide them with the opportunity to socialize, celebrate, and share with each other."

Rosie Pollak (L) dances up a storm with friend, Haya Stein, at the launch of Cafe Europa at Toronto's Bernard Betel Centre.

The program, implemented in Toronto by JF&CS, is being funded by the Conference on Jewish Material Claims against Germany, in New York.

Argentina's Jews prepare for a difficult Chanukah

As life for Argentina's Jewish community continues to deteriorate, Chanukah this year promises to be a challenging one.

"Chanukah this year will be very difficult," says Ariel Rubel, a 33-year-old born in Buenos Aires who now calls Toronto home. Rubel, along with his wife Ana, left Argentina just before Chanukah last year.

The Rubels symbolize the flight of Jews from Argentina to Israel. Normally, the average number of Argintineans making aliyah per year is 1,200. This year, almost 6,000 have already made aliyah, with countless others looking into the possibility.

UJA Federation's overseas partners, the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI), has taken steps to quicken the aliyah authorization process, and improve its assistance package to those who make aliyah. JAFI has also aided Argentineans in the often-difficult process of liquidating what assets they do have. There are curently more than 20 JAFI emissaries working in Argentina.

Another UJA Federation overseas partner, the Joint Distribution Committee (JDC), is responsible for initiatives to improve Argentina's quality of Jewish life.

"This year, many people you are used to celebrating with, or who sit next to you at synagogue – your contemporaries – won't be there," says Rubel. "They are too busy trying to get financial help. I'm sure that there will be an air of sadness at Chanukah celebrations. What is really bad is that this year, Chanukah will fall almost exactly on the one-year anniversary of Argentina's financial crisis and the collapse of its banking system when people stood in line unable to take out any money."

Just two years ago life for Argentina's Jews was completely different. They were shopkeepers, business-owners, doctors and lawyers – leaders in their own community. Today, thousands of Argentinean Jews live on the edge of poverty.

On July 18, 1994, their lives were changed forever by an explosion that rocked Argentina's Jewish Mutual Aid Association (AMIA) building in downtown Buenos Aires killing 86 and injuring at least 300.

"I had friends who worked in that building," says Rubel. "Life for all Jews there changed forever – not just on the holidays – but every day. Even people who were not anti-Semitic started to avoid being around Jews just out of fear that something might happen again and they would be hurt too."

According to Anita Weinstein, Director of the Federation of Jewish Communities in Argentina, housed in that rebuilt AMIA building, the memory of Argentina's tragedies will be on everyone's minds this Chanukah.

"I was in the building that day in 1994, when we were bombed," says Weinstein. "The memory is always with me, with all Jews in Argentina. On Chanukah, we will remember what happened to us. But more importantly, we have been, and will continue to go about our lives, practicing our Jewish values. That is the best way to respond to those who wanted to destroy us."

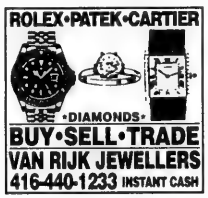
Partnership fund eyes Israel with real estate market

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

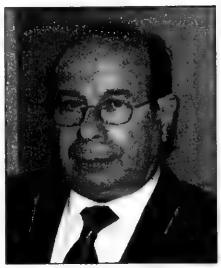
If location, location, location are considered the three most important elements in purchasing real estate, then entrepreneur Shlomo Grofman believes he has found the last prime undeveloped lots in central Israel.

Grofman, for years one of Israel's biggest real estate developers, is heading up a major series of construction projects to erect residential units in Rishon le Zion, Ra'anana, Petach Tikvah, Hod Hasharon and other areas in the Tel Aviv-Jerusalem corridor. He is doing so in partnership with a blue-chip roster of American and Israeli businessmen who have purchased units in the $30 million FAIRE (First American-Israeli Real Estate) Fund established by himself and Zalman Shoval, the former ambassador to the United States.

Grofman was in Toronto last week to meet with potential investors and spread the word about the benefits of investing in Israeli real estate. His one-day visit was facilitated by Michael Serruya, co-chair of CoolBrands Ltd. and a Canadian investor in the FAIRE Fund.



The FAIRE Fund was established one-and-a-half years ago as a limited partnership that pools funds from a select group of entrepreneurs, Grofman explained. It was introduced "as a new vehicle for investments from the United States, Canada and Israel in the real estate industry, especially in the residential area of real estate. Until [it was introduced], Israel had not known the tool of a real estate fund and most of the [development] activities were by companies," including his own Africa-Israel Investment Ltd, where he serves as president and CEO. Africa-Israel is one of the country's five largest business concerns, with interests in construction, infrastructure developments and tourism. The company owns the franchise to the Holiday Inn and Crowne Plaza hotels in Israel, Grofman said.



Shlomo Grofman

The idea behind the fund was to bring together high profile investors and offer them an attractive rate of return from an Israeli opportunity, while also serving as a sort of "club" in which the investors would be given the opportunity to network twice a year and create new contacts, said lawyer Yaron Grofman, Shlomo's son.

Initially, when they conceived the fund, the goal was to raise at least $30 million (all figures in US dollars), with investors buying units in $1.5 million increments. Subscription to the first FAIRE Fund is sold out and a second fund is contemplated with a goal of $30 to $40 million, Shlomo Grofman said.

So far, some prominent names from the U.S. corporate world have signed on to the venture, including Laurence Tisch, former owner of CBS and co-chair of Loews Corporation, Jay Schottenstein, chair of American Eagle Outfitters, Lester Pollock, trustee of New York University and others.

Grofman said the fund plans to build 3,000 "flats" in the next four years. "Middle class, middle Israel, middle price" are the apartments' selling points.

The flats range from three to five rooms and sell for $220,000 to $300,000 each. Penthouse and luxury apartments can fetch $450,000.

So far a 196-unit project in Rishon le Zion is under construction as is a 400-unit development in the Em Hamoshavot area of Petach Tikvah. Em Hamoshavot is a new neighbourhood that will house 15,000 families once it's completed. From 52 per cent to 60 per cent of the FAIRE Fund's units have been pre-sold, Grofman said.

Although Israel is suffering from a recession, demand for housing units remains robust. "Building starts in Israel went down dramatically as a result of the recession, the departure of some builders looking for new opportunities, the lack of building permits and the non-conversion (to residential zoning) of agricultural land," said Yaron Grofman. "We anticipate a shortage of residential units in the next 18 months. We expect a substantial shortage and since it takes two years to complete [a project], there will be a few years in which there will be over-demand, especially in those areas where the fund is investing."

With the deals 75 per cent to 80 per cent leveraged, investors can expect "a very interesting yield...of not less than 20 per cent per year," Shlomo Grofman said. His unique knowledge of the Israeli market and management of the projects gives foreign investors confidence in the project, he added.

The security situation should not dissuade anyone, he continued. "I've seen worse crises, but Israel will be here for eternity."

Grofman's Africa-Israel company has built 300,000 flats in Israel as well as a mall in Ramat Aviv and office towers. He is also chair of Sarel Medical Supplies and Solon Greece-Israel Investments. Shoval serves as chair of the Yetzu Group, which controls the Bank of Jerusalem.

Israeli musician a guest conductor for TSO

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Asher Fisch says his role as an Israeli musician is to portray the positive side of Israeli culture so that audiences can see that there are many aspects to life in Israel.

Fisch, who will be appearing as a guest conductor with the Toronto Symphony Orchestra (TSO) on Dec. 4 and 5 said he sees himself as a diplomat overcoming political biases currently associated with Israel.

Asher Fisch

The internationally renowned conductor and pianist said that "cultural budgets are getting slashed [in Israel]" as a result of security constraints, and very few artists, athletes or scientists are travelling abroad to represent the non-political side of Israel.

The Jerusalem-born musical director of the New Israeli Opera stressed the importance of emphasizing the cultural aspects of Israel.

When the New Israeli Opera performed at a major international opera festival for the first time, organizers chose productions created by leading Israeli directors and designers.

As a conductor of both symphony and opera, Fisch is known for his energy and ability to draw the audience into the lyrical experience of each performance. He has drawn rave reviews in his appearances with major orchestras and opera houses around the world.

When Fisch conducted the Chicago Symphony Orchestra with soloist Yo Yo Ma, the Chicago Tribune wrote that "Ma is nothing if not an impetuous, emotional performer, but the conductor responded flexibly to every musical move."

After his operatic debut at the Los Angeles Opera with Der fliegeude Hollaender, the Wall Street Journal reported that Fisch drew "overwhelming passion out of the orchestra."

He performed with the TSO in October last year.

In the upcoming concert, Fisch will conduct the TSO in two works by German composers – Emperer Waltzes by Johann Strauss and Also sprach Zarathustra by Richard Strauss. Pianist Jon Kimura Parker will perform Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 5, "Emperor."

After a five-year tenure as music director of the Vienna Volksoper, Fisch said he "sees value in the lighter Viennese style" and German classical music.

Fisch's teachers have included conductor Mendi Rodan of the Israel Symphony Orchestra and pianist Daniel Barenboim, with whom he has performed several times.

In Israel, Fisch supported Barenboim's attempts to bring the music of Richard Wagner to the Israeli Opera last year because he felt that people should be able to choose the music they want to hear.

Richard Wagner was appropriated by Nazi Germany as a political symbol because of his anti-Semitic views, and his work has been boycotted by most Israeli symphonies.

Fisch, whose parents are survivors, said that attempts to ban Wagner in Israel today are driven by supporters of a political agenda and not by survivors' sensitivities.

"There are survivors who are interested in hearing the music of Wagner and are forced to listen to it in the privacy of their homes," he said.

Lose 20, 30, 40 pounds or more for life with hypnosis

(it's easy — even if you love eating)

If you've ever tried to diet, you know how deprivation feels. Yet millions of people start diets each year, hoping that this time will be different, and that they will finally, magically, lose weight for good.

Approximately $33 billion a year is spent on diet and weight loss plans, yet there are more overweight North Americans today than ever before.

The good news is, there are thousands of people who have turned their backs on dieting, stopping the insanity of a vicious lose-gain cycle.

Instead, they have followed the advice of an increasing number of health professionals who are advocating a completely different way to lose weight — one that is safe, effective and helps people change the way they think about food. This revolutionary, anti-diet approach — one that has already helped thousands of people lose weight successfully and permanently — is hypnosis.

Finding the Key to Change. The subconscious mind often stores negative thoughts or behaviours that can trigger destructive habits. For overweight people, an inability to change these habits can result in a lifetime struggle with weight. The most effective way to overcome this obstacle is to reprogramme the subconscious mind through hypnosis.

In an altered state like hypnosis it is easier to incorporate new habits, explains Patrick K. Porter, Ph.D, executive director of Positive Changes Hypnosis Centres. "People know the right things to do, like drinking more water, or leaving food on their plate. They just don't know how to make these behaviours a habit. By using hypnosis to bypass the subconscious mind, we can help clients lay the foundation for new, healthy habits."

"With hypnosis, we increase your ability to absorb suggestion," Porter notes. Ineffective, destructive behaviour is replaced effortlessly by healthier behaviours and you start to lose weight and break free of unhealthy habits.

"We help clients think and eat like a slim person by reprogramming their subconscious mind," says Porter. "They lose weight and keep it off long term because they've changed their whole relationship with food, mentally as well as physically. Once they've successfully replaced their old habits with positive ones, they never have to think about dieting because their weight is no longer an issue."

Winning the Weight War. More and more people seeking a positive approach to long-term weight loss have sought out hypnosis, with amazing and lasting results. "We have clients who've maintained their weight loss for more than 15 years without even thinking about it," says Porter. "The key to having the kind of life you want is picking and choosing the kinds of habits that can help you live the life you want. Then, we help

Founding member of The Travellers was 'a proud Canadian'

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Jerry Goodis, one of Canada's most famous advertising personalities and a founding member of The Travellers, perhaps Canada's most well-known folk music group, died of cancer Nov. 8 in Chilliwack, B.C., at age 73.

Obituary

The son of a Toronto tailor who became a union organizer in the needle trade, Goodis was active in the youth division of United Jewish Peoples' Order (UJPO) and served for a period as its president.

He was also in a UJPO folksinging group that later became The Travellers.

Jerry Gray, a member of the original group, recalled that in The Travellers' early years, the group's Yiddish song program was presented at many Jewish organizations and at the University of Toronto's Hillel House.

Later, the group became known nationwide. Among its best-known hits was a Canadian version of the Woody Guthrie song This Land is Your Land, for which Goodis helped rewrite the lyrics.

"Jerry was a dominant personality and used his wiles in selling songs from the stage and for his advertising ideas in the marketplace," Gray said.

Goodis studied commercial art at Toronto's Central Technical School and founded a successful ad agency, Goodis, Goldberg, Soren, in 1961. The agency became known for its creative and innovative ad campaigns and through to the mid-1980s, after leaving the band, Goodis fronted a number of agencies and became the most famous ad executive in Canada.

Jerry Goodis

In the early 1970s, he also wrote a best-selling book titled Have I Ever Lied to You Before?

He became an advisor to the Trudeau government in the 1970s.

"Jerry was a proud Canadian and proud of his left-wing Jewish upbringing," Gray said.

After living most of his life in Ontario, Goodis moved to Harrison Hot Springs, B.C., last year.

He is survived by his wife Joyce Seidel-Goodis, children Leslie, David and Noah, and four grandsons.

MAYTAL WAX-LEIDERMAN – The Will to Live...

27 year old Maytal was at the The Dizengoff Center in Tel Aviv celebrating Purim. At 15:55 a loud explosion pierced through the air. This terrorist attack changed the course of Maytal's life instantly. The attack killed her brother Asaf and left Maytal with only one shattered leg and an entire body covered with burns. She was unconscious for twelve days and spent three months thereafter on a respirator.

"I wanted to live so badly. They didn't know whether I would make it through the first night. Each day was a struggle to live." But the will to live is stronger than anything else for Maytal.

She and her husband had recently bought a walk-up apartment with a lovely garden. After this horrific incident they could not live there as it was physically impossible for her to walk up and down the stairs. Unfortunately, her marriage also suffered. "What began as young innocent love turned into a relationship of caregiver and patient, and that was not healthy. I had gone from being independent to a state of helplessness."

The struggle to rehabilitate has been a long and painful process for Maytal. She now works as a librarian at the university and has started going out with friends again. It is at Beit Halochem where Maytal participates in wheelchair dancing, sculpture and painting.

Following the Chanukah Trail

Although the miracle of Chanukah originated nearly 2200 years ago, the historical sites and geographic locations that trace the trail of Chanukah are still intact today. The story starts in what was then, and is, once again, a thriving Jewish community near Jerusalem.

Modi'in

It's hard to believe in contemporary 2002 that Chanukah's roots sprang from a fast-growing city just a 15-minute drive from Ben Gurion International Airport, about halfway between Tel Aviv and Jerusalem.

Now picture yourself in 167 BCE. What is now modern day Israel and neighbouring Syria were ruled by a less than benevolent king, Antiochus IV, who represented Greek philosophy, which, in most respects, contradicted Jewish values. Antiochus sent a trusted officer to Modi'in to meet Matityahu from the Hasmonean family of Maccabees, who refused an order to join the king's loyalists. When a Jewish resident of Modi'in offered a pagan sacrifice as a sign of obedience to Antiochus, Matityahu struck both the Modi'in man and the king's representative. The rebellion, which eventually led to the holy Temple's return to Jewish hands had begun. Ancient Modi'in was almost totally destroyed by a succession of conquests and what may have been an earthquake, but modern Modi'in is a thriving community, adorned by the Judean mountains where the Hasmoneans hid from the king's forces.

Mt. Zion

When the Maccabees conquered Jerusalem, three years after the rebellion began, Matityahu's son, Judah, and his brothers, stood atop Mt. Zion before cleansing the Temple and lighting the oil that miraculously lasted eight days.

Today Mount Zion is famous for King David's tomb, several major Christian landmarks and the remains of many civilizations that once governed Jerusalem. Although some historians dispute Mount Zion as the actual site of King David's death, many visitors still make the trek for the mountain's magnificent scenery and religious significance. Mount Zion, hotly contested during Israel's War of Independence, was captured by Israeli forces in May, 1948

Hasmonean Tombs

The entire Modi'in region is a treasure field of Hasmonean remains, but the most spectacular discovery took place in 1995, when road crews were widening Highway 443, which runs past the city. There they found a Maccabean burial cave, with 23 ossuaries – stone boxes containing the bones of Hasmonean family members. Each year, thousands undertake a pilgrimage to the Maccabean burial site.

Chanuka in Israel

Chanukah's holiday lights are even brighter in Israel, where candle flames from millions of homes illuminate the streets. There's also much to do from the olive oil trails of Neot Kedumim, Israel's biblical park, to Negev desert concerts, to the annual Torch Run, which begins with a Chanukah torch lighting ceremony at the Western Wall and ends with festivities at the Jordan Valley amphitheatre.

Whether it's Chanukah or any other time of year, your visit to Israel will benefit Israel's struggling economy and improve the morale of every Israeli you meet. With so many travel options available, there's no time to wait and there's no better time to go. If you want to make a significant difference for Israel, make a commitment to visit our incredibly beautiful land as soon as possible

After all, Israel is yours. So please say I care and I'm going.

JSA encourages Ottawa students to get political

By ADAM GRACHNIK
Special to The CJN

The Jewish Students Association Hillel Ottawa (JSA) wants to encourage its members to get involved politically on the two university campuses in the nation's capital.

The JSA recently indicated that it wants 10 Jewish students per campus to work together to advocate for Israel on the University of Ottawa and Carleton University campuses, in an effort to engage apathetic Jewish students and inform the general student body about Israel and the Jewish perspective on Middle East issues.

"Just being on campus is not the same as having involvement on campus.

"We often have to influence the way people perceive Israel and the Jews," said JSA advisor Anne Silverstone. "It's important for Jews to get involved in the grassroots level on and off campus."

In an e-mail sent out to members of the JSA, students were informed that the 10 leaders will be asked to "run for a student federation of the University of Ottawa or Carleton University student association position, get involved with the Ontario Public Interest Research Group, a left-wing activist organization, and attend meetings held by other organizations on campus, for example, the Middle East discussion group."

Furthermore, the leaders will be asked to sit at JSA information tables, engage non-Jewish students in conversations about Israel, attend training session with organizations like Canadian Jewish Congress, the Canada-Israel Committee and the Embassy of Israel, and approach Jewish students "to garner support and commitment to help with advocacy."

"If Jews are not out there, there is only one side of the story being told. From our perspective it's not the correct side," said Silverstone, who added that the leaders would be paid a small stipend if the JSA receives a United Israel Appeal Federations of Canada Israel Advocacy grant. He said they applied for the grant in October.

The grants for Canadian university campuses, according to the UIAFC's Web site, are valued at $10,000 per campus and go to fund "innovative campus-based Israel advocacy programming."

Pearl Jacobson, the U of O's JSA president, explained why it's important for university students to get involved.

"Young people are going to form the next generation. With the current climate, with what is happening in Israel, young people's voices are becoming more important. What students have to say about political issues is important," Jacobson said.

Jacobson explained that there isn't a huge Jewish involvement at the University of Ottawa, but there is a large Arab student body.

"Here it seems like Arab students have demonstrations every weekend," Jacobson said. "These students [the new leaders] will be able to influence and have a positive affect."

Silverstone added to Jacobson's comments about the U of O. "[Jewish students] see pro-Palestinian [and] anti-Israel signs. They feel, 'Where is the Jewish voice?' Now Jewish students can feel sure there is a Jewish presence. This can excite and interest other Jewish students to get involved."

The JSA's main office is at the U of O, but it also represents Jewish students at Carleton and Algonquin College and JSA believes the majority of the new leadership is needed at Carleton.

"There's a better atmosphere at the U of O. Things here have been quieter," Silverstone explained. "Carleton is a free-for-all. There is no real policy in place. You can put out any information you want. There are many Arab groups who band together and we only have one Jewish group. We are one club, so naturally students feel outnumbered.

"Hopefully, this will change that," she added.

Jacobson agreed. "We need to stop being apathetic about things," she said.

Ottawa's Arts Alive gets a Middle Eastern flavour

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The annual Arts Alive cultural weekend and book fair had a Middle Eastern flavour this year.

Called Waves to the Shore: The Sephardi Experience, the event showcased Sephardi artists, musicians, authors and food.

For the opening evening, the Soloway Jewish Community Centre (SJCC) was transformed with opulent Moroccan decorations, fabrics, furniture, brass fixtures and traditional costumes worn by staff and volunteers, as well as many patrons.

Arts Alive committee chair and MC Cantor Daniel Benlolo acknowledged the generosity of Montreal's Sephardi community, which lent posters and artifacts for the weekend.

"I hope that with this co-operation we will create a link between our communities," he said.

Benlolo introduced the Edery Brothers, Montreal musicians who played throughout the evening, and explained the tradition behind the henna, a traditional Moroccan pre-wedding ceremony arranged by the bride's family. The demonstration of the henna ceremony was, for many, a first glimpse into an exotic custom; for others, it was a taste of home.

During the celebration, henna, a red dye, is put on the palms of the bride's hand as well as those of her family and friends, to protect them from the evil eye. Special songs are sung for the bride and a hamsa (five-fingered hand) on a chain is placed around her neck, also for protection against the evil eye.

For the ceremony, the bride was carried into the room on a chair and took her place on the stage to receive wedding gifts donated by local sponsors.

There was lively singing and dancing, as well as traditional Moroccan food, making for a rousing start to the community-wide event.

The following day featured speakers, artists displaying their wares, music and children's programs. A kosher fare and wine tasting provided an opportunity to sample a wide variety of kosher products available in local stores and through caterers.

The SJCC Shira Ottawa Choir, under the direction of Benlolo, performed on Sunday evening at Agudath Israel Congregation. A capacity crowd enjoyed the selection of Sephardi music as the choir, accompanied by the Edery Brothers, entertained for nearly three hours. Even Israeli Ambassador Haim Divon added his voice to the performance. Avi Beker, secretary general of the World Jewish Congress, brought greetings.

Arts Alive, a program of the SJCC, was sponsored by The Vered Israel Cultural and Educational Program and the Friends of the 39th Henry "Hank" Torontow Scouting Movement. The volunteer planning committee included Eva Amzallag, Yvone Azuelos, Muriel Benlolo, J. Boulakia, Marcia Cantor Naomi Cracower, Edie Landau, Ethel Malek and Viviane Ohana Sandler.

"I have had many people tell me that they are intrigued by the whole thing and they want to learn more," said Benlolo. "Now people are thirsty for more information. I hope that this is just the beginning and that future Arts Alive weekends will have themes of Jews from other parts of the world so that we can all learn from each other."

Cantor Daniel Benlolo cuts the ribbon to open the Sephardi Arts Alive weekend, assisted by his wife Muriel Benlolo and Israel Ambassador Haim Divon (right).

TEDDY BEARS: Students of Kehila Jewish Community Day School in Hamilton donated 54 teddy bears to hospitalized Israeli children who were injured in terrorist bombings. The students raised $270 for Operation Teddy Bear, a project of B'nai Brith's Heart-To-Heart Mission, by donating allowance money and doing paid chores for their parents. They also sent get-well letters in Hebrew and English to the injured Israeli children. Seen here, holding hand-woven tzedakah boxes, are some Kehila students with teacher Louise Klinghoffer.

Manitoba's Premier Doer visits Israel

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Manitoba Premier Gary Doer's first visit to Israel was an eye-opening experience.

"I was struck by the proximity of everything and the security issues that arise from that," he said. "You don't get the sense from watching television how close the Golan, for example, is to Israelis. From Metullah, we could see Lebanon, Syria and the Golan."

Doer's trip was arranged to coincide with a Jewish Federation of Winnipeg/CJA mission that visited Israel from Oct. 27 to Nov. 4 – although he was only able to join the group (which included Manitoba Health Minister Dave Chomiak and deputy Health Minister Milton Sussman) from Oct. 28-30 following a business stopover in London.

He travelled with the group from Tel Aviv to northern Israel – stopping at the Canada Centre in Metullah – and on to Jerusalem and the Western Wall and Yad Vashem, culminating in a reception at the Canadian Ambassador's residence in Tel Aviv.

Doer said that having always been a solid supporter of Israel, the trip didn't change his views, but he said it has led him to "become more focused and more knowledgeable about the issues."

For example, he said he assumed that most Israelis would be talking about the coming U.S. attack on Iraq. He asked some youths on a kibbutz in northern Israel their opinion about Iraq.

"Their reply was that they were more concerned about the next couple of days and if they could get safely by bus to Tel Aviv without being blown up," he says.

Doer's visit to Israel came about, he says, as a result of attending several Jewish National Fund Negev gala evenings and being urged to see Israel.

"My predecessor as premier, Gary Filmon, had been to Israel. I decided in June that if I could find the time this year I would go."

Doer said he was impressed by the beauty of the country and the purposefulness of the people and greatly enjoyed his hosts and travelling companions. "I learned a lot," he said.

The premier also took advantage of his short visit to discuss business with a couple of Israeli companies – Elbit Aerospace and Tevah – that are considering establishing a presence in Manitoba.

As a result of the visit, Doer said he is raising his voice nationally in support of Israel.

"I have been asked to comment on the Canadian government's treatment of [Magen David Adom] as compared to Hezbollah," he said. "It is unfair that the government should provide Hezbollah with tax relief but refuse [Magen David Adom]. I can't understand that kind of inequity."

He described his visit to Israel as one he will never forget and is looking forward to going back some day.

CJC president's Chanukah message

Keith Landy

The Talmud tells of competing schools of thought about the lighting of candles at Chanukah. One school, seeking to mirror the diminishing light of the legendary oil cruse after a week and a day, suggested starting with eight candles and removing one each day. The other school countered that the true miracle of Chanukah lay in adding light to the world and advocated beginning with one candle and ending with eight. We know how this debate concluded.

We are imbued with the wonderful symbolism of the lighting of successive candles on this joyous festival, and our thoughts often turn at this time to how we, in our own lives, can add light to the world.

I would venture a guess that the lighting of candles at Chanukah ranks second only to conducting a seder in the list of observed annual holiday rituals. I believe that, like Passover, the themes and messages of Chanukah – freedom, identity, peoplehood, resistance to assimilation – resonate powerfully with Jews today.

It is precisely these connections that we will need to provide us with the courage and strength to overcome the many challenges we are facing today as Jews – at home, in Israel and throughout the diaspora.

If we are to deal successfully with the threats to our collective security and well-being from resurgent anti-Semitism, terrorism and war, we must re-galvanize our sense of activism and direct involvement, as we have done so effectively in other times of crisis.

The Passover Haggadah impels us to imagine personal liberation from slavery to freedom. As we chant the second prayer while kindling the lights of Chanukah, we should imagine that we, too, were present when "the sovereign of all worlds... did miracles for our ancestors in those times at this season."

From the very name of Chanukah – meaning dedication – let us strive to strengthen our commitment to the ideals and values of Judaism and our connection to Israel and the Jewish people and to conduct our lives so as to bring more light into the world.

I wish you and your families a joyous Chag Samayach.

Amidror subs for Mofaz at Calgary Negev Dinner

By TAMARA STECYK
Special to The CJN

CALGARY — Israel will not give into the Palestinians' terror tactics, an audience of 200 people was told at the Jewish National Fund 2002 Calgary Negev Dinner.

"We want at the end of the war to change the mindset of the Arab leadership. No more… talk of using terror instead of negotiating. This war is not only important itself but for the future of Israel," said retired Israeli Maj-Gen. Yaakov Amidror.

Amidror had replaced the scheduled speaker, Lieut.-Gen. Shaul Mofaz, after Mofaz came out of retirement to accept an appointment as Israel's defence minister. Currently, Amidror is a visiting military fellow at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy.

In an interview prior to the Nov. 17 dinner, Amidror said he hopes to take advantage of his role at the institute to provide Americans a better picture of what is happening in Israel and influence public opinion.

"I think after 9/11, the Americans understand better than in the past that there is a real need to fight terrorism. Fighting terrorism is not so easy in a democratic country. There are concessions you have to make. Israel is paying economically," Amidror added.

Having Amidror as a speaker tied in with JNF's tribute to the Jewish War Veterans of Canada, Calgary Post #2. Proceeds from the dinner will be used to help construct a park and recreation area for military personnel to visit with friends and family at the Chavad Hashomer Base in the lower Galilee.

Amidror explained to guests that the two-year intifadah is not about Israeli occupation. In 2000, the Israeli government was prepared to give the Palestinians 100 per cent of the Gaza Strip and 95 per cent of the West Bank.

The reasons for the current war are demands for the right of return for Palestinian refugees, the right for Israel to be an independent Jewish state and for the Palestinians to agree that the end of the conflict is not the beginning of another stage of terror, Amidror said.

"No question that this is a tough war. First of all, it's a very long one. It's only two years and no one can say when will be the end of it," Amidror said. "Most of the Israelis killed are civilians. They have to find more civilians to kill because they believe this is the way to put Israel on its knees. They believe by putting Israel on its knees, Israel will give up many of its demands."

But Israel will not negotiate without a responsible partner on the Palestinians' side and Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat is not a responsible negotiator, Amidror said. The Palestinians must find a leader who understands that terror is not an option, he added.

"It's very tough [to fight the war] because the terrorists are civilians. If there would be any agreement, it [would mean] the end of the conflict and there would be no more claims against Israel. But it is a tough job to implement the war itself. You have to defend the citizens of Israel and make the war inside the populated areas," Amidror said.

He encouraged the audience to support Israel by visiting the country.

"It is an important signal to the Arabs and the Palestinians that the Israelis are not alone. The Israeli society is not going to collapse. It is not going to give up."

Mideast situation adds urgency to Hadassah meet

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – Rochelle Levinson launched her three-year term as national president of Canadian Hadassah-WIZO with a pledge to boost membership, to keep the organization vital for Canadian-Jewish women and to make Diaspora Jews more aware of just how much Israel needs them right now.

"This is still a very vibrant organization," Levinson, a 63-year-old native of Winnipeg who lives in Vancouver, said in an interview as Hadassah's 37th national convention came to a close recently at a downtown Montreal hotel.

"It's more and more difficult for women to balance careers and a home life, leaving little time for volunteerism," said Levinson, who ran unopposed for the presidency of the organization, currently celebrating its 85th anniversary.

"New chapters are being formed, but I would like to raise awareness about the organization and of the work we do."

One positive sign, Levinson noted, is the large number of women – out of Hadassah's Canadian membership of 14,000 – who belong to its "Aviv" component for women 45 and younger. A highlight of the three-day convention was a reunion of Aviv participants.

"I'd like to see us grow in strength and in numbers," she said.

At the time of the interview, Levinson was set to leave almost immediately for a Canadian Hadassah solidarity mission to Israel being co-ordinated by her and her immediate predecessor, Marion Mayman.

Mayman, of Ottawa, made it clear before the triennial convention got underway that it would not be a "business as usual" event in light of the two years of terror against Israel that has left 600 Israelis dead.

The convention program clearly reflected that.

Besides featuring panels on Israel and the media and on what Jewish students face on campuses, the convention, chaired by Susan Balinsky and Maxine Sanders, also presented awards to two friends of the Jewish state: human rights lawyer and Liberal MP Irwin Cotler, who received the Humanitarian Award, and hockey legend Jean Béliveau, who received the Canadian Award.

Béliveau has travelled several times to Israel for the Maccabiah Games and shown strong sympathy for Israel.

At the convention's closing dinner, attended by about 300 delegates, Israel's ambassador to Canada, Haim Divon, praised Canadian Hadassah-WIZO and referred to the "reassurance and strength" provided by Jerusalem's Hadassah Hospital, which Canadian Hadassah has raised funds for since 1990. Also singled out for a tribute was veteran Canadian Hadassah executive vice-president Lily Frank, a name synonymous with the organization.

The evening's most memorable moment came when the Dr. Avraham Rivkind, who heads the hospital's Trauma Unit in Ein Kerem and which has treated hundreds of terror victims, accepted Canadian Hadassah's highest honour, the Rebecca Sieff Award.

To Rivkind's surprise, Shimon Ohana, a young Israeli whom he had literally brought back from death two years ago, appeared at the presentation ceremony with his mother Rachel.

Ohana, then 18 and a police border recruit, was shot in the heart soon after the start of the latest intifadah in the Jerusalem suburb of Gilo. Rivkind never gave up on him, even though Ohana showed no vital signs and was clinically dead.

Past recipients of the Rebecca Sieff Award have included former Jerusalem mayor Teddy Kollek, conductor Zubin Mehta, filmmaker Claude Lanzmann, and Soviet refusenik Ida Nudel.

Another convention highlight was a tribute to three lieutenant-governors: Lise Thibault of Quebec, Marilyn Trenholme Counsell of New Brunswick and Myra Freeman of Nova Scotia, who is Jewish.

The convention also stressed the need for continued support of Canadian-funded Hadassah projects in Israel.

They include a network of day-care centres, schools, residences and youth villages, and two hospitals: Assaf Harofeh Hospital near Ben-Gurion Airport and Hadassah Hospital.

At the closing dinner, it was announced that the Dan family had just pledged $500,000 towards Canadian Hadassah projects in Israel, including $100,000 for Hadassah Hospital's Trauma Unit.

AJC meets in Moncton

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

MONCTON, N.B. — Preserving small communities was the recurrent theme at the recent 13th biennial convention of the Atlantic Jewish Council in Moncton, N.B.

Incoming AJC president Mark Rosen, a Halifax lawyer specializing in insolvency, stressed to delegates from across the region that the AJC "must deal with the continuity of our communities.

"We see communities dying all over but we have to look to our youth to sustain us. We have to hear what they have to say and get them to work. I truly fear there may not be enough to do the work in the future that we are doing now. We must make them part of us."

In her final address after two years as president, Sheva Medjuck, dean of arts and science at Mount Saint Vincent University in Halifax, said Jewish survival in Atlantic Canada is "our constant struggle. But through programming in all areas, we are trying. We are working diligently to ensure our communities survive and prosper."

The conference brought together more than 100 people from the four Atlantic provinces. They discussed how to respond to anti-Israel comments with Marra Messenger, director of community development with the Canada-Israel Committee.

Four rabbis from the region led a panel on maintaining links through Atlantic communities, specifically those without rabbis. Rabbi Mendel Feldmen of Chabad Lubavitch, Halifax, emphasized the importance of being strong within oneself. Yochanan Samuels, rabbi of the Fredericton community, suggested attracting people to social events is a positive step to bringing them closer to their Jewishness.

University students had a chance to discuss growing Jewish campus populations from outside Atlantic Canada and the AJC's responsibility to provide programming for them.

At a lengthy session on anti-Semitism, Canadian Jewish Congress' community relations director Manuel Prutschi said world and Canadian communities are no longer declaring "Never again" but "find ourselves painfully asking 'Will it ever end?'"

He suggested that there be continued efforts to teach about the Holocaust, to provide support for refugees from genocidal regimes, to be tolerant of other minorities and to help all Canadians understand that an attack on Israel is an attack on the Jewish people and vice versa, 'that both are anti-Semitism.'

Israel Unger of Fredericton, a Holocaust survivor and member of the AJC's Holocaust education committee, said that anyone concerned with an anti-Semitic issue in his or her community should contact the AJC for assistance in formulating a response.

Joan Sichel, a volunteer in the Jewish and wider communities, received warm applause when she said that "having an opportunity to do good deeds – in hospitals, soup kitchens, and elsewhere – shows the outside community we have a Jewish heart and are willing to help our fellow man. That can be a very positive response to any anti-Semitic feeling."

In addition to Rosen, the new AJC executive consists of first vice-president Jim Spatz, second vice-president Howard Conter, treasurer Michael Pink, secretary Kathy Zilbert and legal counsel Mark David. All are from Halifax.

HAPPY CHANUKAH

Nine honoured out East for service to community

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

MONCTON, N.B. — Nine Atlantic Canadians were honoured recently for their personal commitment to the Jewish and secular communities.

Some are retired yet continue to give. Others are young and vibrant and find it difficult to say no when asked to serve.

But, as cited on Community Service Award plaques they received at the Atlantic Jewish Council's Biennial Convention, their volumes of community work denote huge hearts and caring natures.

The nine men and women – David Attis, Joseph Kohn and Jack Brodie of Moncton, N.B.; Marianne Ferguson and Bob Wolman of Halifax, Sandra Levine, Saint John; Martin Chernin of Sydney, N.S.; Claire Frankel-Salama of St. John's and Rosalie Simeone of Prince Edward Island – have performed a variety of services. While all have been closely connected to their Jewish communities, several gave, and continue to give, major amounts of time to civic responsibility in the wider community.

Moncton's Attis was described as a man who cares. He spearheaded the Canadian Jewish Congress's small communities program in the 1980s, led the fight against Holocaust denier and former Moncton school teacher, Malcolm Ross, served Tiferes Israel congregation as president and rosh chevrah kadishah, chaired the board of the Atlantic Jewish Council and was on the board of the Moncton East End Boys and Girls Club.

Referring to the recent spate of anti-Semitic incidents in Canada, Attis told more than 150 community members attending awards night that "no matter how much work we've done in past, we have much more to do in the future. We have to do whatever it takes to make Canada safe for Jews."

Brodie, a past president of the Moncton synagogue, was also a New Brunswick boxing referee for many years. In introducing Brodie, Moncton's Irwin Lampert joked that "his talent as a boxing judge served him well in chairing meetings of our congregation."

An active member of Lions Club, chair of Israel Bonds and UJA and lay chazzan at the shul, it was said of Brodie, "Without people like this man, small congregations in Atlantic Canada could not survive."

Sydney's Chernin, a former AJC president and 20-year board member of UIA-Canada, has been United Way of Cape Breton chair and is currently chair of the Economic Council of Canada. He had been back from Israel only a few days before the award presentation."It's important we go to Israel to visit, now. They need our solidarity," he said.

Ferguson of Halifax was introduced by her daughter Lea McKnight. "It's usually a parent that gets nachas from her children. Tonight, I get nachas from my mother," McKnight said.

"She has always been involved, whether going to meetings, baking for community functions, making phone calls. At Shaar Shalom [Synagogue] everyone looks to my mother for advice, and they always get it."

Ferguson heads the women's chevrah kadishah, which she has served for 30 years, is a volunteer at the IWK Health Centre, a children's hospital, and at Pier 21, the Halifax entry point for 1 million Canadians between 1923 and 1971, and the gateway through which she and her family entered from Europe in the 1940s.

Holocaust survivor Kohn of Moncton was vice-president and gabbai of Tiferes Israel Synagogue, as well as a Torah reader, teacher of bar and bat mitzvah children and a conductor of synagogue services for decades. He also served at length as president of the Moncton Figure Skating Club.

Levine of Saint John was described as a "tireless, dedicated contributor to many causes. When she says she'll do it, she will." Norman Holtzman said the words "no" and "can't" do not exist in her vocabulary. "And no one can stretch a dollar like Sandra," said Holtzman of the long-time treasurer of Sharrei Zedek Congregation and its Sisterhood.

Frankel-Salama of St. John's was called "The Rock of Newfoundland." In acknowledging her award, the transplanted Torontonian said, "trying to keep kosher on the Rock is not an easy thing to do. But how we act and what we say as Jews in a small community is important to us as a people."

She added, "I wouldn't have been able to grow as I did and have had the same opportunities [(to serve the congregation and the Jews of Newfoundland] if I stayed in Toron[illegible]. Being here for 17 years, and it was only supposed to be a couple, has enriched me and my family."

Simeone has contributed similarly to Prince Edward Island, hosting visitors, running a Hebrew school, serving as community representative on AJC's board and on the Holocaust education committee. She is also media spokesperson for the P.E.I. community.

Wolman of Halifax has participated in UJA and UIA campaigns for 40 years, was on the chevrah kadishah for Beth Israel Synagogue for 20 years, has been shul gabbai for the [illegible] 10, a board member for close to 30 years and served two terms as president.

AJC conference held in Moncton

Members at large are Michael April, Michael Argand, Rachael Budovitch, David Korn, Andrew Wolfson and Michael Zatzman, all of Halifax; Barrie Carnat and Nicole Druckman of Moncton; Ivan Levine of Fredericton and Halifax; and Rosalie Simeone of Prince Edward Island.

Community representatives will be elected or appointed within their own communities.

Concordia board OKs lifting of Mideast ban

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – Concordia University's board of governors voted unanimously last Wednesday to authorize rector Frederick Lowy to lift its campus moratorium on public events and information tables related to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

The controversial ban was imposed by the board Sept. 9 after a violent demonstration halted a planned speech by Benjamin Netanyahu, now Israel's foreign minister.

Lowy was expected to meet early this week with leaders of Hillel, Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights (SPHR) and the Concordia Student Union (CSU) to see if they will abide by a set of principles designed to keep future discussion on campus about the Middle East reasonably civil.

Adherence to these principles is to be monitored by a person to be named shortly, who will report directly to Lowy, the board announced following its regular closed monthly meeting where the vote was taken.

The guidelines were actually accepted at a meeting between Lowy and Hillel, SPHR and CSU representatives in late September. They speak of a commitment to "structured dialogue" through mutual respect, non-violent behaviour, avoidance of speech or materials that are anti-Semitic or racist against Arabs, and to "protect the core academic functions" of the university.

Hillel leaders were in Washington last week for the General Assembly of North American Jewish federations and were unavailable for comment.

Hillel withdrew from the regular meetings with the senior administration, SPHR and the CSU at the end of October saying it felt the talks were making little progress. SPHR, it said, had shown no remorse for the events of Sept. 9 and that it had, with the sanction of the CSU, repeatedly breached the moratorium, with impunity.

Hillel has been opposed to the moratorium and resented having its freedoms restricted in the same way as those who caused the trouble. Nevertheless, it has abided by the ban.

In a statement, the CSU said it is "delighted with the decision to end the moratorium but said "more… is needed in terms of looking into the events surrounding Netanyahu and how the university community should go forward."

The board, which is chaired by Lillian Vineberg, said the ban on Mideast events was lifted because it had "achieved its goal" of providing time for all parties to cool off and for order to be restored on campus.

Abba Eban's rare fair-mindedness will be missed

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The extensive media attention devoted to the passing of Abba Eban is a tribute to his towering prominence in international diplomacy on behalf of Israel.

Coincidentally, the National Post and Globe and Mail simultaneously printed Associated Press writer Mark Lavie's retrospective on Nov. 18: "Abba Eban, the famously eloquent statesmen... helped persuade the world to approve creation of the Jewish state and dominated Israeli diplomacy for decades."

A page one obituary in the New York Times quotes Conor Cruise O'Brien, the famous Irish writer and diplomat who knew Eban well from their days at the United Nations. Eban was, says O'Brien, "the most brilliant diplomat of the second half of the 20th century."

Eban's prestige as an elder statesman committed to territorial compromise with the Arabs gave him much credibility, especially in liberal circles. His dovish views were nonetheless tempered by a cold realism and a strict respect for the objective truth.

To take one important example very much under discussion today: While the Palestinians and their supporters have long maintained that UN General Assembly Resolution 194 grants Palestinians a "right of return" to present-day Israel, Eban pointed out that "no such 'right' exists. The very term 'right of return' has never featured in an internationally binding document" (Jerusalem Post, Aug. 19, 1989).

As Israel's representative to the ad hoc political committee of the General Assembly in December 1948 when Resolution 194 was drafted, Eban noted that he "made it clear that the admission of refugees was a matter for Israel's sovereign discretion and was not subject to legal constraints." The word "right" does not appear in the resolution. Any return of refugees requires Israel to grant "permission."

"The conclusion," wrote Eban, "is that entry into Israel is something that individuals or groups outside Israel have a right to request and Israel has a sovereign right to accept or reject."

Another example is the subject of Israel's "right to exist." This "right" has been under assault from numerous attackers (NGOs at the 2001 UN "anti-racism" conference in Durban, South Africa, for instance) who are determined to delegitimize the Jewish state in the eyes of the world.

Eban's voice was a rare expression of firm equanimity in a sea of vitriol. He would insist that there is no need to be defensive in asserting Israel's right to its existence because such a right "is independent of any recognition of [the state] and is certainly not dependent on the decision of a non-sovereign organization" (Jerusalem Post, Nov. 25, 1988).

The UN General Assembly Resolution 273 (III) of May 11, 1949, which admitted Israel into the UN, stated that "Israel is a peace-loving state able and willing to carry out its obligations under the UN Charter," which is based on the "sovereign equality" of all member states.

"It is impossible to exaggerate the transforming effects" of this resolution, Eban maintained.

Abba Eban in 1994

Calling the resolution of "transcendental importance," Eban argued that despite "much virulent nonsense" emanating from the UN about Israel (like the 1975 "Zionism is racism" resolution), "no nation involved in a struggle for contested legitimacy has received such potent support from the overall jurisprudence of an international organization."

Eban's meticulous knowledge of the historical record and scrupulously fair-minded approach to controversial issues is a rarity today and will be sorely missed.

גידי קורן וחברים

שירת הנוער

חבר סיפר לי בעצב שבנו הבכור חכיר לחם לפני שבועיים את חברתו הרצינית הראשונה שפגש בקולג'. נערה סינית. "שלא תבין, אצלנו אנשים ליברלים וקיבלנו אותה מאוד יפה. אבל זה עצוב, וזה רק באשמתינו, כי הילד חלך לבית ספר כללי ומעולם לא היה בתנועת נוער ולא נפגש עם נוער יהודי. שני הילדים הצעירים הולכים לתיכון יהודי וכשאני רואה את חיי החברה שלהם ואת מה שהם מקבלים שם, אני מבין איזה עוול עשינו לגדול".

עד כאן החבר. ביום ראשון, ה 17 בנובמבר התקיימה עצרת לזכרו של יצחק רבין. האירוע אורגן על ידי תנועות הנוער היהודיות והיתה שם כל הקשת הפוליטית מבית"ר דרך התנועות הדתיות, לדתר הבונים והשומר הצעיר. היתה זה ערב מרגש מאין כמותו, ולא רק בגלל הנושא, אלא בגלל האירזה והאנרגיה שהביאו תנועות הנוער בשירה, בהקראה, בחשיבה. חשבתי לעצמי: יש אנשים שלא יכולים להרשות לעצמם בכלכלת בית ספר יהודי- אבל כל אחד יכול לשלוח את ילדיו לתנועת נוער, ובכך ישמור על הילד מהתבוללות, כי הילד יפגוש ישראלים ויהודים. זוהי המסגרת שתשמור את חילדים שלכם בתוך עמם- ולא כדאי לזלול - לפני שתזיזו את הראש הם יהיו בגיל שלא תהיה לכם כל השפעה. אני, שילדי הלכו לשומר הצעיר ושניים מהם חזרו בעקבות זאת ארצה, מדבר מתוך ניסיון. ויש לכם בחירה של כל המגוון הפוליטי- מימין לשמאל. זו הדרך היחידה להציל אותם, ואל תקחו את זה בקלות. לא שיש משהו רע בנכדים מלובסקים- אבל כדאי שתתכוונו לזה ותלמדו עם המחותנים. אבל שישאר ביניכו.

חיגה המלצה לסרט שאסור לחחמיץ. סיפורה של הצירדת המקסיקנית האגדית פרידה קאלו שאביה היה יהודי גרמני ואימה מקסיקנית נעצרת. הסיפור נחדר, הרומנטיקה בשיאה, הנופים והצירים משגעים. וגם פרצת דרך קולנועית- שימוש בתוכנת מחשב שיוצרת קסטי סרט מצויר שמתארים את מה שעבר בראשה של הצירת- משהו מחמם. עשר בסולם קורן.

מה יהיה

נכון לעכשיו, שרון הוא ראש הממשלה הבאה, חליכוד מכפיל את כוחו ל - 36 מנדטים, העבודה יורדת ל- 19, שינוי קופצת ל- 12, ש"ס יורדת בחצי, ולישראל יש ממשלה יציבה. זה שצריך להמשיך בשיא הכוח למנוע את הטרור- מסכימים גם חימין וגם השמאל, אך לא נראה שחימין יתאמץ במיוחד למצוא מסלול לשלום, כי חלק גדול ממצביעיו אינם מאמינים בנתינת הנדה המעריבית לפלשתינאים. היעדר תסכם פוליטי ייתך קשות לכלכלה, לצירות, להשקעות בישראל. אבל אנחנו כאן רק יכולים להסתכל ולקוות לטוב.

קו העוני והקו הירוק

על פי הסטטיסטיקה האחרונה יש בישראל 1.2 מיליון נפשות מתחת לקו העוני. לאורה- מספרים מפחידים. אבל כשביקרתי בישראל לפני כשבועיים נצא לי לשמוע כמה דיונים מאוד מעניינים על משמעות המספרים האלה:

בניגוד לכל הארצות בעולם, שבהן מנסים אנשים להיטיב את מצבם הכלכלי ולחלק נופלים אל מתחת לקו העוני, בישראל יש עוני מתוך רצון. קבוצה גדולה של גברים החליטו לא לעבוד, אלא ללמוד תורה. לא רק שהם אינם תורמים לכלכלת בימם, הם גם לומדים מקצועות שאין להם שום קשר לחיים כלכליים מודרניים. החרדים בימ ללימודי המדע והמתימטיקה, ללימודי הכלכלה, השירותים ומה לא. וכך, גם אם יצאו בימם מן חימים להתרם לכלכלת בימם- לא יוכלו לעשות שום דבר אמיתי. וגם ילדיהם לא יוכלו. הבחירה הזאת בבורות ובעוני היא מוזעזעת, אם חושבים על זה ברצינות. מזעזע לא פחות הוא ששאר הישראלים תומכים בעניים-מתוך-בחירה בסכומים עגקים.

האבסורד השני של מפת העוני הישראלית הוא שהעגים מעדיפים לחצביע עבור הימין, אותו ימין שמשקיע מליארדי דולארים בכבישים עוקפים בשטחים ובשירותים למספר קטן של מתנחלים, במקום להשקיע בהם באופקים ובנתיבות. לאבסורד הזה אין את ערך בשום מקום בעולם.

לדברי רבים וטובים, חמצב הזה, שבו מעטים נשאים על גבם "עגים מתוך בחירה" ומתנחלים מתוך רצון, חולך להתפוצץ בקרוב. אלא אם כן....ארה"ב פתאום תבוא עם תקציב סיוע נרחב....(ישאשר ביניכו- חשבתו הודיעה ארה"ב על סל סיוע מיוחד של עשרה מליארד דולאר).

Reconstructionists mull relationship with Israel

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – The Reconstructionist movement is considering redefining its relationship with Israel because many of its members disagree with the current government's policies and many also see North American Jewry as an equal partner in ensuring the survival of Jewish culture, a view that clashes with classical Zionism.

At the recent Jewish Reconstructionist Federation (JRF) biennial convention in Montreal, new president Daniel Cedarbaum of Evanston, Ill., announced the movement's board of governors will establish a task force on Israel, in collaboration with the Reconstructionist rabbinic body and rabbinical college.

The JRF, which represents 103 congregations in the United States and Canada comprising 16,000 households, has not updated its position on Israel significantly since 1988.

At a convention workshop on Israel, moderator Moti Rieber, JRF mid-Atlantic regional director, said Reconstructionism was Zionist well before the idea was embraced by the American Jewish mainstream. In the 1930s, its founder, Rabbi Mordechai Kaplan, maintained that Jews needed a land of their own in Palestine to survive.

But, like Rabbi Kaplan, the movement has always recognized the importance of the Diaspora.

Reconstructionists' strong liberal views are increasingly at odds with what the Israeli government does and, Rieber said, there is a "growing tendency to want to wash our hands of the whole mess.

"In question is the entire Zionist enterprise. If the cost is so high in terms of our values… do we wish to support an Israel that does not live up to our ideals," he said.

The panelists represented the diversity and complexity of opinion in the movement, which has an intellectual tradition.

The most radical position was put forth by Benjamin Mordecai Ben-Baruch of Detroit, an outgoing board of governors member, who advocated that Reconstructionists stop being Zionist, and base their relationship with Israel on "ties of peoplehood" rather than with the state itself.

According to Ben-Baruch, North American Jewry and Israel are the two "Jewish civilizational centres," and they need each other.

"We need to reorient our thinking so that support of Israel is not interpreted or conceived of as meaning support of the state or of the government," he said. "We should excise from our vocabulary 'Zionism' and the 'State of Israel,' and start talking about the underlying values that unite us rather than get into conflicts over the politics."

In practical terms, he said that means ending donations to United Jewish Appeal and the Jewish National Fund and instead supporting those communities and organizations that "share our values and vision of the future."

Diaspora Jews do not need to "mediate" their relations with Israel through any political institution or Zionist organization, but can form bonds with those in Israel who share their outlook, Ben-Baruch said.

Sam Kelman of Cleveland, a JRF executive committee member, said he remains an "unrepentant Labour Zionist," but agreed that classical Zionism, with its emphasis on aliyah and the "mythology" of Jewish victimhood, has had its day.

Reconstructionists should be spending less time on halachic questions and more on developing an ideology that expresses their relationship with Israel.

There should, for example, be rituals designed for Yom Ha'atzmaut, he said.

"The political entity of Israel is essential, but Israel is not essential to the cultural development of the Jewish people – it's very important, but not essential," Kelman said.

The third panelist, Rabbi Amy Klein, director of the JRF's office in Israel, said her attachment to Israel had nothing to do with ideology. "It's a nostalgic attachment I can't explain," she said. Nevertheless, she has serious concerns about the direction the country is going in.

Her goal, she said, is for Israel to become "the core of Jewish civilization and culture, where everyone is treated equally, whether they are Jewish or not." To achieve that, she said, Reconstructionists do not need to abandon Zionism, but do need to rethink it.

She agreed that Jewish culture in North America and Israel are on "parallel tracks" and that Israel is "not the saviour of the Diaspora."

Diaspora Jews can criticize the political institutions without weakening their ties with the people of Israel, she believes. Reconstructionists should support those people in Israel who share the same ideals, she said.

Israel could be a "radically" different country in terms of more closely adhering to Western ideals of human rights and pluralism if another 200,000 Jews like herself made aliyah, she added.

No resolutions were tabled at the convention, which drew more than 300 delegates. It was the first such gathering to be held in Montreal since 1967.

Firebombed Prairie shul grateful for community support

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Last April, Saskatoon's Agudas Israel Synagogue was set ablaze by a Molotov cocktail in a crime that is still unsolved.

But while the perpetrator (or perpetrators) are still unknown, the shul's roughly 100 members are gratified by the outpouring of support from their fellow citizens.

"We were certainly shaken by the attack," said lifelong Saskatoon resident and shul spokesperson Gladys Rose. "But the level of support and sympathy we have received is indicative of how well-regarded the Jewish community is in this city and province. The financial and practical assistance we have received has been overwhelming."

The principal damage from the firebomb was to the lower level of the building that houses offices, classrooms and a library. Virtually all the books were destroyed.

"It was really a fluke about the books," Rose said. "The bomb was thrown into an unused classroom, which suffered the bulk of the damage.

"Unfortunately, two weeks before, we had had a problem with a dishwasher in the kitchen, which is above the library. We had suffered some water damage in the library and had moved all the books into that unused classroom while we repaired the library."

The congregation also had to rebuild its sisterhood gift shop, Rose said. While the gift shop initially appeared to be unscathed, the smell of smoke permeated the walls.

"Renovations usually take longer than you expect," she said, "but the repairs to the building are just about completed. We are just beginning to put our new books back on the library shelves. Some we have ordered but many of the new books have been gifts."

As for the empty classroom where the fire started, it has been rebuilt beautifully and is now being used, Rose said.

Canada's contribution is funneled through the Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA). This is in addition to the $50 million transferred each year directly to the Palestinian Authority for humanitarian purposes.

The CIC recently wrote to Foreign Minister Bill Graham outlining its concerns over the use of Canadian funds. Referring to the group's recent mission, Wilder wrote: "What we did not expect to learn was that contrary to your repeated assurances, UNRWA does indeed use textbooks that demonize, delegitimize and deny Israel's place in the region. Quite apart from the objective concern this revelation presents, the fact that Canadian officials did not ensure that you were apprised of this fact raises a whole other set of troubling questions."

Joseph Wilder

CIC is hoping to meet with Graham to discuss the UNRWA issue, but "we don't think it's proper for Canadian government funds to be used in this way," Wilder said.

"I don't know what to think of it. Every foreign minister going back to Lloyd Axworthy denies being complicit in these textbooks. I can only think their staff hasn't fully informed them, because the facts have been known for some time."

Rodney Moore, a spokesperson for Foreign Affairs, said, "We are well aware of this problem. It's something we've been working on for some years."

Canadian officials continue to call on the PA to put an end to incitement against Israel and to promote tolerance. Canadian support for UNRWA takes into consideration the entirety of the work the agency does, including valuable services provided to the refugees, Moore said.

For its part, he added, UNRWA sponsors "extracurricular activities for students that focus on peace education, human rights and conflict resolution." Canada is aware of problematic elements in the texts, but it is using its influence to improve them. UNRWA's work with school children has been praised by Israeli diplomats.

Questions about UNRWA's role in refugee camps have been circulating for years and UNRWA has responded to a variety of allegations with a rebuttal on its Web site (www.un.org/unrwa/myths/index.html).

Addressing the "allegation" that "UNRWA schools and textbooks teach hatred of Israel," the UN agency states that "the curriculum in the agency's schools is determined by the education authorities in the locations where it operates."

UNRWA also quotes Nathan Brown, professor of political science at George Washington University, who published studies on the subject. Summarizing Brown's findings, UNRWA states:

"Regarding the PA's new textbooks introduced in 2000 and 2001, he [Brown] states: 'The new books have removed the anti-Semitism present in the older books. While they tell history from a Palestinian point of view, they do not seek to erase Israel, delegitimize it or replace it with the State of Palestine. Each book contains a foreword describing the West Bank and Gaza as 'the two parts of the homeland.' The maps show some awkwardness but do sometimes indicate the 1967 line and take some other measures to avoid indicating borders; in this respect, they are actually more forthcoming than Israeli maps. The books avoid treating Israel at length but do indeed mention it by name. The new books must be seen as a tremendous improvement from a Jewish, Israeli and humanitarian view."

The UNRWA Web site attributes much of the criticism of Palestinian textbooks to the Centre for Monitoring the Impact of Peace (CMIP).

CMIP is a non-governmental, not-for-profit organization established in 1998 in New York State. In a November 2002 update of its report of the year before, which had examined texts used in grades 1, 2, 6, 7 and 11, CMIP examined 14 new books in addition to 26 high school final examinations in various subjects (www.edume.org).

Although it found some improvement in the treatment of Judaism's relation to Jerusalem, it found "the Jews are still presented in a negative light historically, yet at the same time denied any part in the history of the country shared by them and the Palestinians. Israel is still not recognized as a sovereign state, but is rather presented as a foreign entity imposed in 1948 on the land. It is a source of aggression, death and destruction to the Palestinians, especially the refugees among them who aspire to return to their former homes within its territory. Hence, no peace is sought after, but rather a war against Israel as the usurper aggressor and occupier is to be waged."

Israel target of UN and British ire

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Last week was a bad week for Israel in the court of world opinion.

After Israeli soldiers mistakenly killed a British man serving with the UN Relief and Works Agency (UNRWA) in the Jenin refugee camp, UN and British officials criticized Israel.

And as the Israeli military continued its war on terrorism, this time in the West Bank city of Bethlehem, the Jewish state risked the ire of the United States.

Israeli officials admitted Sunday that UNRWA official Iain Hook had been killed last Friday by Israeli fire.

Hook, who ran a UN project to rebuild homes in the Jenin refugee camp, was killed during an exchange of gunfire between Israeli troops and Palestinian gunmen, the army said, adding that soldiers mistakenly thought he was holding a weapon.

Issuing a preliminary investigation of the incident, the army said Palestinian gunmen had fired at Israeli soldiers from a UNRWA compound in the refugee camp.

The army also said the gunmen had used civilians as human shields during the clash, which erupted after soldiers surrounded the hideout of a local leader of Islamic Jihad.

Three army jeeps and a soldier wearing a bulletproof vest were hit by Palestinian fire coming from the vicinity of the UNRWA compound, the army said.

A UNRWA official disputed the Israeli account.

"Preliminary findings from our inquiry indicate that this is not true," Paul McCann, a spokesman for UNRWA said Sunday. Israel's "claim is incredibly incorrect."

McCann said an investigator would soon arrive from UN headquarters in New York to launch a full investigation into Hook's death.

UNRWA was created after Israel's 1948 War of Independence to help Palestinian refugees.

Israel came under attack earlier this year after Palestinian officials accused the army of carrying out a massacre in the Jenin refugee camp.

In August, UN officials issued a report refuting the massacre allegations.

For their part, Israel and U.S. Jewish groups have accused UNRWA of allowing terrorism to flourish in the refugee camps it services, particularly in Jenin.

Following the killing of Hook last Friday, the army expressed regret over the incident.

British officials criticized the Israeli actions and are demanding a full Israeli investigation.

In addition to dealing with what is a shaping up to be a public relations disaster, Israeli officials are also pressing ahead with the war on Palestinian terror.

Bethlehem is the latest West Bank city to come under Israeli control.

The army took over the city last Friday – a day after a Palestinian suicide bomber, who came from Bethlehem, killed 11 people aboard a Jerusalem bus.

Since taking over the city, Israeli soldiers have arrested some 30 suspected Palestinian terrorists, including three who were planning suicide bombings.

On Sunday, Israeli troops cordoned off the square around Bethlehem's Church of the Nativity, preventing worshippers from attending services.

The army sealed off all access to the church to prevent a repeat of the standoff last spring, when more than 100 Palestinian gunmen took refuge in the holy site, which Christian tradition considers the spot where Jesus was born.

Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon announced last Friday that the "Bethlehem-first" plan – under which Israeli troops left the city several months ago so the Palestinian Authority could demonstrate its ability to fight terrorism – had been called off as a result of the Nov. 21 suicide bombing in Jerusalem.

Meanwhile, the United States is urging Israel to end its operation in Bethlehem as soon as possible.

Last Friday, State Department spokesman Philip Reeker urged Israel to remember the consequences of military actions and to take steps to avoid civilian casualties.

U.S. officials have been repeatedly urging Israel not to take actions that would escalate tensions in the Arab world as the United States prepares for a possible attack on Iraq.

MAGEN DAVID ADOM
BAR MITZVAH PROJECT

Dear friends, family and community...

Hi. My name is Moshe Segal. In honor of my Bar Mitzvah on May 10, 2003, I will be taking part in a wonderful Mitzvah project called Magen David Adom.

As soon as I found out about this organization, I knew it was the right mitzvah for me to do. I was truly overwhelmed with the lives that MDA saves and the security it gives to Israel. At this time of war in the Middle East, Israel needs all the help they can get. I feel that is is my responsibility as a fellow Jew to help in any way that I can.

Magen David Adom provides vital lifesaving services such as emergency medical/disaster/ambulance/blood services - to every man, woman and child in every corner of the nation. What better way to save lives and help Israel in these difficult times?

That is why I choose to make a difference for Israel and to help save precious Israeli lives. I'm also asking my friends, my family and my community to send their "Gift of life" to Magen David Adom today; through Canadian Magen David Adom for Israel.

I know that you'll feel as proud as I do.

Thank you for all your help. I appreciate it, but, more important, so does Israel.

GA focuses on Israel-Diaspora relations

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

PHILADELPHIA, PA — The United Jewish Communities General Assembly (GA), held here last week, was an expression of solidarity between Diaspora and Israeli Jews.

Speaker after speaker at the three-day, 71st annual conference spoke about the urgency of supporting Israel during the current intifadah, and said Jews cannot afford to neglect their fellow Jews.

The GA, with almost 4,000 delegates, is the largest annual gathering of Jewish community leaders from North America, Israel and elsewhere overseas. Plans are for next year's GA to be held in Jerusalem.

United Jewish Communities is the umbrella organization of 156 Jewish federations and 400 independent Jewish communities across North America.

The conference's theme, Tzedek, tzedek tirdof – Justice, justice you must pursue – was introduced at the opening session.

David Marshall, GA international chair, said that the word tzedek connotes charity and righteousness as well as justice.

"There is [much] injustice in the world, and tzedek is the vehicle to pursue that justice," Marshall said. "Today's challenge is to meet unprecedented needs. Even with dedication and commitment, we know we can't fix everything, but we cannot stop trying. The pursuit of justice is a basic value."

Dorit Beinisch, a judge on the Supreme Court of Israel, said that the gathering is taking place at a difficult time.

"Free countries are fighting a terrorism that knows no restraint," Beinisch said. "The court's role is to ensure that the fight against terrorism is maintained within the framework of the law."

At a separate press conference, Israeli Deputy Prime Minister Natan Sharansky, who attended the conference in place of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, said it is a huge challenge for a democratic state to fight a war in which human lives are a tool for blackmail.

"It is difficult to wage this war alone, but we are not alone," Sharansky said. "[All] of North American Jewry was with us in the struggle for Soviet Jewry, and they are with us in today's battle."

Sharansky, who met with American government leaders in Washington, D.C., including U.S. Vice-President Dick Cheney, before arriving in Philadelphia, said Israel will be virtually the only country in the world that will be threatened if the United States declares war on Iraq.

"There is the [possibility] that Israel will be attacked, and we cannot afford to sit passively if we are attacked," he said.

In response to a question about how to boost Israel's image, Sharansky said that Jews need to show pride in their Jewish heritage and that they are proud of the Jewish state.

"We have to remember that fighting anti-Semitism brings more freedom and security. We have to have self-confidence that we are doing the right thing."

Sharansky said he is glad about plans to hold next year's GA in Jerusalem because tourism has dropped drastically in the past two years.

It is "alarming" he said, that large numbers of students no longer come to Israel to study. "It is important that they come to study in our institutions."

At an evening session sponsored by El Al Israel Airlines, Israel's Ministry of Tourism and the Jewish Agency for Israel, Sallai Meridor, chair of the Jewish Agency executive, thanked the crowd for helping Israel.

"Thank you for your solidarity and thank you for your missions," Meridor said. "They have added to our national strength.

"The war continues and the price is heavy. There is not one Israeli who has not lost a relative or friend. As well, poverty is up and unemployment has skyrocketed."

It is difficult, Meridor said, "but we will overcome because we have no choice. We are determined to protect the only state that the Jewish people have. The more pressure they put on us, the stronger we will get."

The most important thing, he said, is to continue to bring Jews to Israel. "Nothing is more important; nothing strengthens the morale of Israelis more. Nothing is more critical to the very existence of the country."

Also at the evening session, Prof. Judea Pearl accepted an honour for his son, murdered Wall Street Journal reporter Daniel Pearl, who was kidnapped and murdered in Pakistan earlier this year by Islamic fundamentalists after being forced to admit his Jewish heritage.

Jewish online resource launched

NEW YORK — MyJewish Learning. com, an online resource for exploring Jewish religion, history and culture, was launched Nov. 19 to coincide with the Chanukah season.

Inspired and funded by Edgar Bronfman and the Charles and Lynn Schusterman Family Foundation, the U.S.-based Web site is co-produced by Hebrew College and Jewish Family & Life.

The free service aims to be a resource for Jewish groups to cheaply enhance learning programs. It contains original content from experts in the fields of Jewish religion, history, culture and education, as well as content gleaned from research of existing sources. Its editors shape the information for online learning and edit all material on the site.

"Knowledge provides a lasting legacy. We [wanted] to spark a renaissance of ideas and learning," Bronfman said.

For Mitzna, now comes the hard part

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — If Haifa Mayor Amram Mitzna hopes to becomes Israel's next prime minister, he faces a daunting challenge: resuscitating a moribund Labor Party in a little more than two months.

A day after the dovish newcomer to national politics won a sweeping victory in Labor's leadership primary, political observers warned Mitzna that he had only passed the easy part.

The daily newspaper Ha'aretz noted that Mitzna has an extraordinarily short time to consolidate his position in Labor, neutralize potentially hostile camps within the party, win the loyalty of senior party members, organize a national election campaign and inject new life into a dispirited party.

Even then, his chances of winning the Jan. 28 national elections are considered slim: Polls show the Likud Party with a daunting lead over Labor.

Essentially, as one commentator noted in the Jerusalem Post, Labor chose Mitzna to be the next opposition leader, not the next prime minister.

If Labor loses in January, Mitzna might be asked to step down as party chairman. If he refuses, he might face a challenge for the party chairmanship next summer.

In last week's primaries, Mitzna received 54 per cent of the vote, incumbent chairman Benjamin Ben-Eliezer won about 39 per cent and MK Haim Ramon won about 7 per cent.

The soft-spoken Mitzna immediately extended an olive branch to his two rivals in a bid to unite forces in preparation for the national campaign.

Mitzna said his first task would be to unite the party "as one big beehive, a joint staff, in order to lead the Labor Party in the most important of all confrontations, with the Likud."

Critical to this will be reconciliation with Ben-Eliezer, whose withdrawal from Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's unity government – Ben-Eliezer was defence minister – precipitated Sharon's decision to call elections. A longtime party veteran, Ben-Eliezer still has a formidable political machine within Labor.

Mitzna offered Ben-Eliezer the No. 2 spot on Labor's Knesset list for the elections, but Ben-Eliezer said he needed time to consider the offer.

Mitzna, 57, is a former general who clashed with then-defence minister Sharon during the 1982 Lebanon War and commanded Israeli troops in the West Bank during the first intifadah in the late 1980s. His tenure as Haifa mayor is generally considered successful – the city is seen as a model of Arab-Jewish coexistence – but opponents say he is too close to business interests and has allowed virtually unchecked real estate development.

Continuing an Israeli tradition of white knights with little national experience – Ehud Barak and Amnon Lipkin-Shahak were two other ex-generals seen briefly as political saviours whose stars quickly burned out – Mitzna burst onto the national stage a few months ago and instantly became the frontrunner for Labor's chairmanship.

Described as aloof, somewhat stiff and yet open to counsel, Mitzna galvanized a left wing thrown into disarray when the peace process collapsed in the terrorism of the intifadah.

The national unity government of Sharon and Ben-Eliezer refused to negotiate with Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat or even contemplate diplomacy while violence continued.

But Mitzna said he was willing to negotiate under fire and would talk with any Palestinian leader, including Arafat.

If talks fail to yield a deal, he said, Israel would withdraw unilaterally from most of the West Bank within a year. Mitzna also pledged to uproot settlements in Gaza right after taking office.

On the economy, Mitzna backs less spending on settlements and more on retirees, students and development towns.

Such positions provide voters with a stark contrast to the Likud. Mitzna's stance toward the Palestinians – and his insistence that disengagement will allow Israel to focus on its own domestic problems – is likely to appeal to left-wing voters who complained their voices weren't heard during 19 months of national unity government.

Whether such positions will win over the mass of Israelis in the centre – whose votes have proved crucial in the last three elections – is far less clear. Most polls show Israelis moving to the right since the start of the intifadah.

The national vote will come into greater focus after the Nov. 28 Likud primary, when Sharon takes on Foreign Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

Writing in Ha'aretz, commentator Yoel Marcus said Mitzna will stand a better chance if the harder-line Netanyahu beats Sharon.

Using Netanyahu as a foil, Sharon has presented himself as a responsible elder statesman committed to an eventual peace with the Palestinians and to keeping close ties with the United States.

Mitzna will be far worse off if Likud sticks with Sharon, whose popularity only grows as the intifadah intensifies, and who can "eat naive politicians for breakfast," Marcus wrote.

Amid the cautionary tales, a supportive voice was found in former Labor legislator Eli Goldschmidt. Writing in the daily Ma'ariv, he said Mitzna has two important characteristics of a good politician: "a successful sense of timing and civilian courage."

He lauded Mitzna's willingness to stick to his convictions, including his pledge to speak with Arafat, despite the controversy it might spark. Goldschmidt also said the test of Labor's senior members will be their willingness to support Mitzna. If they do, he said, Labor could again offer voters a real alternative.

With the primary behind him, Mitzna set to the immediate task of seeking agreement on a method for selecting Labor's list for Knesset. Representatives from his and Ben-Eliezer's camps met to discuss the issue ahead of this week's Labor Party convention, which was expected to decide the matter.

Mitzna, who favors an open primary system, said last week that "all candidates will have to be elected," but Ben-Eliezer wants to leave the decision to the 4,700 members of the party convention, which is dominated by his supporters. Mitzna knows this could hinder his efforts to assert control over the party. As well, other senior Labor members – whose places on the list might be adversely affected – have warned they might bolt the party if convention members set the list.

SEARCH for HEAD OF SCHOOL
Greenfield Hebrew Academy - Atlanta, Georgia

The Katherine and Jacob Greenfield Hebrew Academy, a 50-year-old, PK-8, Jewish community day school in north Atlanta, seeks a head of school to begin work July 1, 2003. The head of school reports to the board of trustees and oversees the work of some 100 faculty and staff and the education of 550 students.

As Atlanta's first day school, it has a long tradition of educational excellence and of service to Atlanta's entire Jewish community. Within recent years, GHA has been awarded the Jerusalem Prize by the World Zionist Organization and also twice named a Blue Ribbon School of Excellence.

GHA's mission is to provide Jewish students an outstanding Jewish day school education, integrating Judaic and general studies in a traditional curriculum that is both challenging and stimulating.

GHA's handsome and secure 18-acre campus in north Atlanta includes athletic fields, terraces, playgrounds, and 118,000 square feet under roof, all dramatically built into and around a series of ravines. Facilities are outstanding.

Currently, GHA is poised to move to its next level, at which the school's many strengths can be consolidated into a focused, highly effective, and well-established institution of education (both general and Judaic). The school's next head will have the pleasure and privilege of working the transformation, in the context of the school's rich traditions.

The Academy requests both applications and nominations, which may be sent to:

Eliot Arnovitz and Shelley Cooper
GHA Search Committee Co-chairs
c/o Fitzgerald + CO.
3060 Peachtree Road
Atlanta, GA 30305

Applications consist of a resume and a letter of interest explaining how the individual's experience, skills and interests correspond to the leadership statement (available in response to e-mail request). Applications received after December 18, 2002, when the search committee begins its candidate review, cannot be guaranteed full attention. The search is confidential.

Nominations may be sent by e-mail to eliot@arnovitz.com or rscooper@attbi.com

Boat bomb attack injures four soldiers

By ARNON REGULAR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Four Israel Navy seamen were injured late last Friday night when a fishing boat laden with explosives blew up close to a naval gunship off the northern coast of the Gaza Strip.

One soldier was lightly wounded while three others sustained moderate injuries in the apparent suicide bombing. Two Palestinians on board the fishing boat were killed. Islamic Jihad took responsibility for the attack. The incident took place at around 10:30 p.m. last Friday when the region's naval control centre noticed a Palestinian fishing boat that crossed the no-sailing area. A naval Dabur gunship was scrambled to the area and tried to stop the boat. The two people on board ignored the calls to stop, which included a spray of water spurts and warning shots. Several minutes later, the fishing boat exploded, injuring the gunship and the sailors.

An Islamic Jihad announcement released Sunday in Beirut identified the two men on the fishing boat as Jamal Ali Ismail, 21, from Bureij, and Mahmad al Masari, 19, from Beit Hanoun.

In response to the attack, the Israel Defence Forces (IDF) imposed a total naval closure on the Gaza Strip coastline, Palestinian sources said, adding that the army had also rescinded all fishing licenses until further notice.

This is not the first time that such an attempt at harming IDF naval personnel has been made. In November 2000, a suicide bomber blew himself up next to a similar gunship (in that case, no injuries were reported). In addition, several attempts at infiltration from the Gaza Strip into Israel through the sea have been prevented.

IDF sources said the Palestinian terror organizations in Gaza were trying to find "indirect" ways to carry out terror attacks because of the difficulty in crossing the separation fence that surrounds the Gaza Strip. Since the beginning of the intifadah more than two years ago, no Palestinian cell from the Gaza Strip has managed to carry out a terror attack inside Israel.

Nov. 18
• Esther Galia, mother of seven, was killed when Palestinians fired on her car as she drove from Jerusalem to her home in Kochav Hashachar. The Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade of Fatah, claimed credit.

Nov. 19
• Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz endorsed Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's bid to retain the Likud Party leadership.

Nov. 20
• Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert endorsed Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's bid to retain the Likud leadership.
• The Simon Wiesenthal Centre announced plans for a new $150 million (US) tolerance centre in Jerusalem. Frank Gehry, the Toronto-born architect, will be in charge of the centre's design.

Nov. 21
• Eleven people were killed by a Hamas suicide bomber in Jerusalem: Dikla Zino, 22; Sima Novak, 56; Hodaya Asraf, 13; Marina Bazarski, 46; Yafit Ravivo, 13; Hadassah Helena Ben-David, 32; Varga Mirsa, 25; Ella Sharshevsky, 44; Michael Sharshevsky, 16; Kira Pearlman, 67; Ilan Pearlman, 8.
• The trial of Tanzim militia leader Marwan Barghouti resumed in Tel Aviv.

Nov. 22
• Prime Minister Ariel Sharon ordered the army to carry out a "wide and extensive operation" in response to Thursday's suicide bombing on a bus in Jerusalem that killed 11 people. The directive came after the prime minister held consultations with senior IDF officials and Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz.

Jews confront the 'December Dilemma'

'There's a party going on and we're not invited'

By JENNIFER PAQUETTE
Special to The CJN

The "December Dilemma" is one of those clichés of modern Jewish life. But ask two Jews and you'll get 10 different answers about what exactly it is.

For many, it's dealing with non-Jewish in-laws and extended family. For others, it's pressure, both secular – from shopping malls and generic "holiday pageants" – and spiritual, as Christians around us celebrate the birth of their messiah.

In a Nov. 18 program at the Miles Nadal JCC titled December Dilemma: Being Jewish in a Non-Jewish World, Alena Strauss helped a diverse group confront this seasonal woe head-on.

What comes to mind when you hear the words "Christmas" and "Chanukah?" This was the group's first talking point, spawning a range of positive and negative responses.

A few common threads emerged: music, food, families, parties, gifts. Yet even here, there were differences of perception: a participant commented that Chanukah music can't really compete with Christmas carols.

One woman said she was uncomfortable not with Christmas itself, but with the way Chanukah, a relatively minor holiday, "gets beefed up" to compensate. When asked by her kids' school to speak on Chanukah, she said she agreed on the condition she could return for another holiday. Her Sukkot visit was well received, she said, because "the kids didn't know anything about Sukkot," and were fascinated by its "fresh" symbols.

Participants agreed that attempts by non-Jews to "include" Chanukah in holiday celebrations often backfire, leaving Jews feeling more alienated than before.

One mentioned a store window display with fake snow, evergreen trees and other imagery. In a smaller window nearby, there was a menorah and, for an extra Jewish touch, a jar of pickles.

For Strauss, such attempts at multiculturalism often seem to "wipe out differences and emphasize similarities," at the expense of sacrificing what is unique about Judaism. The challenge, according to Strauss, is "to make diversity work, but let people maintain who they are."

This modern challenge stems from the fact that "Jews are not an immigrant community anymore."

With this comes a loss of insularity. "We have the desire to participate in the broader community," Strauss said, "but we wonder if it's okay to participate and still be who we are."

The consensus seemed to be that the season's religious aspects are less annoying than its commercialism. One parent said she took her children to the home of religious Christian friends to observe their celebration. "I like that they do that. I much prefer my children to see that," than be flooded with secular Christmas experiences.

Yet more than one participant spoke of growing up in England, a society that, said one woman, makes more of an "assumption that you are celebrating Christmas."

Strauss agreed that in December, that assumption can lead to the oppressive feeling that "there's a party going on and we're not invited."

With psychological training and PhD-level studies examining interactions between Judaism and psychology, Strauss has taken her interests into the real world through her teaching at Kolel: The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning. Titled "Conversations About Conversion," her course offers – outside a synagogue setting – a chance for Jews and non-Jews to discuss psychological aspects of conversion.

Strauss's program was part of the Nadal JCC's ongoing adult education series. Upcoming programs will feature speakers such as Rabbi Aubrey Glazer and Chashi Skobac on unique aspects of Judaism, including Jewish meditation.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. I just found out that I am pregnant for the first time and I have no idea what I can or cannot eat. I also feel quite queasy and am worried that I'm not eating enough.

A. The only things that you really want to avoid in pregnancy are alcohol, caffeine, aspartame and any undercooked foods such as sushi or undercooked beef or pastry.

But aside from these, there are many foods that you may have an aversion to, so avoid those to limit nausea as well. Many women experience nausea during pregnancy, especially in the early stages, and, therefore, eat much less than usual. This is normal. Just make sure the food that you do eat is nutrient dense, and if you are losing weight or vomiting frequently, see your doctor.

Try to drink to avoid dehydration. Some good nutrient-dense choices are proteins, so try, meat, eggs, fish, poultry, milk, cheese or yogurt or nutrient-dense fruits and vegetables such as broccoli, peppers, strawberries, cantaloupe, carrots, squash and sweet potato.

The foods that you are craving will be the most satisfying, so allow yourself to eat them. Eating something is better than nothing.

Mazal tov. Enjoy your pregnancy.

Q. My two-year-old son refuses to eat. I swear he could go all day without eating a thing. What should I do? Did I mention he would gladly eat licorice at all meals?

A. This is such a common complaint among young children. As long as your child is growing and gaining weight appropriately, you should not be forcing your child to eat, nor should you be anxious about it or make it an issue or a battle. The more stressed you appear and the more focus you put on your child's eating, the worse it will be.

Let your child tell you when he's hungry and let him tell you when he's full. Forcing kids to eat when they're not hungry teaches them to eat just because food is around, not because they're hungry. Depending on a child's age, you should, however, insist that your child sit at the table with the family for a reasonable length of time (five to 15 minutes), even if he chooses not to eat. Having family meal times will be your best way to improve your child's eating. No one likes to eat alone.

Max Haines: Canada's murder maven

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

"Murder," Max Haines said nonchalantly, speaking in a low, unassuming voice. "That's what I do."

Haines is Canada's murder maven. He has been writing a syndicated column about that grisly topic for the past 30 years.

Crime Flashback, which appears in the Sun's Sunday edition on a full page spread, is read by an estimated three million readers in 40 newspapers in Canada, Mexico, South America, Fiji and the Arab state of Qatar.

Attracted by strange and unusual cases of homicides, Haines has written more than 2,000 columns since 1972. He is also a best-selling author. His 19th and most recent book, published by Penguin, is Unnatural Causes. It describes 60 "heinous crimes" from around the world.

Among his subjects are George Joseph Smith, an Englishman who had a habit of murdering his wives in bathtubs, and Joyce Cohen, a Florida woman who shot her husband to claim his multi-million dollar estate.

A mild-manned person who has an aversion to blood and is opposed to capital punishment, Haines gleans his information from prisoners, police reports, lawyers, trial transcripts and newspaper reports.

His climb to fame was entirely accidental. For years, he had been writing crime stories for his own pleasure and filing them away in a drawer. "It was a hobby of mine," he explained in an interview.

Shortly after the Sun made its debut, Haines' wife and number one fan, Marilyn, advised him to dredge up a story and submit it for publication. "She said, 'That rag will print anything.'"

At the time, Haines was in the pantyhose business, never expecting his life to be altered by a tale about murder and mayhem.

The piece he showed the Sun's managing editor, Ed Monteith, concerned the notorious axe murderess Lizzie Borden. Monteith liked it, paid Haines the grand sum of $15 and asked for more.

Haines immediately blew the $15, treating Marilyn and his two daughters, Susan and Maureen, to Dairy Queen ice cream desserts. Soon enough, Haines became a regular fixture in the new, racy tabloid.

When a readership survey found that Haines had a considerable following, the publisher of the Sun took him out to lunch and offered him a full-time position as a crime columnist. Encouraged by his family, Haines accepted the job.

Since then, in search of arresting material, he has travelled to 40 countries and visited scores of prisons. Haines has met anywhere from 50 to 100 of the murderers who have appeared in his columns and books. "I've liked most of them," he said.

Some were none too bright, but others were brilliant. Virtually all of them were the products of dysfunctional families burdened by poverty and afflicted by drug, alcohol and child abuse.

Quite a few have been Jewish, from Joel Rifkin, who holds the New York state record for homicides, to Saul Betesh, who killed a Toronto Portuguese shoeshine boy.

The most interesting criminal he has ever profiled is Graham Young of Britain. As a teenager and adult, he methodically poisoned people, including his parents.

Young was an extremely bright but twisted individual who amassed an awesome knowledge of pharmacology and put it to deadly use. Finally apprehended by Scotland Yard detectives, he is now serving a life sentence. To Haines' regret, he was not granted an interview with Young.

As much as he is appalled by murder, Haines does not believe the state should repay a murderer in kind. "The taking of a human life is a horrendous deed under any circumstances."

Haines and his two sisters, Shirley and Lukey, were born and brought up in Antigonish, a small town in Nova Scotia.

His father, Alex Hains, a Lithuanian Jew who immigrated to Canada in the early 20th century, was a cattle dealer. Gussie, his mother, hailed from Chatham, New Brunswick.

Being the only Jewish family in Antigonish, the Haines' were a novelty, not always for the better. Anti-Semitism dogged his childhood and adolescence, and some of his experiences were so jarring that he prefers not to see them in print.

He left Antigonish in the 1950s after studying at St. Francis Xavier University. "The Maritimes, as it is today, was a depressed area," he said.

He landed on his feet in Montreal as an accounts manager for a finance company, and then broke into the garment trade.

He has done well by his specialty as a crime writer. Three of his anthologies, Canadian Crimes, Murder Most Foul and Multiple Murderers, were bestsellers. And his board game, An Evening of Murder remains in circulation.

Israeli artist's paintings depict Harmony in Colour

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

An exhibition of lively paintings by Israeli artist Yehudith Aisenstat runs at Gallery 133 until Nov. 29.

Titled Harmony In Colour, the exhibition was opened by Consul General of Israel Meir Romem. Paul Wise of Gallery 133 hosted the opening reception.

Aisenstat's large, bright, colourful canvases of primarily reds, blues, greens and yellows with black and white outlines, are partly abstract and partly realistic. Her everyday people and scenes are laden with a warmth and frivolity.

Born in Jerusalem, Aisenstat began painting at the age of eight and won first place at age 14 with her painting of Moses in an international art competition of children's paintings based on biblical themes.

She studied under master painter Marcel Janco, one of the pre-eminent figures of the Zurich Dada movement. She has exhibited her work in many institutions in Israel, including Beit Yad Lebanim at Ra'anana, the Ramat Gan Museum and the Petach Tikva Museum.

She has had three exhibitions at the Perry Art Gallery in New York and before bringing her paintings to Toronto, she had a successful showing in Beverley Hills.

Following the exhibition, Gallery 133 will continue to showcase a selection of Aisenstat's paintings.

For more information, call Gallery 133 at 416-504-6099 or email gallery133@on.aibn.com.

Key musicians leave orchestra

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

What is happening at the Toronto Philharmonia?

In the last few years, the North York-based orchestra has seen some of its most recognized musicians either let go or resign, spawning a series of bitter disputes and accusations the orchestra has taken a step backward musically.

However, Philharmonia president Murray Chusid says there was nothing unusual in the orchestra's change of personnel. Auditions were held early in the season and the best musicians were chosen to perform during the current season, he said.

Meanwhile, two of the Philharmonia's former musicians, onetime principal bass David Lasker and principal oboist Senya Trubashnik, have asked the Toronto Musicians' Association to investigate the way they were let go. Lasker, who served as principal bass for 13 years, is claiming a contract offer as an "expanded orchestra section bass," tendered only weeks before the orchestra's first concert, was "mocking, insulting and deceptive."

Trubashnik has asked the musicians' group to investigate his dismissal in August 2000. He said it came of the blue at a meeting with conductor and music director Kerry Stratton.

In a brief telephone interview, Stratton declined to comment on the cases, saying "it's a matter that's between the musicians, the board and the union (the Musician's Association)."

"I've filed my own charges with the union," he added, though he would not indicate the nature of the charges.

In addition to the departures of Lasker and Trubashnik, others to have left the orchestra in recent years include David Miller, who resigned in July as principal cellist after 15 years, Joseph Pepper, Marc Childs and Grace Hong. Morry Kernerman left several years before.

Like Trubashnik, all were accomplished musicians who held senior positions with the orchestra and who had experience playing with some of the world's great musicians. Miller played as principal cellist with the Canadian Opera Company and National Ballet of Canada.

Lasker was a full-time member of the Winnipeg Symphony Orchestra for 10 years and after moving to Toronto in 1984, played with the National Ballet and Brantford Symphony.

Trubashnik, a native of the former Soviet Union, played for 18 years as principal oboe of the Moscow Philharmonic, five years as associate principal oboe of the Israel Philharmonic, 10 years as associate principal oboe of the National Symphony Orchestra of Belgium and has played under Zubin Mehta, Leonard Bernstein and with Isaac Stern and Yo Yo Ma.

Kernerman served as assistant concertmaster of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra, Pepper, who was principal second violin for the Philharmonia, played for the Philadelphia Orchestra while principal violist Marc Childs was former principal with the Hamilton Philharmonic. Hong, the Philharmonia's second violin, now serves as concertmaster for Orchestra Toronto.

In a letter to the Musicians' Association, Miller states the departures have crippled the orchestra:

"Now there is no full-time concertmaster or principal second. The violin section has no consistent leadership, the audience is confused by different people appearing on stage to take the concertmaster's bow and the strings are somewhat dispirited and ragged. There is no consistent principal oboist to lead the wind section and with little rehearsal time, the winds cannot develop as an ensemble."

Thirty-eight musicians are under contract for the current season, though the orchestra can expand as required, Stratton said.

In interviews with The CJN, Miller, Lasker and Trubashnik stated the orchestra had taken a major step backward and sorely misses the professional, high-level playing the departed musicians contributed.

But Chusid rejects those suggestions. In fact, he said, "what we've been doing in the last two years is to upgrade the orchestra considerably. To speak of the orchestra being downgraded is just plain wrong."

Chusid pointed out the orchestra continues to perform difficult pieces like Beethoven's 9th Symphony to tremendous popular acclaim and sold out audiences.

Chusid dismissed the musicians' complaints and denied suggestions there was anything amiss in their departure. "In the music world, these are the kinds of things that happen. One artist doesn't think it's as good as it can be."

In any organization, he said, "there is always somebody who thinks someone has it in for them."

Musicians, he continued, "have artistic temperaments and the conductor is the same sort of person. Such people have deep feelings. You can't order them around like people in an office. You have to give them some leeway."

Bill Skolnik, executive-director of the Toronto Musicians' Association, would not comment on the musicians' complaints, saying such matters are confidential.

However, he said the association is a self-governing body and its members, which include all members of the Philharmonia, have agreed to abide by its code of ethics and to resolve their disputes through a mechanism set out in the association's by-laws. The association attempts to employ conciliation to resolve disputes though there are provisions for arbitration as well as an appeals process.

Miller, who resigned in mid summer, said he made his decision to leave when he saw a host of talented musicians either leave or be pushed out of the orchestra.

"These are the ones with the high professional credentials. These were the ones responsible for me quitting the orchestra. Those were my friends and colleagues. Those were the ones who helped attain high quality and made it fun to be there."

Trubashnik said that late in the concert season in 2000, he became concerned that only two days of rehearsal time had been set aside prior to a concert, the first public performance in 40 days. "I told him (Stratton)...the orchestra plays bad and we [did not] improve... I told him we need more rehearsals."

Trubashnik recalls Stratton telling him to bring his suggestions for changes to him at the start of the fall concert season. When he did so, he was stunned to learn that Stratton had decided to fire him.

Yiddishist Nathan Garnick loves being on stage

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Nathan Garnick loves to be on the stage. He makes people laugh, sing, and as a director, he turns them into performers.

A regular at the Yiddishland Cafe, Garnick, 82, recently presented a production of Shalom Aleichem's Stories of the Wise Men of Chelm in Yiddish and English.

Garnick has given numerous presentations from the Yiddish classics and contemporary authors. His ability to present a Yiddish work and blend it with English has endeared him to audiences throughout the country and beyond.

His love of acting and singing, he says, goes back to when he was a child. "Every teacher I had wanted to put me on the stage. My parents hated it because they had a low regard for actors."

Garnick said they told him that he was going to grow up to be a bum. "They had a feeling that actors do not live good family lives. They said they were womanizers."

He realized that he didn't have the temperament to be a career actor, so he attended the Central High School of Commerce. "I wanted to make a good living, have children and live a stable family life, which I achieved," said Garnick, who operated his own retail furniture business.

As a part-time student later in life, he studied psychology, philosophy, literature and the art of short story telling at the University of Toronto and took Yiddish classics in translation at York University.

"I am now retired, but by no means idle," he says.

Looking back, he says that unlike other men who have mid-life crises, he studied drama with Dora Mavor Moore, who taught him about therapeutic recreational theatre, which is community rather than commercial theatre.

With gratitude, he says that "[Moore] directed me to the Yiddish literacy theatre."

For more than half a century, Garnick has worked both as a solo performer and with groups.

"Working with amateur groups makes me happy, because I know that the performers are also fulfilling and enriching their lives. But above all, I like to perform because I feel the warmth of an audience."

Yiddish still has great power, he says.

"You can say things in Yiddish that you can't translate into any other language. You can't find an equivalent for 'naches fun der kinder' or 'ick forgin dir nit.'"

"Try it!" he challenges.

"I know my parents meant well in trying to eradicate this inborn desire and talent and I'm delighted that they didn't fully succeed.

"When I perform, people have some good laughs, which we all need today."

Garnick, who spends six months a year in Florida, where he also performs and directs groups, is working on making some of his solo scripts into playletts, "so I can work with aspiring actors."

Over the years, he has produced plays for Mount Sinai Hospital, Beth Tzedec Congregation, Skylight Theatre in Earl Bales Park and Leah Posluns Theatre, and he is the founding director of the Heritage Players at the Wagman Centre.

His long list of parody presentations include Mame Loshen, Amerika Gonef, Bintl Brif, The Joys of Parenthood, Food My Mother Fed Me and Laughter is Wealthy.

Garnick said that, once after one of his Shalom Aleichem programs, a man with eyes red from crying came to him and said, " 'I haven't heard Yiddish spoken like this since I laid my parents to rest. My youth at home all flooded back.'

"This is my reward," he says.

BOOKER PRIZE BROUHAHA BRINGS BRAZILIAN NOVELIST BELATEDLY INTO SPOTLIGHT

Both the London Jewish Chronicle and the New York-based English-language Forward devoted feature articles this month to Montreal author Yann Martel's triumphant win of Britain's prestigious Man Booker Prize for his novel, Life of Pi.

Martel's fanciful tale focuses on an Indian boy who, after a shipwreck, shares a lifeboat with a tiger. What especially interested the Chronicle and the Forward was Brazilian Jewish writer Moacyr Scliar's strident claim that Martel borrowed the plot from his own novel, Max and the Cats, which was published 20 years ago.

In an author's note in Life of Pi, Martel admitted reading a review of Scliar's novel but not the novel itself. Scliar had initially hinted at legal action but has apparently come to recognize the supreme compliment that Martel has paid him. (Truth be told, Scliar didn't exactly invent the plot either, since one version or another has been floating around since the days of Noah and the ark.)

Martel's British publisher told the Chronicle that Scliar had become very magnanimous about the matter and had promised to read Life of Pi before making any judgments. He is apparently not suffering a bit from the renewed attention being paid to his work because of the controversy. Indeed, the Forward used the occasion to spotlight Scliar's apparently significant contributions to Jewish letters.

Born in Porto Alegre, Brazil, in 1937, Scliar grew up with a strong Jewish identity and wrote a series of novels, including the popular and highly acclaimed Centaur in the Garden (1980), which focuses on the "perplexity of being Jewish in Latin America." According to Forward reviewer Ilan Stavans, Centaur in the Garden has inspired lofty comparisons with authors such as Franz Kafka, Philip Roth, Mordecai Richler and John Updike. The Martel-Scliar literary bout will have served a noble purpose, Stavans concluded, if it leads new readers to Scliar's door.

A new English translation of Centaur in the Garden is due for publication in the United States next spring.

Pirouetting to Fame: Thornhill teenager Sarah Clark, a student of the Koffler Centre's Academy of Ballet and Jazz, has been signed to perform in the Bolshoi Ballet's production of Mozart's The Magic Flute. Clark, who won out over thousands of others, is a perfect cover-girl for the Koffler Centre, having also appeared on the May cover of Dancer magazine. For information about the Academy, phone 416-636-1880, ext. 258.

* * *

Literary Machlokhet (Dispute) No. 2: Britain's Chief Rabbi Jonathan Sacks has revised his new book, The Dignity of Difference, after some Orthodox rabbis in Britain and Israel complained that several passages were "heretical." Expunged from future editions will be the references to faiths other than Judaism that sparked the controversy.

Arts Briefs

• A combination Chanukah party and book launch for Queer Jews, an anthology with contributions by Joanne Cohen and Oscar Wolfman, takes place at Glad Day Bookshop, Nov. 30.

• The Chrylark Arts and Music presents the Duke Trio – violinist Mark Fewer, cellist Thomas Wiebe, pianist Peter Longworth – performing works by the late Srul Irving Glick and other composers. Heliconian Hall, 35 Hazelton Ave. $15. Dec. 1, 3 p.m.

Modigliani's Servant Girl.

• The Millennium Youth Orchestra, conducted by Gabriel Friedman, performs seasonal, classical and holiday songs with guest pianists Ori Friedman and Konrad Harley. Adults $17. Vaughan City Playhouse, 1000 New Westminster Dr., Vaughan. Saturday, Dec. 7, 8 p.m. 905-709-4057.

• The Civic Light Opera Co. brings back its original musical version of The Wonderful Wizard of Oz, by L. Frank Baum, featuring the score by James P. Doyle that predates MGM's 1939 film classic. Fairview Library Theatre. Adults $17.50, Thursdays $12.50. Dec. 12 to 22. 416-469-8450.

Out of Town

• The exhibit Einstein, the "most comprehensive presentation ever mounted on the life and theories" of the discoverer of the theory of relativity, opened this month at the American Museum of Natural History in Manhattan. The exhibition features many personal and scientific papers, some never public exhibited before. Co-sponsors are the Hebrew University of Jerusalem and the Skirball Cultural Centre of Los Angeles. Until Aug. 10, 2003.

Assembly panel dissects anti-Semitism in Canada

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

PHILADELPHIA — McGill University historian Gil Troy said he resented having to talk about anti-Semitism in Canada at last week's United Jewish Communities General Assembly.

"I hate the topic. I resent that 50 years after the Holocaust, that topic is back on the table."

Troy was part of a panel discussion at the three-day conference that also included Canadian Jewish Congress President Keith Landy and National Post columnist Robert Fulford.

Troy called himself a "Daniel Pearl Jew," referring to the Wall Street Journal reporter who was kidnapped and murdered earlier this year in Pakistan shortly after being forced to admit to his Jewish identity on videotape.

"I can understand that he wandered down that alley because he was told he could be what he wanted to be. He was supposed to be quadruply protected.

"He was an American, he was a graduate of Stanford University, he was a journalist and he worked for the Wall Street Journal. Those things were supposed to be his shield," said Troy.

Talking about the recent violent protest at Concordia University that forced the cancellation of a speech by Benjamin Netanyahu, now Israel's foreign minister, Troy said that he was disturbed by his colleagues' silence.

"I expected my non-Jewish colleagues to say that the riot was unacceptable. I expected some kind of statement that [did not originate] with the Jewish community."

He said Concordia's campus moratorium against Mideast related events and advocacy, which was lifted last week by Concordia's board of governors, was a "colossal error that offended free speech. Sometimes you buy peace at the cost of your soul.

"It is a stunning educational failure to have a campus in which students are afraid to express their ethnic backgrounds."

It is unacceptable to be afraid to talk about an issue, Troy said. "We must mobilize students who are not involved. We must take back the campus."

A Concordia student who was involved in planning Netanyahu's speech at the university told the panel that Concordia students clearly do not face terrorism as Israelis do, but they do face it in a different way.

"Our detractors and detractors of Israel seek to terrorize Jewish students. They do not blow us up or physically harm us, but they do try to instill terror in our hearts and minds," he said.

"We planned the event because we refused to succumb to this terrorism. Jewish students do have rights," he added.

Troy said anti-Semitism is a broad and blunt instrument. "There is violent anti-Semitism, there is vulgar anti-Semitism, and there is genteel and elegant anti-Semitism."

It is the latter type of anti-Semitism that we need to focus on, he said. "It usually starts with discomfort, and then it builds quickly."

He said Jews must ask why people hate Israel instead of just disagreeing with its policies. "Why, of all nationalisms, is Zionism singled out?

"Underlying Zionaphobia is 'this thing about Jews.' It comes back again and again to haunt us. We see no other country battered like that."

He is disappointed in Canadian leaders, he said. "I did not hear any support after the Concordia riot.

"Instead of telling our leaders that they must do more, we just increase our security budget and go quietly away."

Fulford said that Israel was supposed to be a safeguard for the Jews, but it has turned into a new way to attack Jews.

"Anti-Semitism changes its shape and context, and it moves, in our case from right to left. The left has taken over the pro-Palestinian cause. It has developed a tremendous affection for victims, and it has decided that the Palestinians are the victims.

"If they look seriously at all their reasons for being pro-Palestinian, they would realize they could transfer those reasons to about 30 or 40 nations around the world," said Fulford.

The key to fighting anti-Semitism, Landy said, is education. "We have to talk to non-Jews and we have to get involved on campus.

"There are others out there, such as the Hindu and Sikh communities, that we need to engage, and we need to engage our leaders."

Jews must also learn the lesson, he said, that evil words lead to evil deeds. "We must always take anti-Semitism seriously. To prevent it from threatening Canada, we have to keep it out of the mainstream, or push it back to the margins."

Sending in a dupe to disarm Saddam

By PER AHLMARK
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The United Nations weapons inspections chief and Iraq have agreed on tentative terms for the conducting of weapons inspections, which, in theory, could begin in the very near future. But the success of any such deal depends as much on the men who will carry out the inspections as it does on the details of when, where and how they are carried out.

Opinion

Hans Blix will head the UN arms inspectors charged with searching for, finding and destroying Saddam Hussein's weapons of mass destruction. I have known Blix for more than 40 years. In 1960, he was my deputy when I was a leader of the Swedish Liberal Youth organization. Since then, I have followed his career closely. He became Sweden's foreign minister for a year and then served later as director-general of the International Atomic Energy Agency in Vienna, Austria.

Personally, Blix is amiable and has a sense of humour; politically, he is weak and easily fooled. I can think of few European officials less suitable for a showdown with Saddam. Indeed, it is with utter disbelief that I watch television news about Blix's negotiations with the Iraqi dictator's henchmen.

The world has been amply warned about Blix's weaknesses because he has a track record of compounded failure. When Blix headed the IAEA before the Persian Gulf War of 1991, he blithely assured the world, after several inspections, that nothing alarming was happening in Iraq. He delivered the clean bill of health that Saddam had hoped for when he began hiding his atomic factories and nuclear ambitions.

Since then, we have learned all too unambiguously that Saddam is obsessed with procuring weapons of mass destruction – chemical and biological warheads, as well as atomic bombs and the missiles to deliver them.

Former experts of Iraq's nuclear weapons program who have fled Baghdad for the West have confirmed this. They have told us about Iraq's determined and costly efforts to obtain doomsday devices. Indeed, it is now clear that Saddam was but a year away from securing his first atomic bomb when the Gulf War broke out.

After that war, UN inspectors found and destroyed huge amounts of chemical and biological warheads, as well as the facilities to produce nuclear weapons. Despite his grave failings as IAEA chief before 1991, Blix once again came to lead UN disarmament inspectors, this time in tandem with another Swede, Ambassador Rolf Ekeus.

Blix, naive and relatively ignorant about technical details – his field is international law – is easily misled. Even after the Gulf War, he failed to realize that the Iraqi officials, who were again assuring the UN that they were hiding nothing, were nothing but consummate liars. Indeed, Blix believed that Iraq had no program at all for nuclear arms. David Kay, perhaps the most effective arms inspector, insisted that he did not trust them. But Blix reproached Kay for his attitude. You must believe in official information, Blix implied.

The turning point came when Kay initiated inspections of suspect buildings, without notifying the Iraqis about his intentions in advance. This new, aggressive inspection strategy had dramatic consequences: Kay discovered material confirming that Iraq was only 12-18 months away from producing a nuclear device.

This historic discovery ended up in a confrontation at a parking lot in Baghdad. The UN cars were surrounded by 200 Iraqi soldiers and a mob, ordered out to the scene by Iraqi officials. For four days and nights, the siege continued, as Kay and his colleagues used satellite telephones to fax crucial documents to the West.

Blix had opposed the raid. Fortunately, Ekeus backed it and supported the inspectors during the siege. I have met a number of experts on Iraq's weapons of mass destruction and they often compare the two Swedes: "Ekeus is brilliant," they say. "Blix is terrible."

When the current UN inspection team was being put together in 1999, both Ekeus and Blix were among the candidates being considered to head the new group of inspectors. Friends of Iraq in Paris and Moscow consulted Baghdad to see which of them Saddam would prefer. France and Russia then suggested Blix. Surprisingly, the Clinton administration accepted that decision.

Saddam's chemical and biological arms, and his determination to get nuclear weapons, are a threat to the world. The dictator could use these arms himself or make them available to terrorist organizations. The issue of war and peace depends on a man repeatedly duped by the Iraqi regime.

The Bush administration probably understands Blix's weaknesses. My guess is that the United States will not allow Blix and the inspectors that he oversees to be deceived by Iraq again. But regardless of how this crisis develops from this point, the UN has neglected its duties by asking a wimp to lead the inspectors who are supposed to stand up to the brute of Baghdad.

Per Ahlmark is a former deputy prime minister of Sweden.

Youth bowling league is fun for all ages

By NEIL BECKER
Special to The CJN

Bowling is not just for birthday parties – it's a popular sport played regularly by young and old alike.

The fine art of bowling presents an opportunity to laugh with new friends and develop the inner confidence that comes from being part of a team, while getting a healthy dose of exercise at the same time.

Every weekend beginning right after Labour Day, Newtonbrook Bowlerama houses the Youth Bowling League, a casual league that welcomes bowlers of all levels between the ages of 4 and 18.

"During the weeks, they set various individual accomplishments and get to feel part of a team, which really boosts their egos," says league supervisor Robyn Weinberg.

The program is divided by age to ensure bowlers compete against kids with skills at their own level.

Those under eight bowl two games per session in the peewee group.

The youngsters get a helping hand from master bowler Bob Stevens, who is more than willing to pass on his wisdom with the ball.

"He walks around, and for those who want it, he will point out where to stand and the form for throwing the ball," says Weinberg.

The second group consists of those between eight and 10 who play three games. They're the bantams.

These bowlers, along with the peewees, can participate in tournaments regardless of skill level. They are paired with various masters to make the experience positive.

Kids between 10 and 14 fit into the junior category. Last but not least are the seniors, who are between 14 and 18.

During the bowling season, which stretches into either late April or early May, Weinberg keeps all the score sheets, which she uses to determine individual and team handicaps. A handicap can be calculated after only two games.

These handicaps, which tell how well a bowler is playing, help them get a fair shake at tournaments.

"I like to be really loud at tournaments, and I always lose my voice at the end of the day," says 18-year-old Stephen Jones, who averages in the 180s and has been bowling for 15 years.

"My family and friends are always cheering me on and I've met a lot of great people."

As with other sports leagues, the bowling league offers a closing banquet at the end of the season, which includes the presentation of individual awards and trophies.

The older teams receive plaques and the younger divisions get medals. Venues changes from year to year and in past years juniors and seniors have partied at places like Canada's Wonderland and Playdium.

Meanwhile, the younger groups dine out at places like Chuck E. Cheese's and then go to the movies.

The Youth Bowling League welcomes new recruits. For more information, Weinberg can be contacted by e-mail at robynweinberg@sympatico.ca.

Israeli nationals defeat Macedonia in soccer friendly

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

SKOPJE, Macedonia — Israel's national soccer team registered its fourth consecutive victory with a 3-2 win over Macedonia in a friendly international in Skopje last week, maintaining new coach Avraham Grant's perfect record with Israel.

The win came thanks to Eli Biton's late goal in the fourth minute of injury time after the hosts had pulled even from a 2-0 first half deficit and had hoped to end the match with at least a draw.

Two first-half goals by Michael Zandberg and Avi Nimni gave Israel a 2-0 lead at halftime as Israel dominated with a determined defensive performance. But in the second half it was Macedonia, who held England to a 2-2 draw in Southampton last month, that managed to level the score two minutes before injury time through a goal that looked offside.

Buoyed by the equalizer, the hosts tried to push for the winner, but they were undone by a swift counterattacking move as Nimni put Biton through to grab the winner.

Biton was a late substitute for Kfir Udi, coming on in the 86th minute. He collected the ball on the halfway line and charged forward with four Macedonian defenders giving chase. But Biton kept his calm and fired his shot past substitute keeper Jane Nikoloski to give Israel the dramatic win.

Israel's starting lineup was very different from the one that beat Malta in the Euro 2004 qualifier last month as Grant made seven changes.

Maccabi Petah Tikva's 19-year-old rising star Gal Alberman, who played only 16 times for his club and was a surprising addition to the national team, marked his debut by playing in the heart of midfield. Flu-stricken Adoram Keise was replaced by Yigal Antebi, who played only two minutes in Malta and was also making his first start.

In other developments, Maccabi Haifa announced it will not be allowed to play its next home European clash in Israel. Haifa faces AEK Athens in the third round of the UEFA Cup, playing the first leg on Nov. 28 in Greece, with the return two weeks later, probably in Cyprus.

The Israel Football Association sent an urgent request on behalf of the club to European governing body UEFA, but it knew the chances of the ban being overturned were remote.

Israel has been deemed off limits to visiting teams due to the volatile Mideast security situation.

"UEFA is continuously and constantly monitoring the situation in the Middle East. Hopefully, progress will be made within the next few months in order to allow Israeli teams to again play in front of their home crowd," a UEFA spokesperson said.

Haifa, the first Israeli club to play in the Champions League, hosted its three Champions League group matches at the GSP Stadium in Nicosia, Cyprus. Both Haifa and AEK Athens were eliminated after the first phase, but qualified for the UEFA Cup.

Hapoel Tel Aviv and Maccabi Tel Aviv have also been forced to play their home European ties (games) either in Sofia, Bulgaria or Nicosia.

Despite the apparent disadvantage of conceding home ground, Israeli clubs have a good record at the GSP Stadium in Nicosia, having won there on four occasions and lost only once.

Hapoel Tel Aviv beat AC Milan 1-0 in the UEFA Cup last season and Olympiakos and Manchester United both lost 3-0 to Maccabi Haifa this season. Haifa also recorded a 4-0 win over Belshina Bobruisk of Belarus in the Champions League second qualifying round at the same stadium.

ספרותנו

יעל זליגר

שרה, שרה

"הדוד אנרי נושא אלי עינים מצומצמות: רצחו לכם את רבין." אלה המלים האחרונות בספרה של רונית מטלון (הוצאת עם עובד). במקביל לאסון הלאומי מעצבת הסופרת שני מעגלי התרחשות נוספים: העלילה האישית הישראלית והעלילה האישית הצרפתית. מהקורא נדרשת יכולת ריכוז על מנת לעקוב אחר פיתולי הסיפור; לא תמיד יש אצל רונית מטלון מוקדם ומאוחר. על אף מורכבות זו ובזכות כשרונה המבריק של מטלון אנו יכולים לטוות את המבנה העלילתי האישי ואת האנאלוגיה הלאומית-יהודית.

שתי גיבורות (שרה ועופרה), שתי משפחות (ענייה ועשירה), שתי עדות (אשכנזית ומזרחית), ישראל והגולה. בקוטב האחד השקפת עולמה של אמה של עופרה ש"כל אחד צריך לדעת את מקומו", ובקוטב שמנגד השקפת עולמה המרדנית של שרה שאינה נוהגת לקבל מאומה כמובן מאליו. בלשון וירטואזית, פרי עטה רבת ההשגים של רונית מטלון נרקמת מפה סיפורית סבוכה של מצבי סבל ואלימות. הסבל מהווה את נקודת החיבור בין הפרטי והלאומי. כל מערכות יחסי האהבה בסיפור אף הן בפוטנציה קרקע להתפרצות אלימה בין בעל לאשה או בין אשה למאהב, בין אם לבנה או בין אם לבתה וכן בין שתי החברות שציר הסיפור נע סביבן.

עופרה שונה משרה. עופרה שהיא בעצם הדוברת ברומן מתוך היותה כותבת את הביוגרפיה של שרה, שואפת קודם כל לגיבוש אישיות בפני עצמה; "די עופרה, אמרתי לעצמי, מספיק להיות תולעת לחיות חיים של מישהו אחר. תחיי כבר את החיים שלך....".

שתי חברות וסיפורן שובר הלב. שני סיפורים הנארגים זה בזה על רקע שאלות של זהות פוליטית, לאומית, אתנית, מינית ומוסרית.

שרה, שרה הוא הרומן השני של רונית מטלון. ספרה הראשון, זה עם הפנים אלינו, זכה לביקורות נלחבות.

Cheese Latkes w/Concord Wine Sauce

1 cup pressed cottage cheese	3/4 cup milk
3 eggs	1/2 tsp. salt
1 cup flour	3/4 cup golden raisins, plumped in apple juice
3 tblsp. sugar	oil for frying

Beat cottage cheese until smooth. Add eggs, flour, sugar, milk and salt. Blend well. Fold in raisins. In large heavy skillet, heat 1/4" oil over medium heat. Spoon cheese mixture by tablespoon into hot oil and fry each latke until golden brown on both sides. Drain on paper towels. Yield: 24 latkes.

Concord Grape Wine Sauce	1/2 cup sugar
1-1/2 cup Concord grape wine	1 tblsp. grated orange zest

In heavy skillet bring wine and sugar to boil, stirring until sugar dissolves. Add zest and simmer until sauce is reduced by 1/3. Makes about 1 1/3 cups. Serve hot or cold.

About Food

Dear Norene

Levana Kirschenbaum has delighted New Yorkers with her bakery, restaurant, catering and cooking classes for over 20 years. Now she shares her kosher recipes and kitchen wisdom with cooks all over the world in Levana's Table, Kosher Cooking for Everyone (Stewart, Tabori & Chang, $55).

The magnificent colour photos and 150 delectable recipes reflect her Moroccan upbringing, including vegetarian dishes, as well as foods for the Jewish holidays and for entertaining.

"I rarely fry anything else," Levana writes, "but there is no Chanukah without latkes! In my catering career and for my friends and family at home, I have made thousands upon thousands of them and always watch them disappear at an alarming but flattering rate. There is no doubt about it: latkes are a heavenly treat, and once we enter a house where the heavenly fragrance of fried foods wafts through the kitchen, even spartan dieters will sheepishly watch their noble resolution not to each such things turn to dust."

Levana's kitchen wisdom: the oil must be hot, or it will seep into your food, making it inedibly greasy. Don't crowd the pan; it lowers the temperature of the oil. If you must fry in advance, fry until 90 per cent cooked through. Store in a shallow pan in one layer. (You can place the latkes standing upright in the pan like a deck of cards.) Cover tightly. Refrigerate or freeze. Reheat uncovered at 350 for 15 to 20 minutes if latkes were frozen.

LEVANA'S POTATO LATKES

1 medium onion
vegetable oil for frying
1 cup flour
4 eggs
pinch of nutmeg
salt and pepper
8 large Idaho or russet potatoes, peeled applesauce, yogurt or sour cream for serving

In a food processor fitted with a grating blade, grate onion. Heat 1/4 inch oil in a heavy frying pan until very hot. Meanwhile, in a bowl, combine flour, eggs, onion, nutmeg, salt and pepper to taste and mix thoroughly. Grate potatoes in the food processor or by hand and immediately stir them into the batter. Work very quickly so they do not have time to get discoloured.

Form small patties, about 2 1/2 inches in diameter and lower them into the hot oil, or drop the batter into the oil by heaping tablespoons. Fry until golden, about 3 minutes on each side. Remove latkes and drain them on paper towels. Serve with applesauce, yogurt, or sour cream.

Vegetable Latkes: Substitute a mixture of zucchini, carrots and parsnips (about 3 pounds) for the potatoes. Add seasonings of your choice such as oregano, garlic and basil.

Sweet Potato Latkes: Substitute sweet potatoes for regular potatoes and add brown sugar, cinnamon and ginger to taste.

Happy Chanukah 5763

I'm here!

[Adele Sacks photo]

The young discoverer's proclamation

EDITORIAL

There can be no doubt that the photo above by Adele Sacks captures a sincere, unrehearsed, spontaneous instance of personal excitement and celebration. The word taglit, meaning discovery, written boldly in Hebrew and English on her gold scarf, is upside down.

More poignantly, however, the photo also captures an instance of the pure, unabashed, enthusiastic affiliation of this beautifully smiling young woman with Jerusalem.

"I'm here," she proclaims happily, proudly and determinedly to her people from the steps of the Old Jewish Quarter.

"I'm here, a Jew in Jerusalem," she proclaims to a world frequently hostile to Israel and to the Jewish people.

"I'm here, at home, in the only city that has ever been the capital of the Jewish people," she proclaims without equivocation to the enemies of the Jewish people.

On the eve of Chanukah 5763, there could hardly be a more important or a more urgently needed message for us, for the world and for the enemies of the Jewish people, to hear.

What we wrote last year in this space, alas, is still true today. "Israel and Judaism, Israelis and Jews are under siege: a siege that resorts to and revives chilling images of classic, hateful, medieval anti-Semitism."

Thus, our young smiling "discoverer" extending her arms and her soul in wide embrace of Jerusalem is a most timely reminder of our sense of peoplehood and purpose as we approach the Festival of Lights. She, her generation and the generations that will follow are the lights of the eternal Chanukah that will forever illuminate our dark winters.

And as we prepare to light the candles of this year's Chanukah, we hope our readers will reflect on the significance and the timeliness of the young discoverer's multi-directed and multi-messaged proclamation.

We also hope our readers will enjoy the eclectic selection of feature writing that we have assembled in the following pages of the supplement.

This Chanukah, let us teach our children how to give

By GIL TROY

Jews are preparing to celebrate Chanukah, our festival of lights, during a particularly dark period. The world seems to have gone mad. Islamic extremists declare war on the West, and many, especially in Europe and Canada, deny and dither, afraid to respond too assertively. Palestinians declare a war of terror on Israel, and too many, including Israelis and Jews, are quicker to blame Israel, the victim, rather than the Palestinian perpetrators.

It is precisely during such bleak moments that we are compelled to celebrate. Rejoicing in past victories helps put our current troubles in perspective, reminding us that we have suffered before, and not just survived but thrived. Moreover, with terrorists trying to rob innocents of any joy, and any semblance of a normal life, observing holidays becomes yet another act of defiance, a leap of faith asserting our commitment to stick to the everyday.

Nevertheless, even as we celebrate, it behooves us to reassess the meaning of the holidays and how we observe them. Precisely now, during this time of crisis, we should be rededicating ourselves to Jewish renewal and finding the joy in Judaism, not just the "oy." Such a re-evaluation is particularly necessary in the case of Chanukah, a holiday whose meaning has changed over the years.

While Chanukah's basic plot line has remained unchanged for almost two millennia, the Chanukah we know and love is a 20th-century invention. The central themes we associate with Chanukah, of heroism and power, both physical and spiritual, were Zionist ideas; for centuries, the rabbis dwelled on the miracle of the oil. When the Zionist revolution a century ago re-evaluated Judaism, the Maccabees' story proved that Jewish history was not just about the anti-Semites who hated us and the rabbis who taught us. The Maccabees were home-grown heroes, rooted in Israel's ancient soil, and willing to fight, if necessary, for their homeland, their beliefs, and their freedom. In fact, before World War I, many Jews used Chanukah as an opportunity for giving, not receiving, donating the modern equivalent of the "shekel," the biblical coin, to the Zionist cause.

It is time to rejuvenate the holiday by making it a high point on our tzedakah calendar

At the same time, the other great 20th-century Jewish revolution, the rise of North American Jewry, also transformed Chanukah. As with Passover, the theme of "freedom" resonated, giving the ancient Jewish holiday a contemporary American flavour. But, even more important, the quirk of scheduling, as well as the anthropological linkage to another winter-solstice festival of lights, made for the gift-giving frenzy we see today.

As a delightful holiday of dedication, Chanukah has long been child-centred. Traditionally, Jewish communities used Chanukah to rededicate themselves to their children's Jewish education. In that spirit, parents gave children "gelt," or coins, to sweeten the experience of Torah study.

In the modern world, this festival of gelt-giving and of lights, became the popular Jewish response to Christmas envy, the malady that seized many a Jewish household each December. In fact, with eight nights, and thus eight opportunities for gift-giving, Chanukah became a way for Jews to trump their Christian neighbours.

Tragically, both Chanukah and Christmas have become "festivals of consumption," in historian Daniel Boorstin's apt phrase. A minor sweetener to facilitate Torah study has become the major focus of the holiday, even as this traditionally minor holiday has become a major highlight on the North American Jewish calendar.

This, then, is the year to rededicate Chanukah, and ourselves, to re-orient the holiday. It is time to rejuvenate the holiday by making it a high point on our tzedakah calendar, our schedule of giving, while teaching our children about generosity, not just materialism.

It is not realistic, nor necessary, to declare a gift-giving ban. Most of us, thankfully, do not have to choose between self-indulgence and good works. Moreover, to set up false choices by being too austere defeats the educational purpose behind the gelt-giving. But is it too much to ask for this year, that every family, every school, every Jewish institution, every Chanukah get-together carve out some time to think about others who are less fortunate, others with whom we should share our good fortune? Is it too much to ask that as we teach our children the joy of receiving gifts from loved ones, we also teach them the joy of giving gifts to strangers?

The smallest of gestures can teach this most important of lessons. During the traditional Chanukah grab bag, one additional toy can be thrown into the hopper, and that toy can be designated for a child in need. Similarly, children awash in presents could be asked to give one old toy and one new toy to tzedakah. Relatives from far away who are going to send Chanukah cheques can be encouraged to allocate part of their gift to a charity of the children's choice, or parents and children can agree on a certain percentage of all gifts to be donated. Even more important, acts of loving kindness, good deeds, should be encouraged so we go beyond many Jews' tendency to assume that the only way to help others is materially.

'Let us designate thoughts, prayers, time, talent and money

This Chanukah, of all Chanukahs, why not take advantage of the eight nights, the eight candles, to designate our thoughts, our prayers and our gifts of time, talent and money in the following directions:

On the first night of Chanukah, let us dedicate ourselves to the victims of Palestinian terror, hoping to bring a little light into their lives: terrorists have slaughtered nearly 700 people, and maimed thousands. We must adopt families of the victims, embracing them, supporting them, befriending them, sending both love and money. For more information on how your family, school, synagogue or friendship circle, can adopt a family, send a Chanukah toy basket or take any number of initiatives, visit www.walk4israel.com.

On the second night of Chanukah, let us dedicate ourselves to the kidnapped Israelis, honouring their heroism, and that of their families: Since October 2000 the families of Adi Avitan, Binyamin Avraham, Omer Souad and Elchanan Tenenbaum have been caught in a painful purgatory, unsure of what Hezbollah terrorists have done with their loved ones. These four families share a unique bond of anguish with the families of Ron Arad, Zachary Baumel, Zvi Feldman and Yehuda Katz, who have been missing since the 1980s. For more information, including addresses of public officials to whom you should write, visit www.hatufim.com.

On the third night of Chanukah, let us dedicate ourselves to the children of Israel, who deserve to live in freedom, free of fear: Israeli society has proved itself remarkably resilient, but the war, combined with the economic troubles, takes its toll. We must be proactive, not just reactive, and think about how to help improve the quality of Israeli life. One lovely initiative is the Books for Israel Project, an attempt to get new and slightly used English books sent to Israeli schoolchildren to help compensate for budget cutbacks. For more information about this project, including how to set up local chapters, visit http://up.to/b4i.

On the fourth night of Chanukah, let us dedicate ourselves to the institutions of Israel, the well-oiled infrastructure that keeps the society functioning: Even as we champion new initiatives, we need to continue supporting agencies that have laid the foundation for the Jewish state, and help make it thrive. To name only a few, during these difficult times, Hadassah continues to maintain and modernize Israeli medical facilities, the Magen David Adom (the Israeli Red Cross) serves all people in Israel under very trying circumstances and the Jewish National Fund continues renewing and rebuilding the land.

On the fifth night of Chanukah, let us dedicate ourselves to our local Jewish communities, renewing our collective ability to help us renew ourselves and our own Jewish identities: Even while fighting fires abroad, we need to keep our home fires burning, as it were, by supporting our local synagogues, schools, federations and agencies. Let us challenge ourselves by asking not only how much money are we willing to donate, but how much time are we willing to volunteer this coming year.

On the sixth night of Chanukah, let us dedicate ourselves to neighbours in need, bestowing gifts on neighbours who are suffering: Most of us live in cities marked by huge disparities between haves and have-nots. Those of us who have should take the time to help those who have less, both Jews and non-Jews, seeing what we can do to make sure that none of our neighbours go to bed hungry, cold or lonely, and that none of our neighbours are deprived of the joy of this season.

Eight nights, eight new designations

On the seventh night of Chanukah, let us dedicate ourselves to non-Jewish friends and causes, understanding the power of affirming our common humanity, and of helping one another: It is too easy, during these times of Jewish stress, to turn inward. These last two years, we have certainly seen the power of Hillel's teaching, "If I don't care for myself, who am I?" But let us not forget the second part of that phrase: "And if I only care for myself, what am I?" The United Way, Centraide and dozens of other organizations are happy to help us help others.

On the eighth night of Chanukah, let us dedicate ourselves to the power of teaching, of leading our children by example: If every night, we channel our children's charitable impulses, giving a guided tour of the possibilities of giving, on this, the last night of Chanukah, let us ask our children to take the first baby steps in this world of responsibility and great satisfaction, by asking them to pick a charitable deed, a mitzvah for someone else they plan on doing.

The time and resources are limited; the work is great – and overwhelming. Yet our sages teach us that it is not upon us to complete all the work, nor are we free to evade it. No one should feel guilty for failing to carve out a charitable moment on every one of the eight nights, yet no one should feel free to ignore this challenge completely.

For decades now, kids have greeted each other every morning of Chanukah with the question: "What did you get last night?" This year, perhaps, we can also teach our children to ask: "What did you give?"

Off to Israel to experience Jewish life in the 21st century

By RABBI DOW MARMUR

While our neighbours are leaving for Florida, my wife and I are getting ready to go to Israel for the next few months. In past years, snowbirds would tell me they preferred Florida to Israel because Florida was much cheaper and no less Jewish. Today, they tell me Israel is too dangerous. The fact that, historically, living with danger and being Jewish go together escapes them.

As for me, I feel at home in Israel, not least in these dangerous times. For the same reasons, I surmise, I feel less at home among most Diaspora Jews, with their crocodile tears about Israel, their feigned indignation about the media and their "expertise" they've acquired from yet another "solidarity mission."

The crocodile tears: The received wisdom of most leaders of the community, particularly those associated with fundraising, is that Israel is in mortal danger, fighting for its survival. Listening to some of them, I'm at times left with the impression that they believe the Jewish state is the current version of the Warsaw Ghetto in Nazi times.

'I am not very popular with "missions"'

But Israel is not in mortal danger. True, it is under great pressure from homicide bombers and foreign governments which, because of their need to appease their Muslim populations, dump on the Jews in general and Israel in particular. But precisely because there is a Jewish state there will never again be a Warsaw Ghetto. And the ostensibly pro-Muslim noises can easily turn into anti-Muslim riots, particularly in Europe, where loyalties are fickle.

Of course, we must not minimize the menace of terrorism in Israel or the danger of global anti-Semitism. That's why we have to remain steadfast – irrespective of our political orientation – in support of Israel in its determination to defend itself. And we must never let up our vigilance in the face of anti-Semitism in whatever guise it may appear. But that is very different from panic-mongering, which angers Israelis and prevents others from visiting them.

By being in Israel, I feel liberated from the imagined fears, and can concentrate instead on the real issues: the day-to-day problems of existence and the real debates, now heightened by the impending elections. Living one's life is more wholesome than speculating about how others live theirs.

Which brings me to the feigned indignation of media bias. Revelation, in our tradition, comes through the Torah, not through the newspapers. Those who write the columns have their own puny agendas. If we disagree, we could stop reading what they write. The fact that most of us don't, but prefer the mild self-flagellation, suggests, perhaps, that we need to be angry in order to show solidarity and assuage our sense of guilt at not doing something more substantial for Israel.

To do something substantial would mean more than supporting institutions and individuals most affected by the intifadah. It can never be less than giving money, but it must be much more. My sense of realism is strong enough not to advocate total, or even partial, aliyah, but it does mean more than the symbolic and brief "solidarity mission." Exchanging Florida, or a part of it, for Israel may be a good start.

"Solidarity missions": Part of the problems with these, as I have observed them in Israel, is that they feed participants' belief that Israel is under siege and in mortal danger. If all you experience is briefings by fundraising officials and their "consultants" in the unreal environment of depleted luxury tourist hotels, what you thought you knew before you came will be confirmed now. The anecdotal encounter with a distant relative who enlists your help because s/he wants to get out of the country is also likely to confirm your prejudice.

That is why I am not very popular with "missions," even though I am on the spot and a potential resource person. I may tell people what they, and particularly their organizers, don't want to hear.

I may remind them, for example, that the Yishuv, the Jewish population of Eretz Yisrael, has lived in danger for at least the last 120 years or more. At times the danger is more acute, as is the case now. But to predict annihilation is as misleading as seeing peace around the corner. If only Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat were sent into exile, the "transfer" of the Arab population organized, or someone other than Ariel Sharon became prime minister: there is no shortage of unrealistic panaceas. "Solidarity missions" thrive on them.

When, in the past, I would brief Jews and non-Jews alike before travelling with them to Israel, I would promise them only one thing: that they would return more confused than they were now – albeit on a higher level. Such confusion is a necessary prerequisite in the pursuit of truth. Panic-mongers, irate newspaper readers and "heroic" participants in "missions" don't like that message. That is why the debate in our own community is so shallow. By refusing to affirm the complexities and learn from ordinary Israelis, we are being polarized into bigots and dreamers, often both at the same time.

I am on my way to Israel to come closer to the reality – and the truth – of Jewish life in the 21st century.

Criticism of Claims Conference is undeserved

By ROMAN KENT

The only one who never makes a mistake and cannot be criticized is the one who never does anything. Since the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany has existed for 51 years, and during this period of time has been called upon on a daily basis to execute voluminous decisions and duties on behalf of the survivor community, there are those who find cause to pass judgment on certain actions or inactions pertaining to Holocaust survivor issues.

Understandably, no organization that has existed for this long and has accomplished so much can escape some form of criticism. However, I would like to ask those who have been so critical of late whether the recent disapproval aimed at the Claims Conference is justified or undeserved.

As a Holocaust survivor and someone intimately involved with the Claims Conference for more than a decade, I have never encountered any person connected with, or working for its leadership, who did not have the well-being of survivors at heart. I can state with certainty that the Claims Conference is not our enemy. Some may differ from us in their thoughts, methods and approaches. But let us not forget that even among survivors, we often have different ideas about what is beneficial for us and we question the best means of how to accomplish our goals.

Jewish community must help survivors, survivors must unite to help themselves

In the long run, having a diversity of opinions generally turns out to be quite constructive. Working together, we can achieve our common goal of providing the maximum benefits for survivors, and for needy survivors in particular. As far as I am concerned, we need the input of each and every survivor. Because there are so few of us left, each remaining voice is precious.

We survivors must ask ourselves honestly what we really want from the Claims Conference, and then ask ourselves whether it is in a position to fulfil our needs. I think we could answer this question more easily if we followed the sentiments of Samuel Gompers, a well-known labour leader of yesteryear.

In 1894, Gompers, one of the founders of the American Federation of Labor in 1886, made a comment during negotiations for better conditions for workers that can be summed up into the catch phrase "more justice, less revenge." I think I speak for most, if not all, survivors when I relate the same philosophy to issues concerning our needs.

We need "more": more home and medical care, more health insurance, more social care, more compassion and understanding. And last but not least, we need much more help from the Jewish community.

To achieve the "more," we must take into account the past and the future.

In 1951, when the newly formed Federal Republic of Germany announced its willingness to negotiate compensation for Jewish victims of the Holocaust, there was no one to negotiate on our behalf. States negotiate with states. Most Holocaust survivors were stateless persons, dispersed throughout all corners of the world.

Thus, the Claims Conference was formed from the union of the 23 largest Jewish organizations in the free world to negotiate on behalf of "world Jewry," with the material compensation to be paid by Germany for its damage to individual survivors and to the Jewish people as a whole.

But when the conference was formed, we survivors did not want to be part of anything that had to do with Germany. We wanted to put the past behind us as much as possible, pick up the pieces, start a new life and raise our families. Negotiating with Germany was not uppermost in our mind at that time nor in the foreseeable future.

Although the Claims Conference has been in existence for more than 50 years, interestingly enough, it was only about 12 years ago that two survivors organizations, one from the United States and one from Israel, actually applied for membership. For historical accuracy, it must be said that the two groups – the American Gathering of Jewish Holocaust Survivors and the Centre of Organizations of Holocaust Survivors in Israel – were accepted as full members with great reluctance.

Today, much has changed, both in the attitudes of Holocaust survivors and within the conference's structure. The influence of survivors today is at the highest levels in the organization. For example, of the conference's four leaders, two are survivors (myself and Moshe Sanbar, chair of the executive committee). Under president Israel Singer, who is the son of survivors, the eight-member negotiating team consists almost entirely of survivors. In addition, the executive and allocation committees include numerous survivors. There is no doubt that survivors have become an integral part of the management of the Claims Conference.

Yet, we should continue to insist on having an even more influential voice.

Direct survivor participation in negotiations with Germany for compensation for former slave and forced labourers resulted in obtaining hundreds of millions of dollars for individual survivors. I must emphasize that although this was a significant achievement, the German government specified criteria for who would receive payments, conditions by which the Claims Conference must abide while processing the claims.

Having said all that, I cannot help but notice the irony existing today. During the past few years, an increasing number of individuals and organizations have jumped on the bandwagon to criticize the Claims Conference. Up until about 1995, there seemed to be no condemnation of the conference as it secured financial compensation for tens of thousands of survivors with the active participation of a few survivors on the negotiating committee. It was a very different organization than today, with fewer compensation programs and much smaller allocations.

'We survivors must be united'

So why has it recently encountered a barrage of what I deem to be unfair accusations? The old adage – "No good deed goes unpunished" – comes to mind.

This axiom can be applied to the Claims Conference because the organization now has funds available for distribution to organizations and institutions that assist needy survivors, funds that were obtained from the recovery and sale of unclaimed Jewish properties in the former East Germany, as well as other compensation funds.

Let us place the source of this newly acquired "fortune" in historical context. During Germany's reunification in the early 1990s, the Claims Conference, with the help of the U.S. government, negotiated for the return of Jewish properties in the former east Germany to their original owners or their heirs. Any property that went unclaimed would revert to the conference.

This was a tremendous accomplishment. If not for the Claims Conference's tenacious negotiations, all Jewish property in the former east Germany would have reverted to the German state and been lost forever to survivors and the Jewish community.

But recovering that property proved to be more than a monumental task. As individual survivors, we could never have accomplished it. Thorough and detailed research was required, and documents had to be properly processed through various German institutions and courts. The exhaustive procedure still continues.

By selling off these properties, the Claims Conference obtains monies for distribution. However, for practical purposes, this is the only source of funds that can be distributed by the conference based on its own guidelines. Other sources, such as the German Foundation and the Swiss Banks Settlement, must be disbursed based on external criteria.

Since 1995, the Claims Conference has distributed about $430 million worldwide from the sale of these properties; these transactions are properly documented and detailed reports and financial statements are available to the public.

Based on a decision by the conference's board of directors, about 80 per cent of these funds are used to provide essential social services to needy survivors, such as hunger relief, home health care and medical assistance. Approximately 20 per cent supports Holocaust education, research and documentation, to ensure that future generations learn of, and from, the Holocaust. A key recipient of this money was Yad Vashem, an institution universally respected among survivors.

But Claims Conference funds alone are not sufficient enough to meet the critical and immediate health and medical needs of the aging survivor population. While I hope that additional funds will be forthcoming from the Swiss Banks Settlement and possibly from the International Commission on Holocaust Era Insurance Claims, it is my strong conviction that the Jewish community at large must rise to the occasion and provide additional assistance. It has a moral obligation to help resolve this acute problem. For more than 50 years, survivors have supported the Jewish community. During that time, both social and educational Jewish organizations have collected vast sums of money in the name of survivors and the Holocaust.

I believe the time is now for the entire Jewish population, as well as the German government, to step forward and show their support. They must join hands together with the Claims Conference to devise a program that would allow needy survivors to spend the remaining years of their lives in some measure of comfort with the dignity they so richly deserve.

I also believe that we as survivors must be united in order to achieve our goal of protecting those who need our help. We must be unified not only because of our Jewish heritage, but because of our common heritage as survivors of the Holocaust. United we can overcome all adversities; divided we will fail. Let us keep in mind that we cannot, and must not, fail.

Roman Kent is the chair of the American Gathering of Jewish Holocaust Survivors and treasurer of the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany.

Jewish leaders focus on challenges that confront Jews around the world

By RUTH E. GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

PRAGUE — The 1990s seemed to be a golden decade for European Jewry.

Jewish communities re-emerged following the collapse of communism, and the Oslo accords appeared to point the way toward peace in the Middle East.

European Jews, celebrating the end of the Communist era, began taking tentative steps to chart their future and develop a role as a third pillar of world Jewry, alongside American and Israeli Jews.

But since then, a grim litany of global challenges has erupted to confront Jews worldwide.

These include rising anti-Semitism, global terrorism, Islamic fundamentalism, Holocaust revisionism, widespread support for the Palestinian side in the Middle East conflict and the consequent demonization of Israel.

What impact do these challenges have on European Jews and their attempt to forge a new sense of pan-European Jewish identity – and how should Jewish communities react and confront them?

These questions formed the focus of heated debate here last week among Jewish leaders from more than 40 countries. The communal leaders were attending a three-day conference of Jewish community presidents sponsored by the European Council of Jewish Communities.

A five-person panel from France, Italy, the United States, Portugal and Russia set the stage by noting specific challenges that have emerged in the two years since the failure of the Middle East peace process and the onset of the Palestinian intifadah.

"What strikes me is the speed with which everything collapsed," said David Harris, executive director of the American Jewish Committee. "It is almost as if Oslo and Camp David never happened. Sadly, perhaps the goodwill we had in the 1990s was broader than it was deep."

Harris outlined 10 specific challenges for the Jewish community. These ranged from attempting to strengthen European Union support for Israel to exposing the "lethal and deadly" anti-Semitism now rampant in the Islamic world.

He also said Europe must encourage democracy in the Arab and Muslim world to create a bulwark against Islamic fundamentalism.

Roger Cukierman, president of the Representative Council of Jewish Institutions in France (CRIF), an umbrella organization for secular Jewish institutions in France, went so far as to speak of a "state of war against the Jews in the world."

The spate of violent attacks on synagogues and other Jewish sites in France earlier this year, he said, was "clearly related to the situation in the Middle East."

French authorities have since cracked down on the violence, and there has been a sharp decrease, he said.

But "the general atmosphere has not changed – we feel it in our schools, on our campuses, in the media."

A spark, he said, such as a U.S.-led attack on Iraq, could touch off a new cycle of violence against Jews and Jewish institutions.

Threats to the Jewish world, he said, come from the traditionally anti-Semitic extreme right, the pro-Palestinian and anti-globalization left, and the growing Arab and Muslim minorities.

"The French people are not anti-Semitic," he said. "The French generally hate the Arabs more than they do the Jews, but they are afraid of taking them on."

Panellists and audience members also debated how to prevent legitimate concern over current events from blurring into paranoia.

"One of the biggest problems is how to maintain our specificity as Jews without closing ourselves into a ghetto mentality," said Portuguese panellist Marta Mucznik, executive director of the European Union of Jewish Students.

"We are concerned how to build a positive Jewish identity that is not just based on the Middle East. This is part of our identity, but it should not be all."

Michael Brenner, a professor at the University of Munich, agreed.

"We still tend to let the others set our agenda," he said. "Shouldn't we get a little beyond bashing Islam or seeing the liberal left as the enemy?

"The situation is much more complex," he said. "Look at Germany. The biggest ally of the Jews and Israel is Foreign Minister Joschka Fischer, of the leftist Greens party."

This complexity was underscored by the president of the European Council of Jewish Communities, Cobi Benatoff of Milan, who noted that in Italy, "We are confronted by the fact that the best allies of the Jews and Israel are the post-fascists. The Jewish community has great difficulty with this."

Benatoff added that the new challenges to European Jewry do not mean that the bedrock issues essential for Jewish survival – internal structure, leadership training, Jewish continuity, religious pluralism – have disappeared.

"These issues have not been resolved and remain at the core of Jewish communal life," he said.

Romania: Anti-semitism, Iron-Guard-style, on the rise

By BARUCH COHEN

Author and political philosopher Hannah Arendt has observed that "it is hardly an exaggeration to say that Romania was the most anti-Semitic country in prewar eastern Europe."

I believe this statement still applies to today's Romania, the country in which I was born. There is an ever-increasing proliferation of Romanian extremist groups and organizations whose activities are neither censored nor curtailed by the authorities.

The most significant development is the gradual process through which groups openly adhering to the legacy of the virulent, fascist Iron Guard movement are gaining legitimacy.

The number of their newspapers, magazines and weeklies such as Gazeta de Vest, Romania Mare, Atac la Persoana, Europa, and Sfarma Piatra is growing. This is despite the fact that all Romanian governments since the fall of dictator Nicolae Ceausescu in 1989 rejected and condemned chauvinistic and anti-Semitic publications and demonstrations promoting hatred against the small and elderly Jewish population.

The anti-Semites claim "freedom of speech" and "freedom of the press," and hence the government does not stop these publications.

Last March, the government of Prime Minsister Adrian Nastase issued a special Law of Urgency, Number 31, that outlawed all organizations of a fascist, racist or xenophobic character, as well as the promotion of leaders who incite against minorities.

This law is, however, not being enforced. It is just a show for western governments, in order to ensure Romania's acceptance by the European community as a peace-loving, democratic country.

Meanwhile, the level of anti-Semitism, ultra-nationalism and xenophobia is on the rise. Among eastern European countries, Romania has the largest anti-Semitic groups and the most such publications. In addition, openly anti-Semitic intellectuals and politicians are gaining respectability.

Romania still does not have the courage or the will to face up to its role in the Holocaust, about which there is widespread disinterest and/or dishonesty. The curricula in Romania's schools and universities continue to make no mention of it, though half the country's Jewish population was murdered by the Romanian army, police authorities and other perpetrators.

As recently as May 18, it was reported in Realitatea Evreiasca that the synagogue in the small city of Falticeni – in which there are six or seven Jewish families, all elderly and frail – was vandalized. Its Torah scrolls were stolen, and graffiti written on the walls included "Heil Fuhrer," and "Death and Gas for the Jews."

On Oct. 12, the Associated Press (AP) carried this headline: "Vandals deface walls of Jewish theatre in Bucharest with Nazi graffiti." On Oct. 16, AP referred to "Nazi graffiti found scrawled on exterior walls of buildings in northwest Romania."

A Jewish drama festival was set to start on Oct. 17 in the northeastern city of Iasi. Government officials planned heightened security. They ordered the removal of statues and other monuments honouring Romania's war criminals and its wartime leader, Ion Antonescu. Some had been erected as recently as last year!

The images and inscriptions, the graffiti and pictures in all anti-Semitic publications call for the elimination of the Jews. Yet, in a general population of 28 million in Romania today, the Jewish population is only an estimated 8,000, mostly frail, older people.

While the present government understands the dangers of such a situation, its growing political dependence on the extreme right and left (both anti-Semitic) jeopardizes and weakens any significant action against the criminal elements.

The unknown cousin

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

The eyes of the young woman in the picture are luminous below a cloud of dark hair and they follow me.

I first saw this photo of my mother's Polish cousin in 1941 when I was 16. She was youthful and alive – so alive.

I don't know her name; perhaps it wasn't mentioned when my mother placed the picture on the mantel and left it there for a long time.

Today I would ask, "Where was she born? Was she a Grafstein (my grandmother's side) or a Silverman (my grandfather's family)? Did she have sisters and brothers? Was she a student or did she work in an office? How old was she?"

But I was 16 then, not much interested in someone far away whom I would probably never meet. Still, the eyes of that unknown cousin looked out at me.

Eventually, when the war in Europe seemed unending, Mama put the photo away. I found it after both my parents had died. Those eyes were still a challenge.

I ached to know what became of her. Did she disappear in the horror that was, or is she somehow, miraculously, still living?

Of all the Grafstein relatives who did not make it to this country, only one, to our knowledge, survived. When he finally immigrated here, I showed him the photo, but he did not recognize her.

Was she a Silverman? But no Silverman I have questioned, recollects the face.

This was, or is, an individual who had a name, who felt happiness, anger, fear, had dreams. And yet she is unknown.

But I don't want her to have lived and not be known at all. She was my cousin and so I will remember her.

Chanukah's coming – kick it up a nosh!

By NOREEN GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

When the days are short and the long, cold nights descend early, the festival of Chanukah arrives. This year Chanukah begins on Friday evening, Nov. 29. The flickering lights of the Chanukah menorah (chanukiyah) will join the lights of the Shabbat candles. Once again we recall the miracle that took place over 2,000 years ago, when a small band of Maccabees were victorious over their enemies, and a little jar of oil, enough to burn for only one day, miraculously burned for eight.

In honour of the miracle that occurred with the oil, it is traditional to eat foods fried in oil. Potato latkes and sufganiot (Israeli-style doughnuts) are popular. Dairy dishes are also customary.

For Chanukah, I've chosen two recipes from Marcy Goldman's newest cookbook, The Best of Better Baking, 175 Classic Recipes from the Beloved Baker's Website (Random House Canada, $40 Cdn, colour photos). This wonderful collection of recipes is based on her popular Web site, www.betterbaking.com. Marcy collaborated with her Webmaster, Yvan Huneault, to create this appealing cookbook, which is packed with Goldman's expert insight into ingredients, equipment and techniques. This is a cookbook you will be sure to use over and over again. Here are two excellent dairy desserts from her book and one or two others that are sure to bring joy to your table. Mmmm!

MARCY'S BOSTON CREAM PIE DOUGHNUTS (SUFGANIOT)

Dough:
¼ cup warm water
2 tbsp. instant yeast
1 cup warm milk
¼ cup vegetable shortening
2 eggs
¼ cup sugar
1 tsp. salt
3½ to 4 cups bread flour

Custard Filling:
¼ cup sugar
3 tbsp. all-purpose flour
3 egg yolks
1 cup plus 2 tbsp. milk
1 tbsp. unsalted butter
½ tsp. pure vanilla extract
vegetable oil for deep-frying

Chocolate Glaze:
1 tbsp. unsalted butter
2 oz. semi-sweet chocolate, chopped
1½ cups confectioners' sugar
½ tsp. pure vanilla extract
About ⅓ cup hot water

Dough: Hand whisk the water and yeast together in the bowl of an electric mixer; let stand 2 to 3 minutes to dissolve yeast. Whisk in milk and shortening. Stir in eggs, sugar, salt and 3 cups of the flour. Mix to make a soft dough. Knead with the dough hook on lowest speed of mixer for 8 to 10 minutes, gradually adding more flour as required to form a soft but elastic dough. Place dough in a lightly greased bowl, cover the bowl with a damp cloth, and place in a large plastic bag. Close the bag loosely and let dough rise for 30 to 45 minutes, or until almost doubled.

Filling: Whisk sugar, flour and egg yolks together in a bowl. In a small saucepan, bring milk to a boil. Stir 2 tbsp. of the milk into egg mixture to temper the yolks and prevent curdling. Whisk egg mixture into the milk and stir constantly until mixture thickens and begins to boil gently, then immediately remove from heat. Stir in butter and vanilla; let cool. Place in a bowl and cover with plastic wrap, pressing it directly on the surface to keep a skin from forming. Refrigerate.

Turn the dough out onto a lightly floured surface. Pinch off pieces of dough and form into small balls about the size of golf balls. Cover with plastic wrap and let rise for 25 minutes.

In a wok or a Dutch oven, heat 4 inches of oil to 375. Add the doughnuts a few at a time and fry for 30 to 40 seconds, until deep brown on the first side. Turn and fry on the second side for 15 to 30 seconds. Using a slotted spoon, transfer to paper towels to drain and let cool.

Chanukah's coming – kick it up a nosh!

Whisk the custard to smooth and fluff it. Put custard in a pastry bag fitted with a large plain tip. Split each doughnut in half and pipe or spoon in some custard.

Glaze: Melt the butter and chocolate in a double boiler over barely simmering water. Add confectioner's sugar and vanilla; stir until smooth. Add enough water to make a thin glaze. Let cool for 1 minute, then drizzle over the doughnuts. If the glaze gets too stiff, add more hot water to make it workable again. Yield: 18 to 20 doughnuts.

CREAM CHEESE-APRICOT TART

This is a two-tiered cheesecake that calls for just one pound of cream cheese. Smooth, light and pretty as a picture, it is as good plain as it is garnished with the apricots.

one 7-inch sponge or pound cake, sliced about ¼ inch thick and toasted

First Layer
1 lb. cream cheese
2 eggs
1 (14-oz.) can condensed milk
1 tsp. pure vanilla extract
1 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
2 tbsp. all-purpose flour
pinch of salt

Second Layer
2 cups sour cream
3 eggs
⅓ cup sugar
2 tbsp. all-purpose flour
½ tsp. pure vanilla extract

Topping:
1 large can apricot halves, drained
⅓ to ½ cup apricot jam, warmed and sieved

Preheat oven to 350. Line a baking sheet with parchment paper. Line a 9-inch springform pan or deep quiche pan with the cake slices, cutting and fitting as necessary. Set aside.

First Layer: Combine all the ingredients in a food processor and process until smooth, about 30 seconds. Pour into cake-lined pan. Place pan on prepared baking sheet and bake for 20 minutes.

Second Layer: Meanwhile, combine all the ingredients in the food processor (no need to rinse) and process for 8 to 10 seconds, or until smooth.

Remove the cake from the oven and pour the second layer of filling over the first. Return the cake to the oven and bake for 20 to 28 minutes, or until just set. Let cool in the oven for 30 minutes with the oven off and the oven door open completely. Refrigerate for at least 4 hours or as long as overnight.

For the topping, arrange apricot halves over the top, fitting them snugly together to cover

Here are some recipes from this year's Chanukah flyer.

VEGETABLE AND LOX WRAPS

olive oil
1 medium red onion, thinly sliced
1 large eggplant, thinly sliced
2 fennel bulbs, trimmed, cored and thinly sliced
2 red peppers, seeded, sliced into thin strips

Sauce
1/4 cup chopped flat leaf parsley
1 clove garlic
1 tsp. grated lemon rind
2 tsp. lemon juice
1/4 tsp. pepper
1 tsp. dried basil
2 tbsp. olive oil
6 7-inch tortillas
1/2 lb. thinly sliced lox

Preheat oven to 425. Lightly oil a baking sheet. Arrange vegetables in batches on the baking sheet and brush oil over the tops of the vegetables. Roast until cooked through, about 10-12 minutes. Set aside and roast remaining vegetables.

Sauce: Place all sauce ingredients in a food processor or blender. Puree until smooth. Place the tortillas on a flat surface. Place 2 oz. lox slices on each tortilla. Top with the vegetables, evenly divided. Drizzle sauce evenly down the middle of the tortillas. Tightly roll up and secure with a toothpick. Wrap in plastic and refrigerate. When ready to serve, slice each wrap in half on the diagonal, or smaller if desired. Serves 6.

TURKEY OR VEAL SCALOPPINI

1 1/2 lb. thin turkey or veal cutlets
1 tsp. dried oregano
1 tsp. dried thyme
1 tsp. dried basil
1/4 tsp. pepper
2 tsp. olive oil

Pound cutlets to an even 1/4-inch thickness. Blot dry with paper towels. Season with herbs, rubbing well into the cutlets. In a large non-stick skillet over medium-high heat, heat 1 tbsp. of the oil; cook cutlets in batches, adding more oil as needed for 1 to 1 1/2 minutes on each side until browned or no longer pink in the centre. Serve with sweet potato and orange casserole. Serves 6.

SWEET POTATO AND ORANGE CASSEROLE

6 medium sweet potatoes or yams boiling salted water
1/2 cup brown sugar
1/2 cup orange juice
2 tbsp. lemon juice
grated rind of 1/2 orange grated rind of 1/2 lemon
1/2 tsp. salt
4 tbsp. margarine, cut into pieces
sprig of flat leaf parsley

Wash the potatoes and cook in boiling salted water to cover for 15 to 20 minutes or until tender but still firm. Drain and cool.

Preheat oven to 325. Peel the potatoes and cut into 1/4-inch slices. Place in a greased shallow 10-inch baking dish in 1 or 2 layers. Sprinkle with the sugar.

Combine the juices, rinds and salt, mixing well. Sprinkle over the potatoes. Dot with the margarine. Bake for 25 minutes or until golden. Transfer to serving platter and garnish with sprig of flat leaf parsley in centre. Serves 6

NUTTY CHICKEN WINGS

18 chicken wings, disjointed, tips discarded
2 eggs
1 tbsp. oil
1/4 tsp. pepper
1 cup fine dry bread crumbs
1 cup finely chopped walnuts

Preheat oven to 400. In a shallow bowl, beat together eggs, oil and pepper. In a second bowl, place bread crumbs and nuts; mix well. Dip wing pieces in egg mixture, then in crumb mixture, turning to coat well on all sides. Place on a greased shallow baking pan. Bake for 30 minutes or until brown and fork tender. Serve with Honey Mustard Dip.

Honey Mustard Dip
1 cup mayonnaise
2 tbsp. honey
1 tbsp. prepared mustard
1/2 tsp. pepper

Mix all ingredients together in a small bowl. Serves 6.

the surface completely. Brush with the warmed jam. Let set for 5 to 10 minutes and repeat. Refrigerate for at least 2 hours before serving. Makes 1 tart; serves 8 to 12.

Levana Kirschenbaum is passionate about food. Her New York restaurant is legendary and she now shares her recipes in her first book, Levana's Table, Kosher Cooking for Everyone. Here is an excellent chicken dish that makes a perfect main dish to serve along with latkes (see Levana's Latkes recipes in my column, About Food, page 59)

OLIVE-LEMON CHICKEN

Don't make this dish without preserved lemon (see recipe below) or you will have a good but ordinary result. With the preserved lemon, you will be transported by the authentic Moroccan flavours and heavenly aromas of this dish.

2 lb. of chicken parts, dark and white meat, or all dark
1 medium onion, thinly sliced
1 tbsp. grated fresh ginger
1/2 cup green pitted olives, thoroughly rinsed
1/4 tsp. turmeric
pinch of saffron
1 cup water
1/4 of a preserved lemon, skin only, rinsed and chopped very fine (below)
2 tbsp. chopped flat-leaf parsley
1 1/2 tbsp. chopped cilantro
freshly ground pepper

Place chicken, onions, ginger, olives, turmeric, saffron and water in a heavy pot and bring to a boil. Reduce heat to medium-high and cook covered for 1 hour. Add lemon, parsley, cilantro, and pepper to taste, and cook for another 10 minutes.

Using a slotted spoon, transfer the chicken to a platter and check the cooking liquid. If it is too thin, cook it over high heat until it is reduced and thickened. Pour the sauce over the chicken. Serve hot. Makes 4 servings.

According to Kirschenbaum, there is no Moroccan cooking without preserved lemons. They take about 10 minutes to prepare and 2 weeks to incubate. The result is a few months' supply of the single element that will transform many of your dishes from plain to glorious.

Do not let the amount of salt daunt you. Most of it gets washed away, and you can reduce or eliminate salt from the dish you are preparing with the preserved lemons.

PRESERVED LEMONS

8-10 large lemons
kosher salt

Wash and dry lemons thoroughly. Remove any green points attached to ends of lemons. Cut them in quarters almost all the way through, leaving them attached at one end. Enlarge the openings with your fingers and cram them full of kosher salt. Close lemons and place them in a clean, wide-mouth, quart-sized glass jar, pressing down hard on lemons as you go to draw out the juice. Don't worry if juices don't appear immediately; they will soon with all that salt.

Repeat with all the lemons, forcing them into the jar. The lemons should be totally submerged in their own juices. Top with an extra layer of kosher salt to ensure that no lemon skin is exposed.

Place the jar in a dark cool space (e.g., under the sink). Lemons will be ready in 2 weeks, at which point they should be refrigerated. To use, take out a quarter of a lemon at a time. Discard the pulp, rinse the skin thoroughly, and mince. Add to fish and chicken dishes, bean soups, salads and salsas. Makes 1 quart.

A recipe adjusted for allergies and food sensitivities

Children and families served by the Brooklyn School for Special Children/Block Institute are often diagnosed with food allergies and sensitivities, many of which affect their developmental progress.

The following recipes for potato latkes and potato vegetable patties, were developed by Brooklyn School director of food services, Todd Adelman, and Jodi Behrend, executive director of CLASP Children's Centre in Great Neck N.Y., who co-authored Special Foods for Special Kids — Practical Solutions & Great Recipes for Children with Food Allergies (Robert D. Reed Publishers, San Francisco). They offer families tasty alternatives to help the children enjoy and celebrate Chanukah, the festival of lights.

These recipes are taken from the book. Each has been adjusted for dairy, wheat/gluten, and egg allergies or sensitivities, and includes nutritional analysis.

POTATO PANCAKES

2 cups shredded potatoes, packed
½ tbsp. lemon juice
2 eggs, beaten
2 tbsp. potato starch flour
¾ tsp. salt
¼ tsp. white pepper
oil for frying

Place potatoes in a colander and press to remove excess liquid. Toss potatoes with lemon juice to keep from turning brown. Grate potatoes in food processor, turning on and off until potatoes are coarsely grated (be careful not to over-process). Transfer to bowl, add eggs, stir to mix, add potato starch flour, salt and pepper and stir to combine. Heat oil in skillet. Drop potato mixture, by heaping tablespoons, into hot oil. Fry until golden brown on both sides, flipping once. Drain on paper towels. Serve immediately with fresh applesauce or fruit puree. Yield: 12 pancakes.

Dairy – no substitutions needed; wheat – no substitutions needed; eggs – substitute 1 tbsp. egg replacer mixed with ¼ cup water for eggs.

Weight Watchers modifies some holiday faves

Holiday celebrations are an important part of family tradition, and the food we prepare and eat is a big part of that.

Maria Walls, senior nutritionist for Weight Watchers International, says creating lighter versions of family recipes by replacing high-calorie ingredients with healthier substitutes is a simple and easy way to modernize and cut unwanted fat and calories from a dish.

Weight Watchers offers the following recipes that put a new spin on some old favourites.

ZUCCHINI AND POTATO LATKES

5 tsp. olive oil or vegetable oil
3 8 oz. russet potatoes, peeled
1 medium 6 oz. zucchini, peeled
1 small onion, grated
1 large egg
1 tbsp. all-purpose flour
¾ tsp. kosher salt
⅛ tsp. freshly ground pepper

Preheat the oven to 450. Brush 2 large nonstick baking sheets each with 1½ tsp. of the oil. Cook the potatoes in a saucepan with boiling water to cover, 6 minutes; drain. Cover with cold water to cool.

Meanwhile, grate the zucchini on a double layer of paper towels; let stand 3 minutes. Combine the zucchini with the onion, egg, flour, salt, and pepper in a large bowl. Drain the potatoes, pat dry, then coarsely grate. Stir into the zucchini mixture.

Heat the baking sheets in the oven until hot, about 4 minutes. Drop scant ¼ cup measures of the potato mixture onto the baking sheets, forming a total of 16 (3-inch) pancakes; lightly flatten each.

Bake until browned on the bottom, 8-9 minutes. Brush the tops of the pancakes with the remaining 2 tsp. oil, then turn and bake until cooked through, 5-7 minutes.

Makes 16 servings.

Happy Chanukah

FOOD IDEAS

Eat healthy while enjoying the holiday

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Chanukah can be particularly devastating for the waistline. Traditionally at this time, we eat a variety of fried foods and dairy products.

Nutritionist Roselyn Fine says it is important to remember that we can eat healthy, traditional foods and still enjoy the holiday.

"To go to holiday gatherings and have an empty plate just doesn't feel right," says Fine, who has a bachelor's degree in psychology from the University of Western Ontario and a bachelor's degree in food nutrition from Ryerson University. She works as a clinical dietitian, is an instructor at Seneca College and has a private practice, counselling individuals and groups on healthy eating and lifestyle changes.

At Chanukah, we serve latkes and sufganiot, traditional foods cooked in oil as a reminder of the great miracle of the Temple rededication. Fine notes that dairy is often eaten on Chanukah to remember the story of the Jewish heroine, Judith, who brought the governor of the Syrian troops cheese and wine and helped save the Jews.

To help celebrate this joyous holiday while eating healthy, Fine advises:

- Save the calories for those special holiday foods, rather than using them up by eating candy bars and fast foods available all year round.
- Get plenty of exercise during the holidays. Stick to your regular workout plan, or at least try to sneak in a walk or two during the day. Exercise helps burn off all those extra calories and it's a great stress reliever.
- The holiday dinner itself isn't your enemy but the leftovers are. If you are the host, send them home with your guests or plan your meals with leftovers in mind. If you are the guest, stay away from doggie bags. They are too tempting.

Fine also offers some low-fat recipes.

LOW-FAT POTATO LATKES

3 lbs. Yukon gold potatoes
1 medium onion
⅓ cup matzah meal, or unbleached white flour
½ tsp. baking powder
1 cup egg substitute, or 2 eggs plus 4 whites
3 tbsp. chopped parsley
kosher salt
freshly ground black pepper
olive oil spray (or 2 tbsp. olive oil)

Place two non-stick baking sheets in the oven and preheat to 450. Peel the potatoes and onion and coarsely grate in a food processor fitted with a shredding disk, or on a box grater. Grab handfuls of the grated vegetables and squeeze tightly between your fingers to wring out as much liquid as possible.

Transfer the grated vegetables to a mixing bowl and stir in matzah meal or flour, baking powder, egg substitute, parsley, and salt and pepper to taste. (The latkes should be highly seasoned.)

Spray the hot baking sheets with the oil spray (or drizzle the oil on it and spread with a wooden spoon).

Spoon small mounds of potato mixture onto the baking sheet to form 2½-inch pancakes, leaving 1 inch between each. Bake latkes in the oven until golden brown, 6 to 8 minutes per side, turning once with a spatula. (When you turn the latkes, try to flip them onto spots on the baking sheet that still have oil.) Transfer to plates or a platter and serve immediately with sour cream and/or applesauce. Serves 8.

Slain Jews of Timkovici finally receive Magen David

By ELIZABETH BEN-ISHAI

Some interpretations of the Jewish symbol, the Magen David, claim that its two triangles represent the reciprocal relationship between the Jewish people and God. In one direction flow the Jews' good deeds or mitzvot, while the other direction symbolizes the flow of goodwill back towards earth.

Dr. Rhonda Wilansky lived up to her earthly part of the bargain when she brought dignity to nearly 1,000 slain Jews in Timkovici with a commemorative Star of David.

Last spring, Wilansky visited Timkovici, a small town in Belarus. She was in Belarus as a part of a delegation of physicians from Holy Blossom Temple who set out to share medical supplies and knowledge with the Belarussian Jewish community.

While in the region, the Toronto doctor decided to seek out her roots. Wilansky's grandfather and grandmother hailed from the small town of Timkovici, where they lived until they immigrated to Newfoundland in 1919 and 1930, respectively.

An interpreter accompanied Wilansky to Timkovici. The town, which Wilansky says was probably "a typical Jewish shtetl" in her grandparents' time, appeared not to have changed much – minus the presence of Jews.

Wilansky recounts, "There were mud roads and there were still horses and carts. Outside the town, [residents] were still plowing the fields with horse and plow. And the houses looked probably like they did in the early 1900s."

"It was a step back in time," she says. "I was very close with my grandparents, so I could just imagine them walking around there. It was very emotional that way."

The monument with the Magen David. [E. Ben-Ishai photo]

While in Timkovici, Wilansky met with a woman who took her to the site of the tragic slaughter of the town's entire Jewish population – 900 of the town's 2,000 people. In 1941, Nazis gathered them and shot them dead over the top of a large pit, where they were then thrown.

The local woman showed Wilansky to the memorial that had been erected over the pit. It bore a Soviet star and words of commemoration in Russian and Yiddish. It referred to the dead as "martyrs who died at the hands of fascists." There was no mention that the 900 dead were Jews.

Wilansky was bothered by this omission.

"I found it disturbing," she says. "It was clearly a Jewish monument and there was no sign of any Jews ever having lived in this town."

So upon her return to Canada, Wilansky decided to explore the possibilities for properly memorializing the slain Jews of Timkovici. With the help of an interpreter

Jewish life of that area had to be commemorated whom she met while in Minsk, Wilansky approached the town's authorities for permission to change the memorial. When they agreed, she financed and organized the replacement of the Soviet star that stood above the monument with a Magen David.

"I really felt that the Jewish life of that area had to be commemorated, and those who had died should be memorialized," Wilansky says, adding that the location of the Timkovici memorial is also important. While other memorials to fallen Jews have been erected in North America and Israel, she feels that marking the very place where innocent people's lives were taken is particularly profound.

Wilansky sees the updating of the monument – it still bears a vague message that does not explicitly refer to the dead as Jews – as a future project, perhaps for other Jews whose relatives once lived in Timkovici.

In the meantime, the memorial, now with the Magen David, will not only honour the dead; it will serve the living. Especially now that travel to the former Soviet Union is accessible, the newly erected Jewish star will offer solace and insight to Jews who may visit this small town where their ancestors once lived.

As Wilansky says, it is remarkable to "go back where your ancestors came from and know what kind of life they had, and realize it was all just erased in a month."

Elizabeth Ben-Ishai is a student at the University of Toronto.

Bringing the Jewish faith back to Cordoba

By SARAH ZELCER

To most of the individuals familiar with the small city of Cordoba, a former large cultural and economic centre of Spain, they know that it is a place uniquely drenched in Jewish, Islamic and Catholic histories. The key to understanding this city, birthplace of the Jewish philosopher Maimonides, known as the Rambam, is the past.

Home to one of Spain's oldest Jewish quarters, including one of the few synagogues to have survived the 15th century expulsion of the Jews from Spain, Cordoba is also home to one of the most significant existing Islamic sites, La Mezquita, a mosque which was transformed into a site of Christian worship in the 14th century. The interlocking reminders of a time when all three cultures were alive and thriving and co-existing, if not always peacefully, have settled into the tourist paraphernalia shops lining every street that offer token remnants of the city's rich past. It was in Cordoba that I felt plagued by ghosts, remnants of a living, breathing, thriving Jewish community, persecuted and driven out of their country or forced to practice their religion in secret, in the shadow of the threat of death and exile, during the Spanish Inquisition of 1492.

Given its history, Cordoba might seem an unlikely spot for a present-day, Jewish experience, but it ended up playing host to one of the few profound Jewish experiences I had during my five-week trip through Spain and Portugal.

My companion and I arrived, by bus, in Cordoba, located in the Andalucia (southern) region of Spain, via a magical route from the enchanting city of Granada, amidst rolling hills of olive trees and orange groves, in a city whose energy seems to be pulled in two directions, that of the present, but more profoundly, that of the past. We arrived on a Friday in the maze of narrow, winding cobblestone streets, having decided at the last minute to come to this city because of our need, after many weeks of travelling through a beautiful, but decidedly not very Jewish country, of a Shabbat for our tired selves. We assumed, given Cordoba's Judaic history, that there would be something for us there – a family to host us for Shabbat dinner perhaps, or Kabbalat Shabbat services at La Sinogoga (The Old Synagogue) in La Juderia (the Jewish Quarter). We knew that Cordoba no longer contained many Jews, but the existence of a former Jewish quarter and shul proved to be a drawing force for us. We felt that somehow, though the Jewish community had been eliminated there over 500 years ago, that removal would have been fleeting. We felt certain that, over time, Jews must have filtered back into the city, and taken ownership or control over Jewish areas and holy spaces, and therefore, would be eager to take us, Jewish travellers from Canada, in as well.

Statue of Maimonides

We checked into our pension, changed into our Shabbat attire and went walking in the direction of the Jewish quarter, excited at long last of the thought of a service in a shul. The last synagogue we had been in was at the beginning of our trip, in Amsterdam, at the historic Portuguese Synagogue for Kabbalat Shabbat, and we were feeling overdue.

However, upon arriving at the heavy, wooden, seriously dead bolted doors, we had a sinking feeling. We spent a few moments knocking, in vain, on the door, and soon realized that no services would be held there this evening. Though I realized in retrospect we should not have been surprised at the closed synagogue door, the reality was still painful. I distinctly remember the sad feeling I had, knocking on the door of La Sinagoga, waiting for a welcome that never came. I realized that the removal of the Jews had not been temporary at all – they really didn't exist in this city any longer.

But this moment did not deter us. Instead, we sat down near the statue of the Rambam located nearby, facing East, and davened the Kabbalat Shabbat service right on the street. Passersby looked on curiously, some even snapped a few pictures of us, as we sang, trying to be oblivious to their stares.

Our travel book told us that the synagogue would be open the next morning for tourists. We entered the now unlocked gates, siddur in hand, and stopped, unprepared for what we saw upon entering the tiny space. The synagogue gave off the air of a survivor – still standing, but bruised, beaten and faded. Something had been lost in its centuries of disuse. It was, simply, an empty room, with still visible Hebrew letters engraved on its four walls and a small, simple menorah standing in the conspicuous space where the Aron Kodesh used to be. Perhaps it was the presence of tour guides and groups of tourists, cameras hanging around their necks, snapping pictures using flash despite a sign requesting otherwise, oblivious to the fact that they were in what was once a holy space, on the holiest day of the week, that left us feeling almost defeated. Perhaps it was the realization that we were not where we thought we would be – in a present-day, thriving synagogue; rather, we were in a historical relic, now owned and operated by the city, where Jewish communities once prayed and thrived but were no more. Perhaps it was the tour guide, explaining to his group how the synagogue fell into disuse once the Jews left Spain. "They didn't leave!" I wanted to shout. "We were expelled!" But for the moment, I felt crushed with disappointment, and stayed quiet.

That moment was almost the end, until my companion suggested we stand in the back of the synagogue, with our small travel-sized siddur, and daven part of the morning's services, the way we had davened the night before, outside. So we did. Again, tour groups came in and out of the small room, and stared, then ignored us, as the guides did their usual shpiel, and filed out again, throwing a few curious stares our way. They were unaware that they had witnessed something incredibly significant to where they were, to the space they were in. They witnessed a resurrection of faith, of culture, of spirit, that had seemed lost forever just a few moments earlier. We felt immensely powerful at that moment. Somehow, we had brought to life a Jewish energy, something resurging in ourselves, that had lain dormant in this old city, and this old synagogue, for centuries.

Sarah Zelcer, a recent graduate of the University of Toronto, is currently travelling.

When Jaffa comes to Sofia

By ESTHER HECHT

Tel-Aviv-Jaffa Mayor holds aloft the copy of the sign marking Sofia's new Tel Aviv-Yafo Square, which he received as a gift from Sofia Mayor Stefan Sofianski [dark hair, black suit]; Emil Kalo, president of the Organization of Jews in Bulgaria Shalom [gray hair] stands between them. [Esther Hecht photo]

Years after most of Bulgaria's Jews moved to Israel and settled in Jaffa, Jaffa has came to Bulgaria's capital city of Sofia. On a Sunday in late October, a major intersection in Sofia's city centre was named Tel Aviv-Yafo Square. It is just one block away from Beit Ha'am, the Jewish community centre.

"Israelis pay homage to Bulgaria for the way it treated its Jews during World War II," Tel Aviv-Jaffa Mayor Ron Huldai, who came to Bulgaria for the event, told Sofia Mayor Stefan Sofianski. Bulgaria was the only European country besides Denmark that refused to comply with the Germans' demand to deport its Jews to the Nazi death camps.

The ceremony, attended by some 150 local and Israeli Jews, began with a consecration by a Bulgarian Orthodox priest who sprinkled holy water on the mayors of the two municipalities, which are linked by a sister-city agreement, and concluded with an exchange of gifts. Sofianski received a model of the stone monument in a Jaffa park named last year in honour of the Bulgarian people. And he gave Huldai a copy of the street sign that now marks the corner of Todor Alexandrov and Hristo Botev boulevards.

Two recent events mark the close ties between Israel and Bulgaria

This was the second event in three days that marked the close ties between Israel and Bulgaria and between Bulgarian Jews in Israel and the country of their birth. The Friday before the ceremony, both Jews and non-Jews honoured the memory of Dimitur Peshev, deputy leader of the Bulgarian parliament during World War II, who is credited with having saved the country's Jewish population.

The Dimitur Peshev Museum was dedicated in Kyustendil, 60 miles southwest of Sofia, where Peshev was born. It was built with funds raised by the Association of Bulgarian Jews in Israel; some two dozen of its members attended both events.

"We have come to begin to repay the debt that our parents could not repay," association chair Yossi Kiosso said at the dedication of the museum. "The entire Jewish Bulgarian community agreed that the museum was important for the sake of educating the children."

The event was attended by the chair of Bulgaria's National Assembly, the assembly's former chair, residents of Kyustendil, members of Sofia's Jewish community and a delegation of Israeli writers who were guests of the Bulgarian Writers Association. Many of the speakers focused on the lesson to be learned from Bulgaria's example during World War II.

The two dedications coincided with the conclusion of the tenure of Israeli Ambassador Emmanuel Zisman, who is said to have been overwhelmingly successful in opening doors for commercial ties between Bulgaria and Israel.

'Bulgaria's behaviour during the war was not saintly'.

There is still controversy over who deserves the credit for saving Bulgaria's 49,000 Jews during the war. Starting in February 1940, Bulgaria instituted anti-Semitic laws patterned after Nazi regulations, and in 1943, King Boris III agreed to deport the Jews. Opposition to the deportations was led by Peshev, though he, too, had voted for the anti-Semitic laws. Peshev presented the prime minister with a petition signed by 42 leading members of parliament. The church, politicians and others joined in, forcing the government to stop the deportations.

But Bulgaria's behaviour during the war was not saintly. It rounded up and deported more than 11,000 Jews of Thrace and Macedonia, which had come under its administration. Only a handful survived. And though the Jews of Bulgaria were spared deportation, they were pressed into forced labour.

Leaders of today's small but vibrant Jewish community in Bulgaria say their country has a tradition of tolerance. They attribute rising anti-Semitism to the political and economic difficulties of the past decade. Graffiti that include a Star of David and the word "genocide" are attributed to Palestinian inhabitants of the capital.

More disturbing is the fact that Hitler's memoir, Mein Kampf, and several other anti-Semitic and anti-Zionist books are displayed prominently at the outdoor book market in the city centre.

In December 2001, the Jewish community was alarmed when some 500 posters bearing a likeness of Adolf Hitler appeared suddenly in the downtown area to publicize the Bulgarian translation of Mein Kampf. At the time, the publisher told the Associated Press it had sold more than 5,000 copies, making it a bestseller.

Members of the Jewish community – estimated at 6,000 to 7,000 people – say Bulgaria is eager to publicize how it saved its Jews during the war in order to win friends in high places in the West. This southeastern European country of eight million, where the average monthly income is $100 to $150 in the cities and lower in rural areas, is a candidate for inclusion in NATO and the European Union.

But whatever Bulgaria's motives today, its Jews are grateful to have been spared during the war. And they heartily endorse the words of Bill Clinton, who in 1999 became the first United States president to visit Bulgaria: "When you saved Bulgaria's Jews, it was one of the proudest moments in your history."

The dual nature of Bulgarian policy

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

In 1943, when King Boris III of Bulgaria signed the deportation papers that sent thousands of Jews to their deaths in Treblinka, he began one of the most efficient exterminations carried out in Europe.

The victims came from Macedonia, parts of Thrace (in Greece) and areas in eastern Serbia (Yugoslavia) – territories that were handed over to King Boris III in 1941 by the Germans in return for Bulgaria's participation in the Axis alliance.

Yet, because Bulgaria did not deport its own Jews, that country has been remembered as righteous by Israelis and historians, said Zdravko Sami, the coordinator of the Jewish community in the Republic of Macedonia.

In an interview with The CJN, Sami talked about the betrayal felt among members of his community because historians have chosen to remember the Bulgarian Jews who were saved instead of the Macedonian Jews who were massacred.

"The Jews of Macedonia were collected on March 11 and then in three trainloads, on the 22nd, the 26th and the 28th of March, they were taken off to concentration camps and killed off within three days," Sami said.

With Bulgaria on its east, Macedonia is bordered by Greece, Albania and Yugoslavia. The region claims a Jewish presence that some historians date back to the Second Temple period. Sami tells of a synagogue that dates back to the second century BCE.

He also describes a community that settled in the cities of Bitola and Skopje after the Jewish expulsion from Spain and Portugal in the 15th century and participated in all aspects of Balkan life until the onset of Nazism.

In August, Sami said, the Macedonian government announced that it would either return or provide compensation for communal properties claimed by the Jewish community.

In addition, Macedonian Finance Minister Nikola Gruevski announced that unclaimed Jewish property or compensation will go to a Holocaust fund that will, among other things, initiate research projects about the war years in the Balkans, Sami said.

But, he said, the Bulgarians have never officially acknowledged what they did to the Macedonian Jews.

After the war, documents and property held by the Bulgarian government were seized by the Soviets. For political and economic reasons, it has been difficult for the Macedonian community – now comprising of 200 people – to investigate this historical period, Sami said, adding that he would like to see an international symposium established to study this era.

Historians in Israel and around the world, he said, have chosen to focus on the Bulgarian government's positive actions, instead of remembering that King Boris III – the father of the current Bulgarian prime minister – was responsible for sending so many to their deaths.

Clearly, there was an intelligentsia and clergy at that time who put their lives on the line and prevented the government from destroying the Bulgarian Jews, Sami explained.

"They should be remembered as righteous Gentiles."

But Sami said that to honour King Boris III and his government for saving the Bulgarian Jews is to disgrace the memory of those that died in the annexed territories.

Singapore's Jews: small, strong – but single

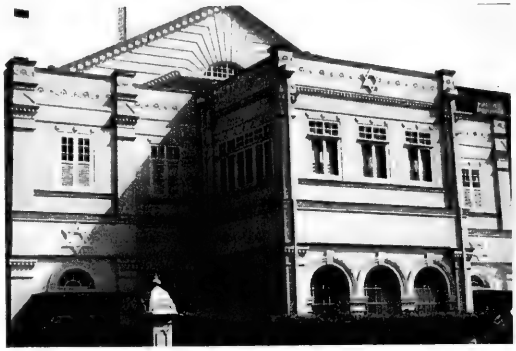
By LAUREN KRAMER

If you're finding it hard to meet your bashert in Canada, consider for a moment the plight of the Jews of Singapore. Sequestered on an Asian island one 10th the size of Texas, with only 180 local Jews and a few hundred expatriates from the United States, Britain, Israel and Australia, the pickings for those seeking partners are slim.

It wasn't always this difficult to find a wife. There have been Jews in Singapore since 1819, and a synagogue since 1824. Some came from India, others from Baghdad, and by 1939, their numbers had swelled to 1,500. During the war, however, the Japanese interned many of Singapore's Jews, and in its aftermath, they began emigrating en masse, leaving only 450 Jews by 1968.

They're small in numbers today, a fact that's conspicuous on Friday nights during the services at Maghain Aboth, one of the country's two synagogues. With 20 men praying beneath us, I joined four women on the top floor of the gracious, old synagogue built in 1905 by Sir Manasseh Meyer, at the time one of the wealthiest men in the Far East.

But despite the small numbers, I found a warmth and soul among Singapore's Jewish community that's hard to come by these days, a vibrancy that's especially remarkable in a community so far away from the epicentre of Jewish activity.



Maghain Aboth Synagogue in Singapore

In a meeting with 34-year-old Rabbi Mordechai Abergel, who hails from Brussels, I learned that the community has a Jewish preschool with 45 children, a Sunday school for Hebrew education, a home for the Jewish aged, weekly movies at the Sir Manasseh Meyer Community Hall and communal meals served at the back of the synagogue after morning services and on Friday nights. There's even a store selling kosher products.

The Singapore Jewish community had just hosted a group of visiting rabbis from New York, who had come to help inject new life into it. And the community doesn't permit its lack of numbers to stand in the way of plans to expand and upgrade their facilities. By the year's end, construction will begin on a new, five-story building adjacent to the synagogue, containing a kosher shop, accommodation for the rabbi and cantor, a kosher cafeteria, a new mikvah and a JCC.

Ask a local Singaporean about the country's Jews and you might hear the name David Marshall, who in 1955 became the first chief minister of the republic. Frank J. Benjamin is another name frequently mentioned, a prominent member of the community and fashion retailer whose company, F.J. Benjamin, has made him highly recognizable in Singapore.

JEWISH WORLD

'There's no shortage of Jewish visitors'

I spent Shabbat dinner with other members of the Benjamin family, namely Frank's brother, Joseph, 65, his wife and son. Third generation Singaporeans, whose ancestors came from Iraq in the early 19th century, Joseph Benjamin has a daughter in Sydney and two children who live in Singapore.

"We don't have a problem keeping our kids here, they like Singapore," he confided. "But to make sure I had a back-up plan, I established a company in Sydney."

I asked Joseph what he loved about Singapore. "Everything works click-clock," he responded enthusiastically. "The newspaper is delivered every morning, there are no traffic jams, no strikes, the streets are safe..., there's no concern about bringing up kids here."

That "click-clock" has a lot to do with government control. The newspaper is government-controlled and strikes are against the law. Traffic jams are minimized by toll roads and an elaborate maze of rules and instructions keeps the society orderly, with fines for forgetting to flush, for jaywalking, for eating on the subway and for chewing gum.

Yet from this labyrinth of regulations, Singapore, a country with no natural resources apart from its ingenious people, has become one of the region's most affluent societies. It boasts a highly efficient infrastructure, the world's second-busiest port and status as an international financial and telecommunications hub. And it has achieved all this in 37 short years.

"Singapore is a very healthy environment for kids," Rabbi Abergel agreed. "People are more relaxed here, and the fact that we have Jews from so many different countries is very enriching. It adds flavour to our community."

There are concerns, though. Rabbi Abergel worries about the Jewish education his three children will receive in the absence of a Jewish day school. And Joseph Benjamin worries about the possible future partners his children will encounter in a republic with a remarkable absence of available Jewish women.

Meir Rosh, the community's melodic-voiced cantor, is one of 20 to 30 marriageable men who have not found Jewish partners. For this reason, they remain single. Intermarriage has not reared its head much in Singapore, and according to Rabbi Abergel, that's because "the small number of Jews here triggers a system of loyalty towards the Jewish identity."

The good news for Singapore's singles is that there's no shortage of Jewish visitors who pass through the island through the course of their work in Asia. Inevitably, they land up joining the services and meals at Maghain Aboth and meeting the locals. At the time of my visit, Rosh was happily dating one such visitor who hailed from New York. The problem is what to do when the visitors leave.

"We need to build the infrastructure to our community so that people will want to stay and we can build critical mass," said Rabbi Abergel.

Hence, the impending plans for construction proceed, promising to add a dimension of modernity to the two synagogues that were built in 1878 and 1905, respectively.

One informative platform is the community's Web site, www.singaporejews.com, where introductions are made, service times are stipulated and a tradition of warm hospitality is extended to potential visitors.

"Despite the small numbers, our community has much to offer her members," the Web site says. That includes "a good Jewish education for the youth, weekly discussions, up to the minute gossip and Sabbath luncheons and dinners, which will help to keep the spark burning for generations to come."

I left Singapore with an indelible impression of a community distinguished by its tremendous warmth towards Jewish visitors and newcomers. In the republic for a short week, I was embraced, welcomed and fêted by its members and left with a sense of belonging to a great, international Jewish family.

JEWISH WORLD

The new Israel

By BEVERLEY ABRAMSON

Sitting outside at one of Toronto's busy cafés this summer less than 24 hours after returning from Israel, I feel distraught and uneasy in spite of the serene ambience of a protected back patio. I try to deal with my feelings by relating my experiences to my youngest son. He is just a few years older than the hospitalized soldiers whom I have just met in Tel Aviv, Jerusalem and Ra'anana.

As a photographer who travels to the Middle East frequently, I return to Israel against repeated warnings from my Israeli cousins that "it's not a good time to come." Despite being a travelholic, I find that making the decision to go to Israel during such volatile and uncertain times is not a light one, but I am intent on visiting my family. I want to gain an understanding of, and photograph, current Israeli life, and I join a solidarity group mission arriving from Toronto during the latter part of my stay.

Some of the images that I anxiously leave Toronto to capture on film have been haunting me ever since.

An Israel soldier demonstrates how to handle a gun during a demonstration at the Israel Defence Forces Adam Base near Tel Aviv.

I can't help but compare today's Israel with the one I photographed almost four years ago when the country was jubilantly rejoicing in its 50th anniversary. The beaches and desert, the cities, towns and villages were then bustling with excitement, struggling yet thriving with their sudden prosperity, partly a result of the infusion and integration of so many new immigrants from the former Soviet Union.

Now, as I travel throughout the country exploring how Israelis deal with continual heightened violence and surprise suicide bombings, the dramatic changes fill me with dismay. I don't cry easily – mostly only at weddings, funerals, a great movie or opera – but since my arrival, I am saddened and confused by the new Israel that I quickly encounter.

Barach Ribshtein, in uniform, visits his sergeant and high school friend Tzach Tayer, whom he saved during an ambush two days before this photograph was taken.

In the new Israel, the sun still shines. Trees blossom; trains and buses overflow with commuters. Stunning skyscrapers soar over new housing, restaurants and parks. Sophisticated redevelopment projects boast striking architecture and boutiques. People continue to shop and meet at outdoor cafés; children are escorted on school outings to galleries and parks. Sporting events, concerts, dance and theatre performances are filled to capacity. The beach area from Tel Aviv to Jaffa rivals any Mediterranean seaside resort. In the evenings, the promenade along the sea still attracts lovers and dedicated walkers and joggers that now include Israeli Arab women and men from Jaffa.

On the surface, it is an impressive scene. But it is also a surrealistic one.

The mood is different now. The glorious beaches and hotels are practically empty except for a few businessmen and Israelis coming from abroad to see relatives. Visitors are a rarity except for a few 'Indeed, much has changed in Israel'

Canadians and Americans travelling in small groups on solidarity missions. Taxi drivers can't remember the last time they drove tourists. Armed soldiers fill the buses and trains and security guards flank entrances not only to government buildings but also to restaurants, train stations, schools, theatres and backstage doors.

After searching through my camera bag at the train station in Binyamina, the security guard sends me off with a "Have a nice day" and politely warns me that photographing on trains is not permitted. The bus shelter in this idyllic village, a bedroom community for Tel Aviv commuters, was the place last year where two young soldiers were killed while on their day off. In Jerusalem, the bus driver for my group wears a handgun on his back, tucked into his waistband, next to his cellphone.

Indeed, much has changed in Israel. Bombed nightclubs, bus shelters, restaurants and outdoor cafés draw family, friends and strangers who light candles in memory of the dead. These structures are quickly rebuilt and "repeopled," made to thrive as living monuments. Those who are injured or repeatedly "missed" by the attacks are everywhere. Families take turns sitting vigil at cemeteries and memorial sites. During the memorial service at the newly reopened Momento Café in Jerusalem, my hands tremble and my camera breaks when I meet the father and brother who hold pictures of their lost 21-year-old daughter and sister. Carmel, my nine-year old cousin, reads the morning headlines and sees that a family was attacked and killed at home. She cries to her mother, "I thought that you told me we were safe in our own house."

One evening, I walk along Tel Aviv's promenade to Jaffa with Tova, an Israeli shopkeeper, past the Dolphinarium, the disco where 21 teenagers were killed the summer of 2001. The day before, I had visited a memorial site at the high school attended by seven of these children. Business is booming at the nightclub and so is the music. A wedding car is parked out front near the memorial stone which describes the attack in both Hebrew and Russian. We continue on to Jaffa, where Tova spent her childhood, to meet her friends and family, through the empty, dark and mysterious casbah of the oldest city on the Mediterranean Sea. When I finally ask her why she walks there alone each night, she tells me that her friends are too afraid to accompany her.

'In the new Israel, theatre performances are filled to capacity... but the mood is different now': Members of the Israel Ballet rest between performances.

'Four suicide attacks occur during the few weeks that I am here'

Dalia Shatz, a tiny woman in her 70s, finds solace in her volunteer work, visiting wounded soldiers in hospitals all over the country. Her telephones are always ringing as calls come directly from the army liaison informing her of the newly injured. Adding the names to her list, she quickly prepares for her visits. She takes gifts, books and pizza, and organizes outings to movies or restaurants where possible. When I accompany her, she also brings gifts of chocolate donated from around the world through an Internet service. But it is her radiance and warm heart that comfort the patients and their families. Even the faces of the hospital staff light up when she arrives.

Through Dalia, I meet Sergeant Tzach Tayar, a new patient, and his friend in uniform, Barach Ribshtein. They grew up together in Ashdod and have remained together in the same army team. Tzach's room is filled with family, friends and balloons in celebration of his 20th birthday and Barach's bravery – he had saved Tzach's life when they were ambushed just two days before. Tzach boasts about his friend, his hero and his concern for Moran, another soldier under his command who is down the hall, recovering from the same attack.

I also meet Zeev Langer, who left his job three months ago when his youngest son Rotem, a paratrooper in the army, suffered serious head injuries while on active military duty. Langer talks about the miraculous work of the doctors and his dedication to his son's rehabilitation. Rotem, who is 20, is relearning to walk. He may never recover his speech. Zeev modestly recounts how the family was invited to Jerusalem the day before, where his son was presented with a medal for his contribution to the country. Zeev lives on hospital grounds, providing emotional support and a sense of humour to his son and others in the trauma unit like Sherri Ben Arroya, a 20-year-old soldier, who was wounded by a bomb at Passover. She not only incurred serious paralyzing injuries, but also lost her father during that attack.

Four suicide attacks occur during the few weeks that I am here, one on a busy morning bus in Jerusalem, not far from where I am staying. Too many are suffering; too many are killed. Many tears are shed. The country is in a state of shock and so am I.

So how do they deal with their fears and losses and keep smiling? How do they leave home to go to the store, take the bus, drive or walk to school, go to work, go to the synagogue, go to the dentist, go to a café, go to the beach, go to the ballet or merely go to meet a friend? All the activities that we take for granted have become a test for them – a test of the will to live a normal life.

But the reality is that normalcy in Israel has become akin to playing Russian roulette. Israelis don't focus on danger. Instead, they celebrate life with weddings, birthday and anniversary parties, by travelling, volunteering in community services and visiting patients in hospitals. And they send their children, grandchildren, husbands and grandfathers into the army because they believe that these horrors – this war against terrorism – will end. They have endured nightmares intermittently for generations. They are confident that the calm they once experienced will return. And the buses keep filling up.

'We know there'll be a better tomorrow'

Israel's Prime Minister, Ariel Sharon, exemplifies the Israeli spirit at an army base outside Tel Aviv during an evening where hundreds of soldiers and international guests wait patiently for his late arrival. He shakes hands with his guests and delivers a stirring speech of gratitude to his soldiers, even though while en route to speak, he has been informed of the terrorist attack on a civilian home in Itamar that killed a mother, her three sons and a neighbour. The audience is not told about this until after he thanks the young soldiers for their bravery and exceptional work in protecting the country. After his quick departure, he conveys the message through his spokesperson to continue with the event and award celebration. And dance they do. It is an inspiring sight to see both male and female soldiers whose faces represent so many nations dancing with their guests from around the globe.

A girl prays in the Tunnel Walls of the Western Wall in the Old City of Jerusalem in memory of her uncle who was killed in a suicide bombing the day before this photograph was taken.

It is a privilege to meet such determined and remarkable people who share their stories and permit me to photograph them. On the last evening of the mission, when our group discusses our thoughts and emotions about our experiences, Ezra Eini, our dedicated and knowledgeable Israeli guide, tells us how isolated his country feels and expresses his appreciation to visitors who he says give him strength. With tears in his eyes, he discloses how he deals with his own personal tragedy – the loss of his youngest son, "Moishela," an IDF captain who was ambushed and killed in a terrorist attack just three months prior.

"We know there'll be a better tomorrow because we have each other," says Ezra.

Resilience, endurance, zest for life, humour and love for each other and their country seem to be the Israeli's antidote to terrorism. I learn much from them. Their courage gives me courage. I hope to return soon to the old Israel.

Beverley Abramson is a freelance photographer who lives in Toronto.

Anna Vashbein, a 25-year-old former gold medallist in acrobatics and the mother of an 18-month-old, was paralyzed by the suicide attack last Passover at the Park Hotel in Netanya while working there. She is undergoing treatment in the Neurological Rehabilitation Centre in Bet Levinstein, Ra'anana.

Change the World With A Sound

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

The first time you hear RebbeSoul will be a revelation; at least it was for me.

Within minutes of sliding his new album into the CD player, I realized that here was a type of contemporary Jewish music I had rarely heard before.

Melodious and musically rich, Change the World With A Sound does more than just pulsate with sizzling rhythms and sensuous sounds. It seems spiritually alive.

Melding Carlebachean melodiousness with Chassid-like exuberance, the music seems a loving and appealing tribute to the spiritual inheritance of the Jewish people.

The dozen songs blend eastern or Mizrachi musical stylings with rock and world-fusion sensibilities. The sound is simultaneously as ancient as Abraham and as up-to-the-minute as Madonna.

Droning prayers heard repeatedly in Kaddish

This American artist, whose real name is Bruce Burger, weaves part of his magic in the studio, splicing in many extraneous beats and sounds such as the droning prayers heard repeatedly in Kaddish. Yet all of the technical wizardry, along with the impressive musical artistry, seems in service of a higher purpose.

RebbeSoul adds to the exotic musical mix by playing mandolin and balalaika, but the real soul of the music lies in its exploration of Judaic themes and mystical traditions. The lyrics are in English and Hebrew, intermittently.

Many of the lyrics were penned by Kings David and Solomon and the great composer known as Traditional. Four songs were composed by RebbeSoul.

According to the liner notes, the song Esa Enai is a collaboration between Reb Shlomo Carlebach and King David, with additional lyrics by Prophet X, and arranged (beautifully) by RebbeSoul. The track also features Toronto's own Neshama Carlebach, daughter of the late Reb Shlomo.

Other selections include Tzamah L'Cha Nafshi, Rock of Ages, Kol Dodi, Qaafilah and Shmelke's Nigun, the latter a creation of Reb Shmuel Brazil. The penultimate track features the mellifluous voice of Reb Zalman Schachter-Shalomi reading the I.L. Peretz story, Reincarnation of A Melody.

The final selection is Avinu, RebbeSoul's irresistible rendition of part of the Avinu Malkeinu prayer, which helped launch his musical career. He first recorded his arrangement of the song about eight years ago in Los Angeles, and it soon won instant airplay on radio stations throughout the city. Since then, Avinu has become his calling-card and he's put a version of it on all of his four CDs.

RebbeSoul's music is so closely associated with religious devotion that he's had to explain to journalists that he was never ordained into his higher calling.

"The thing is, I am a professional musician who makes Jewish music that sounds good," he told an interviewer recently. "I'm not a singing rabbi. I'm a real musician with an inspiration for this music."

RebbeSoul is one of a growing number of youngish contemporary Jewish artists who are neither afraid of nor alienated from our spiritual traditions. But unlike many other such artists, he vigorously celebrates our shared Judaism without a trace of cynicism. Perhaps it's this quality that I find the most refreshing.

A unique Chanukah gift: a new Jewish baseball card series

By MARK BENSON
The Jewish Advocate

BOSTON — During the annual convention of the Society for American Baseball Research here this past summer, Martin Abramowitz of Newton, Mass., invited convention attendees to his home for brunch and a discussion on baseball players from years past, like Greenberg, Koufax and Reese.

However, the Reese mentioned was not Brooklyn Dodger shortstop Pee Wee Reese, but Jimmy Reese, another middle infielder who played some 70 years ago.

The lesser-known Reese shares a special distinction with Hank Greenberg and Sandy Koufax – he is one of just 140 Jews ever to play major league baseball, and will be featured in an upcoming set of baseball cards Abramowitz created to celebrate this fascinating aspect of the Jewish experience in America.

Abramowitz is the founder of Jewish Major Leaguers, a non-profit organization based in Newton (actually, in Abramowitz's home) that is collaborating on the project with the American Jewish Historical Society (AJHS) and a card manufacturer to be determined. He hopes that the first set of cards will bring attention to men like Reese, a second baseman for the New York Yankees during the 1930 and 1931 seasons who roomed on road trips with none other than Babe Ruth. (Though, as Reese often quipped, he spent more time in the hotel with the Babe's luggage than with the Bambino himself.)

Abramowitz, the vice-president of planning and agency relations with Combined Jewish Philanthropies, Boston's Jewish federation, has become a baseball historian through his efforts to help honour Jewish Americans who appeared in the major league game from 1871 to the present.

During baseball's early years, Reese and other Jews sometimes concealed their religion. The story of how Reese revealed his Jewish identity is quite amusing.

No one knew that he was Jewish when he broke in with the Yankees in 1930

"Reese changed his given name to Jimmy Reese, and no one knew that he was Jewish when he broke in with the Yankees in 1930," Abramowitz said.

Reese batted .346 in his rookie year with the Bronx Bombers, and was an astounding 10 for 20 that season as a pinch-hitter.

One day, in an exhibition game, Reese stepped into the batter's box against a Jewish pitcher and Jewish catcher who communicated their signs in Yiddish. Reese feasted on this pitcher in the past, and the catcher was perplexed.

"You are hitting the ball extremely well against us – it's as if you know what we're going to throw before the ball comes to the plate," the catcher said to Reese, according to Abramowitz. "We're giving each other signs in Yiddish – there is no way that you could know that."

"Reese paused, then he told the catcher, 'My name is Hymie Solomon.'"

Reese and the other Jewish baseball players honoured in this card set are taken from an official list compiled by the Jewish Sports Review in Los Angeles. The list includes Hall of Famers such as Greenberg, who challenged Ruth's single-season home-run record in 1938 when he hit 58 of them for the Detroit Tigers, as well as today's legends-in-the making, such as Los Angeles Dodger Shawn Green, who hit four home runs in a memorable 6-for-6 performance last May.

The historical society hopes to be able to release this set by Opening Day 2003, but the release is pending final approval of Major League Baseball, the Major League Baseball Players Association, the Major League Players Alumni Association and the players themselves. The society is currently in discussions with these organizations about licensing issues.

Significant, highly readable, and well-researched contribution

It is estimated that 10,000 sets of the cards will be produced and sold at a price of $36 (US) per set. The cards will be marketed primarily through a network of Jewish congregations, gift shops, museums, bookstores, catalogues and the Jewish media. The National Baseball Hall of Fame in Cooperstown, N.Y., has expressed interest in selling the cards as well.

The process of documenting player achievements, learning their stories and locating pictures has significantly advanced scholarship on Jews in baseball. In a letter to AJHS, Timothy Wiles, director of research at the Baseball Hall of Fame, wrote glowingly of the Jewish card series.

"This card set is a significant, highly readable, and well-researched contribution to the documentary record of both baseball and the participation of Jews in the game," Wiles said.

Abramowitz, whom Wiles invited to speak at the Hall of Fame about his efforts to put together the card set, is proud of what the project will accomplish.

"When we issue the Jewish Major Leaguers set, it will be the first major-league card for about 50 players and the first card of any kind for about 40 players," said Abramowitz, who noted the official title of the set will be American Jews in America's Game, 1871-2002.

"The first Jewish player to use his obviously Jewish name was Andy Cohen, a second baseman with the New York Giants in the 1920s, and the total number of Jews in major league baseball comprise one-tenth of one per cent of all who made it to the majors."

Abramowitz tapped into an eclectic network of baseball afficionados to create the cards, including the late George Brace, a Chicago-area photographer who took at least one picture of every major leaguer who passed through the Windy City to play either the Cubs or the White Sox from the late '20s until the early '90s. While the Hall of Fame provided some photographs, Brace furnished Abramowitz with all but a handful of the pictures needed.

To obtain the remaining photos, Abramowitz and his colleagues added to the record of Jews in the major leagues with some original research. Hours and hours were spent poring through obituaries and newspaper archives to locate the families of these players in the hopes of getting a picture for the front of their cards. During this effort, Abramowitz discovered another Jewish baseball player initially omitted from the Jewish Sports Review's list – Sam Fishburn, an infielder who made his debut with the St. Louis Cardinals in 1919.

For Abramowitz, the opportunity to issue cards for Fishburn and other Jewish major leaguers who were never recognized for their unique distinction motivated him to see the project to fruition.

"I really wanted these guys to have cards, to have a slice of immortality," said Abramowitz, whose teenage son, Jacob, encouraged him to create the set and sketched the design for the card logo.

"Baseball cards represent an American sports icon, and I wanted these guys to be memorialized in some clear way. I feel very responsible for their image and seeing that their names live on in the history of baseball."

Abramowitz has advanced $25,000 (US) of his own money so far into the project, which has paid for design work, rights to photos, research and pre-marketing expenses.

AJHS has stepped up to the plate to repay Abramowitz for his initial investment; when issued, the cards will be an AJHS product. The society is also seeking to raise about $45,000 (US) to pay for the actual production costs.

For more information on "American Jews in America's Game, 1871-2001," e-mail jewishmajorleaguers@rcn.com. AJHS plans to host an exhibit of the cards and associated memorabilia in the spring. Contact <ajhs@ajhs.org> for details.

Kenya attack Al Qaeda ploy?

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — If Al Qaeda operatives were behind last week's deadly terror attack on the Hotel Paradise in Mombasa, Kenya, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's vow to bring the perpetrators to justice could prove difficult.

Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz told Sunday's cabinet meeting that no concrete evidence has yet been discovered proving the involvement of Osama bin Laden's terrorist network.

However, Israeli and U.S. officials suspect Al Qaeda or al-Itihaad al-Islamiya – Arabic for the Islamic Union – a Somali Islamic group suspected of having links to Al Qaeda.

They voiced the suspicions even though a previously unknown group calling itself the Army of Palestine claimed responsibility for the attack on the hotel, which is partly owned by Israelis.

Globes online, the Web site of Israel's business newspaper, reported that the Paradise Hotel is owned by Kenyan and British investors, but hundreds of Israelis had bought time-share apartments in the building.

Driving a car packed with explosives into the hotel compound, three suicide bombers killed 13 people – three Israelis and 10 Kenyans.

The attack – as well as another deadly assault that day in Israel – took place as the Likud party held its leadership primary.

Minutes before the hotel blast, two surface-to-air missiles were fired at an Israeli charter plane taking off from Mombasa's airport with 261 passengers and crew members aboard. The missiles missed the plane by a matter of feet.

There were no injuries or damage to the Arkia Airlines plane, which later landed safely at Ben-Gurion Airport.

It's still Chanukah!

Despite the fact terrorists struck again last week, it is important to remind ourselves that we are still celebrating Chanukah. The photos of this young boy at the Schneider Children's Hospital in Israel enjoying his sufganiyah remind us that ignoring the holiday is to surrender to the terrorists. We will not, therefore, ignore the holiday.

'Important to help encourage others'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Barry Sherman says he is a driven man. "My father died when I was 10. My mother had to work hard to support us. We really had nothing."

Fast forward 50 years. Sherman, now 60, and his wife Honey are giving a $50-million endowment to UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto, the largest the organization has ever received.

Sherman's early life experiences made him "driven to succeed and to do things as quickly as possible. I realize how short life is."

Barry and Honey Sherman

In a phone interview last week, the chair and CEO of the pharmaceutical company Apotex Inc. – who was named earlier this year by the National Post as the seventh-wealthiest person in Canada – said he feels it's important "not only to do our part, but to help encourage others to do likewise."

Sherman feels a particular obligation as part of UJA Federation's leadership. "I'm out there often trying to get others to contribute." He and his wife have given the largest annual UJA contribution of all donors for about the past decade, he said.

There was no particular significance to the $50 million amount, according to Sherman. "It's a level we feel we can honour." Half the amount will be in the form of a bequest, and half is to be paid over the next few years.

CANADA

Shop Israel Event

VANCOUVER — Some 2,000 people turned out last month to a weekend Shop Israel event at the Jewish Community Centre of Greater Vancouver to buy such items as Judaica, artwork, cosmetics and kippot directly from 17 Israeli merchants. The goal was to help the retailers, who have been hurt by declining tourism due to Israel's ongoing conflict with the Palestinians.

ISRAEL

AIDS on the Rise

JERUSALEM — The number of AIDS cases in Israel is growing by 10 per cent a year, Israel's Health Ministry reports. There are more than 3,500 AIDS cases in Israel, the ministry says. Of the 300 new carriers each year, one-quarter are foreigners.

Palestinian Threat

JERUSALEM — A Palestinian legislator has threatened suicide attacks against the United States, according to Palestinian Media Watch. U.S. President George W. Bush's policies toward the Arab world will leave Arabs so isolated in world opinion that they will have no alternative but to carry out suicide bombings, Nahed Munir Alrayis wrote last Monday in the Palestinian Authority's official daily Al-Hayat Al-Jadida.

Aid Request Made

JERUSALEM — Israeli officials asked for $10 billion (US) in loan guarantees from the United States during a meeting last week in Washington, D.C., with U.S. National Security Adviser Condoleezza Rice, the Prime Minister's Office said. Israel is also seeking $4 billion in special military aid from the United States to help fight terrorism and prepare for a possible U.S. war against Iraq.

Arabs Targeted

JERUSALEM — There have been several apparent revenge attacks near the site of the recent suicide bus bombing here. In one, an Arab pharmacology student was stabbed in the lower back. In another, three female Arabs were targeted in an attempted stabbing.

WORLD

Poet Reinvited

BOSTON — Harvard University's English department has reinvited a controversial Irish poet who once said West Bank settlers should be "shot dead." One week after his appearance was cancelled because of his anti-Israeli comments, department members met for two hours and voted to reinvite Tom Paulin. "Free speech was a principle that needed upholding here," Harvard Prof. Peter Sacks said.

Rabbi Spared Death

FREEHOLD, N.J. — A jury has spared Rabbi Fred Neulander the death penalty for hiring two men to kill his wife. Rabbi Neulander was convicted Nov. 24 of murder and conspiracy to commit murder in the death of his wife, Carol. His formal sentencing, when a judge will give him a jail term of 30 years to life in prison without the possibility of parole, is slated for Jan. 16.

Patriot Missile Promise

BERLIN — Germany will provide Israel with Patriot missiles for defence against Iraq because it has a "moral duty" to protect Israel, Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder told the weekly Die Zeit newspaper. Israel Defence Ministry officials said they asked for the missiles more than a year ago and renewed the request during recent talks with their German counterparts.

Abraham Cleared

LOS ANGELES — Biblical patriarch Abraham was found not guilty of agreeing to sacrifice his son Isaac. Jurors at a mock trial last week at the University of Judaism here voted 225-216 to clear Abraham of agreeing to sacrifice Isaac after God asked him to. TV Judge Joseph Wapner, who presided over the trial, said, "Under California law, I don't think intent was proven beyond a reasonable doubt."

Peace Shirt Includes 'Palestine,' Omits Israel

MONTREAL — YMCA Canada officials say they weren't trying to make a political statement with a T-shirt promoting world peace that listed Palestine but not Israel among countries involved in the struggle for world peace.

On the front of the black shirt is a quote from Gandhi: "We must be the change we wish to see in the world." On the back is a list of more than 100 countries that host Ys worldwide. The shirts were handed out at YMCAs throughout Canada to mark World Peace Week, Nov. 17-23.

"The T-shirt could have mentioned Israel as a place trying to have peace," said Sandy Kogut, a music instructor at the YMCA in the Montreal suburb of Westmount, who, along with several colleagues, has refused to wear the shirts. She noted the International YMCA is in western Jerusalem.

Mary Stobbe, YMCA Canada's manager of communications, said "Palestine" was included because the Ys in Palestinian areas identify themselves that way.

Silvana Anania, the YMCA's director of international development, said in a statement that the Y in western Jerusalem is a branch of the American YMCA movement.

"We're not trying to make a political statement, except to say we are trying to promote peace, not conflict," Anania said. The list simply represents countries with YMCA organizations, she added.

The YMCA has been issuing these T-shirts for years, but this is the first year Palestine has been included as a country, Anania said. But Kogut noted that a similar T-shirt last year mentioned a Y in "Gaza, Palestine."

Anania promised next year's shirts will include Israel.

Failure to list Hezbollah prompts court action

Hamas, Palestinian Islamic Jihad added to list of outlawed terrorist organizations

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

The federal government has omitted Hezbollah from its newly expanded list of illegal terrorist groups, despite earlier warnings from its own spy agency that the organization has been active in Canada.

Ottawa last week revised its list of outlawed terrorist organizations to include Hamas and Palestinian Islamic Jihad, which have both claimed responsibility for suicide bombings against Israelis. Four other radical Islamic groups have also been added to the new list, but Hezbollah's absence has been blasted by Jewish groups, the Opposition and one Liberal MP as outrageous and inexplicable.

While membership alone in the listed groups is not illegal, providing them with material assistance now carries a penalty of up to 10 years in prison.

The government said raising money for Hezbollah's military wing has been prohibited in this country since last year's passage of Canada's anti-terrorism law, Bill C-36. "So it is, in fact, listed," Solicitor-General Wayne Easter said last week in announcing the revised List of Terrorist Entities.

But with Hezbollah's exclusion, Canadians can still assist or finance the militant Shiite group's so-called social wing, which is said to conduct charitable and humanitarian activities. (By contrast, the United States has criminalized support for all of Hezbollah's activities.)

B'nai Brith Canada announced last Friday that it is taking the government to court over the new list. At a press conference in Ottawa, B'nai Brith senior legal counsel David Matas said he had filed an application in Federal Court seeking to overturn the decision because it is wrong in law, discriminatory and violates several international statutes.

In drafting the new list, the Liberals ignored repeated pleas from Canadian Jewish Congress to abandon what CJC has termed a "specious" distinction between Hezbollah's military and socio-political arms. Congress and others have long argued that funds flow freely between Hezbollah's various arms.

Apparently, the government has also ignored a 1997 warning by the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS) that Hezbollah, the Iranian-backed Party of God, had established an infrastructure in Canada "that can assist and support terrorists seeking a safe haven in North America. Hezbollah members in Canada receive and comply with direction from the Hezbollah leadership hierarchy in Lebanon."

Those allegations were made in a 19-page summary of evidence filed in Federal Court to support the government's efforts to deport Hani Abd Rahim al-Sayegh, who was accused of helping carry out the 1996 truck bombing that killed 19 Americans in Saudi Arabia.

Published reports have also shown extensive fundraising by Hezbollah in this country. As recently as two years ago, agents in Vancouver, Montreal and Toronto reportedly moved hundreds of thousands of dollars through various Canadian banks and purchased a range of military supplies that were then shipped to Lebanon.

Canadian Jewish officials are also keeping a close eye on the case of Fawzi Ayub, a senior Hezbollah operative who has been in Israeli custody since June. Ayub, 38, is a Canadian citizen who is alleged to have planned the Nov. 15 terrorist attack in Hebron that killed 12 Israelis. He reportedly flew to Athens on a valid Canadian passport, and then to Tel Aviv using forged American documents.

A visit to Germany (3)

From the editor's desk

Historians trace the first arrival of Jews to the territory that would centuries later be known as Germany, to sometime in the fourth century AD. For, in edicts published in 321 and 331 by the Roman Emperor Constantine, in relation to the imposition of duties and taxes, the Jews of Colonia (Köln, Cologne) are specifically mentioned.

Thus, historians surmise, Jews came to the area, along with or just following the Roman armies who settled throughout central Europe in the years preceding the fall of the Roman Empire.

Those early Jewish travellers to the Roman outposts of central Europe would ultimately evolve, through more than a millennium of wandering, settlement, persecution, exile and return, into scores of hundreds of thriving, vibrant, pulsating Jewish communities throughout the European continent that would permanently and profoundly influence the entirety of unfolding western civilization.

But that would end, brutally, in the fourth decade of the 20th century A.D., when the leaders of National Socialism in Germany organized and saw to the implementation of the destruction, effectively, of the Jews of Europe.

In an effort to better understand the history of European Jewry before the advent of Germany's National Socialism, and to better understand myself as a member of a people whose influence on western civilization hearkens back to the beginning of counted time, I visited the country. Through the sponsorship of the Goethe Institut, Inter Nationes and the Press and Information Office of the federal government, I travelled there last month on a brief tour.

In this, the third of four installments of my reflections from that trip, I shall share part of my experience at one specific site I visited: Raschihaus (Rashi's house) in Worms, in west-central Germany.

The community in Worms (pronounced Vorms), along with its companion communities of Speyer (pronounced Shpeyer) and Mainz, all situated on the banks of the Rhine River, formed one of most famous Jewish districts in medieval Europe. It was known by the name Shum, which in Hebrew, means garlic: "sh" from the first letter of Shpeyer, "u" from the first letter of Worms (for the letter vav, which, in Hebrew, would be the first letter of the word) and "m" from the first letter of Mainz. In fact, drawings of Jews from that area and period of time often depicted a man holding a clove of garlic in his hand, to identify him as a Jew from the Shum community on the Rhine.

Rabbi Shlomo ben Yitzchaki, acronymically and affectionately known as Rashi, one of the most formidable and most important of all biblical and talmudic commentators in Jewish history, lived for a period of time during the 11th century, in Worms. Most Jews who have lived on Earth since the 11th century and who have ever studied a page of the Bible will likely have heard of Rashi.

The place where Rashi lived and studied is now part of a four-structure complex that houses a museum depicting former Jewish life in Worms, including its original synagogue, yeshiva and mikvah. Of course, the entire complex had to be rebuilt after its destruction, along with all the other synagogues of Germany, on Nov. 9, 1938. But today, the complex receives visitors and the synagogue is used on rare occasions.

To the North American visitor, most of the artifacts of former Rhineland Jewish life that are on display will not be especially evocative, for they are intended, primarily, to educate a non-Jewish population of the unique Jewish culture that once existed there.

But there was also on display, under glass, beyond the trembling touch of an emotional visitor, evidence of the destruction of this community wrought by the Nazis.

Near one end of the room was the correspondence, preserved, copied and translated into English of Dr. and Mrs. Friedrich Gernsheim written in 1938 in elegant, sorrowful, but unapologetic German. It was a letter of suicide explaining to their friends and to the world that death at their own hands was preferable to the death that they were certain awaited them at the hands of the Nazis.

As my eye lifted from the letter neatly arrayed in the display case alongside photos of the Gernsheim family and citations of commendation, it caught on a display case in the corner of the room.

My heart sank.

I was staring at burnt, singed and torn sifrei Torah. I moved slowly toward the display, disbelief dragging my steps. Never in my life, living in the freedom of post-war Canada, had I seen such desecration. Never in my life had I imagined I would.

Though I have read countless texts and seen countless images of the Shoah, I was not prepared for my reaction to the sight of the desecrated Torah parchments. I inwardly crumbled. I could not stop the tears and turned away from the guide who obviously understood the import of the moment and desisted, for the moment, from her presentation.

After a few moments by myself, the tour resumed. My guide and I walked the relatively short distance to the Jewish cemetery of Worms, the oldest Jewish cemetery in Europe.

SUPPORT AND SOLIDARITY FOR ISRAEL:

Islam needs to be reformed, says commentator

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Can Islam ever accept Israel?

With Muslim clerics lauding suicide bombings, the short-term answer seems to be no, according to conservative U.S. intellectual Norman Podhoretz.

But if Islam undergoes an internal reformation, just as Judaism and Christianity have experienced, then acceptance of a Jewish state in the Muslim world is possible.

"Islam cannot be reformed overnight or by force of arms," Podhoretz told hundreds who packed Holy Blossom Temple's sanctuary on Nov. 20.

"But an American-led victory [in Iraq] would inevitably [lead to] regime changes throughout the Middle East. That could [spark] new political and economic situations... which could open the path for the reform of Islam."

Podhoretz, who was the long-time editor of Commentary magazine and has authored nine books, said that since Islam began in the seventh century, it has been "stuck [with the same] theology and legal traditions."

That includes the Qu'ran's stipulation that Jews and Christians are subordinate.

Islamic philosophy also teaches that the lands of the Arabian world, including Palestine, come under the realm of Dar El-Islam, meaning it is the will of God that they should be ruled by Muslims.

In more recent times, Podhoretz said Islam has been "infected" by European anti-Semitism.

For instance, the Protocols of the Elders of Zion, a fraudulent Russian Czarist forgery that alleges a sinister Jewish conspiracy to rule the world, was translated into Arabic in the early 20th century.

A 41-episode dramatization of the book is currently being broadcast n Egypt.

While jihad, or "holy war," is depicted in Muslim texts as an inner struggle for religious perfection, Podhoretz said many Muslim clerics say suicide bombings are "a legitimate [form of jihad] according to Islamic law."

Podhoretz also poked holes in U.S. President George W. Bush's statements about fundamentalists "hijacking" true Islam.

"Indeed, there is something in Islam which breeds and legitimates the likes of Osama bin Laden," Podhoretz said.

Although the present situation seems bleak, Podhoretz said he is optimistic about the future.

He said citizens in oppressive Muslim regimes yearn for reform and are eager to adopt western practices of freedom and tolerance.

"Muslims, no more than anyone else, like being pushed around," Podhoretz said.

"The first thing the people of Kabul, Afghanistan did [when the Taliban regime fell] was dig up their VCR's and rent movies. They saw nothing in this that contradicted the Muslim faith."

The trigger for this reform, Podhoretz said, "is a decisive victory in the war against terrorism.

"But it's not up to the Jews or anybody else to tell Muslims to reform their religion. It's for them to do this themselves."

My name is Lisa Bliss. I am a registered nurse. I dropped 30 pounds in eight short months and kept it off for two years! I'd like to share my remarkable success story with you.

Lisa Bliss Before Hypnosis

I thought dieting was my only way out! I tried diet pills from the health food store. I tried Weight Watchers and frozen, low-calorie foods. But I never stuck to anything long enough to have results. These "quick-fix" diets were not something I could live with long term.

Luckily, I learned about Positive Changes Hypnosis Centres through my friend and business partner. I thought it was a very different approach to weight loss, but it made a lot of sense. Not having to rely on my will power appealed to me.

Hypnosis is Different!

I love my hypnotic sessions. I am so deeply relaxed that all worries, cares or concerns seem to melt away. I can tune out the world and focus on myself for a while. And the life changes I've made while in that relaxed place are nothing short of miraculous!

I noticed a change in my behaviour my first week. I was drinking more water and didn't want to snack between meals. During those first seven days, I easily lost 4 pounds. I dropped my entire 30 lbs. without any effort whatsoever!

Peace Now thriving in Canada despite intifadah

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The collapse of the Oslo peace talks followed by the Palestinian intifadah have dealt a body blow to Shalom Achshav, Israel's Peace Now movement, with disillusioned members leaving the group in droves.

Yet the organization's affiliated group in Canada, Canadian Friends of Peace Now, shows no signs of a similar sort of hemorrhaging. In fact, says the group's policy director, Sheldon Gordon, "we're very much a thriving organization."

Organized as a loose voluntary group of supporters, Gordon said the "level of support has remained pretty much the same. We were worried that with the outbreak of the intifadah, we'd suffer a decline, but that didn't happen."

Instead, organizers were pleasantly surprised to see supporters stay the course. Gordon believes Peace Now's fundamental analysis of the political situation continues to attract supporters who, contrary to the "Now" in the group's name, are willing to give the peace process more time to develop.

"People want to make an investment in peace," he said. "Although efforts in Israel dimmed and Shalom Achshav's influence diminished, so it would have been natural for people to conclude we'd not be effective. But people took the long view."

Israelis, on the other hand, "are perhaps more volatile in their political views. They get disillusioned and enthusiastic more readily than Canadian Jews."

Israelis felt burned by the Palestinians' resort to violence, even after they had committed themselves to a peaceful resolution of the conflict, he said. For their part, Canadians realize "there will be setbacks along the way, but ultimately, Peace Now's position is so sensible and came so close to being adopted, that its time will come again."

For Gordon and the Friends' group, that solution remains two states, side by side with Jerusalem as a shared capital.

Polls in Israel show the public is ready to give up territory and close down settlements in exchange for peace, even while they are likely to vote for Likud. An Israeli withdrawal, he predicted, would lead to "a drastic reduction of terrorism," because it would satisfy Palestinians' desire for their own country.

Asked about critics who have said that Israel's unilateral withdrawal from Lebanon did not bring peace while it encouraged Palestinian violence, Gordon acknowledged the withdrawal may have "emboldened" the Palestinians.

"But it brought Israel a much greater degree of de facto peace on its border," he added.

Taking his analysis one step further, Gordon suggested that even if his group is mistaken and Palestinians remain irredentist, "Israel is at its strongest, morally, militarily and politically defending its own land and people rather than retaining another people's land and ruling over another people."

Kibbutzim within pre-1967 Israel, like Kibbutz Metzer, where terrorists killed five people, are "defenceless" because the Israeli army "is busy defending settlements. That's really an intolerable situation," he said.

Settlements, he continued, "are a strategic dead weight."

Turning to the Jan. 28 elections, Gordon said the Labor Party remains "the underdog in the election. [Labor leader Amram] Mitzna, because he carries the colours of the peace camp, is at a distinct disadvantage."

Early polls show Likud winning a decisive victory over Labor but "we're hoping that Mitzna's common-sense approach to dealing with the intifadah can take votes away from Sharon."

In past months, Canadian Friends has continued its programming, inviting a series of guests to discuss the prospects for peace in the Middle East, and it recently concluded a fundraising drive. Although the final numbers are not in, "the exit polls are encouraging," Gordon said.

The Canadian group can be expected to send tens of thousands of dollars to help Shalom Achshav get its message out during the upcoming election campaign, he said.

It also plans to hold a post-election panel in early February to discuss the results of the vote.

Education key to Ethiopian integration into Israel: educator

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In 1984, Shula Mola began a journey from her village in Ethiopia with a pack on her back and a vision of a better life in the holy city of Jerusalem.

Now Mola lives in the city of her dreams and has taken up a new challenge: her people's struggle not to become a permanent underclass in her Jewish homeland.

According to last July's edition of The Israel Equality Monitor, there are approximately 85,000 Jews of Ethiopian descent in Israel – including 23,000 who are Israeli born.

In an interview with The CJN, Mola spoke about statistics that show that 70 per cent of Ethiopian families have no incoming salary, only 28 per cent of Ethiopian high school students pass their matriculation exams (less than half the national average) and that there was an increase of 255 per cent in Ethiopian youth arrested between 1995 and 1996.

Shula Mola

Mola, who has a master's degree in education from Hebrew University, is director of the Israel Association for Ethiopian Jews (IAEJ). She speaks passionately about the need to reverse the Ethiopian community's downward cycle, saying the Israeli government must change the educational process that Ethiopian children go through when they first come to the country.

IAEJ is a non-profit organization in Israel that works for the full integration of Ethiopian Jews into mainstream Israeli society. Its primary focus is education, which Mola stresses is the key to Ethiopian absorption.

At a recent talk at Holy Blossom Temple, Mola said her journey to Israel began when she convinced her mother to take her two younger siblings and join a group of 200 villagers planning to immigrate to the Jewish state through the deserts of Ethiopia and Sudan.

Mola described the four-week walk during which some members of the group were raped, others robbed, and most fell ill. Outside a refugee camp near Khartoum, Sudan, Mola, who was then 12 years old, and her family were finally met by a group of men and flown to Tel Aviv via Paris.

Others, including her father, stayed behind and arrived in Israel later, when thousands of Ethiopians were airlifted in Operation Moses and Operation Solomon.

As the Ethiopians began to arrive, Youth Aliyah boarding schools were on the verge of being shut down because of a decline in immigration.

"In order to prevent their closure, thousands of Ethiopian teenagers were taken away from their families and placed into these institutions," Mola said.

While the Ministry of Absorption intended to help these teenagers, the inadvertent message sent to the children was "our parents are no longer capable of raising us," said the soft-spoken mother of two.

"Unfortunately, our parents heard this message as well."

The young immigrants were placed in boarding schools with children whom other schools had expelled and rejected. Often, these were "children whose parents were criminals, alcoholics or violent."

Because many of the immigrants had very little education when they first arrived, "the government officials, teachers, and social workers responsible for our absorption did not believe in our potential," Mola said. "They thought we were only capable of becoming menial workers."

The Ethiopian community has also been negatively affected by the creation of ghettos because, she said, "we were placed in close proximity to one another in disadvantaged neighbourhoods within a small number of cities and towns."

Because the assumption was that we couldn't accomplish anything for ourselves, a staff was created to look after our needs, forcing us to become dependent on others, Mola said.

But, she said, we took care of ourselves in Ethiopia and overcame enormous obstacles to come to Israel.

It's important to raise expectations for this community because "when we are given the chance, we can work hard, and accomplish great feats," she said.

Mola says that now, "we want to return the mandate to our parents to educate their own children," adding that more resources should be allocated to various educational programs, including programs in early childhood education.

Developing educated and successful black citizens is beneficial not only to the Ethiopian community, but also to Israeli society as a whole, she said.

The "Ethiopian Jewish community could become [the] spokespeople for Israel" and prove that colour is not a barrier to building a Jewish homeland, she said.

The West should beware

The unrelenting, perverse persecution of Israelis and Jews like hunted prey, by murderous Islamists, last week entered an even darker dimension. In the suicide bombing of the Paradise Hotel in Mombasa, more Kenyans than Israelis were killed. No doubt the planners of the terror simply considered the non-Israeli victims to be inevitable "collateral damage," unworthy of an apology or even of a fragmentary, if feigned, expression of regret.

And though no one was killed in the failed missile attack against the civilian Arkia airliner, something did indeed die, or should have. That was the illusory sense of immunity felt by many western apologists who believe that the "struggle" of the "freedom fighters, militants, guerrillas" – any noun but terrorists – for whom they apologize and find excuses, would be directed only at Israel, and possibly its American "sponsor."

But now, all civil aviation worldwide has been put at risk by the terrorists' all-consuming hatred of Jews.

The pathological nature of this hatred and its dangerous implications for the world were expounded upon by noted Ha'aretz commentator Ze'ev Schiff in an article that appeared Sunday. Schiff disclosed that a statement titled "Letter to the American People," allegedly written by Osama bin Laden, had been disseminated over the Internet, days before the Mombasa bombing last week.

"The creation and continuation of Israel is one of the greatest crimes, and you [the Americans] are the leaders of its criminals," the letter said. "The creation of Israel is a crime which must be erased. Each and every person whose hands have become polluted in the contribution toward this crime must pay its price and pay for it heavily."

Investigators have not yet determined who was responsible for the missiles launched at the Arkia airplane. Most reports, however, suggest a strong Al Qaeda link, if not direct involvement.

"America's crime," the letter continues, "is not merely the present conflict... but rather a crime that has lasted for more than 80 years, ever since the British handed over Palestine... to the Jews, who have occupied it for more than 50 years."

The violent forces of anarchic, hate-filled Al Qaeda and its violent, Islamic confederates will strike at anyone, in order to bring down Israel and open, tolerant, western democracy, of which Israel is the unwelcome vanguard in the Middle East.

The West had better beware.

In the same article, Schiff also reported: "A similar claim [to that of the claim by Al Qaeda] was broadcast over Hezbollah's television station, al-Manara, immediately after the Mombasa attacks."

The government of Canada should take note. Its stubborn, illogical refusal to include Hezbollah in the list of banned terrorist organizations, brings upon it only great shame and scorn. It also makes a mockery of its publicly proclaimed joining in the campaign against terror.

BJCC finances

Paul Lungen's article of Nov. 7 ("Bathurst JCC 'in great shape,' says president"), is heartening to say the least, especially in view of the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre's (BJCC) previous financial difficulties. It is gratifying to learn that many adults and children use its facilities.

But could it be that these laudatory plaudits are, to a limited degree, premature?

Considering that the BJCC is financed to some extent by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, would it not be valuable to know how many children cannot use the BJCC's facilities, such as the drama section or the camp, because of their parents' financial difficulties, and who must thus seek relief through the Jewish Family & Child Service?

This observation is not meant in any way to belittle the excellent work the BJCC does.

Why do Jews vote Liberal?

For years, I have puzzled over why most Jews continue to vote for the Liberal party. Prime Minister Jean Chrétien's disgraceful behaviour on his recent trip to the Francophonie Summit in Beirut is just the latest embarrassment. Foreign Minister Bill Graham's refusal to label Hezbollah a terrorist organization is another example. The Liberal government has consistently voted against Israel at the United Nations. It was a Liberal government that kept Jews from coming to Canada in the 1930s, in their hour of greatest need.

So I ask again: Why do we keep voting for them?

Disbelief with government

I am writing to express my disbelief and outrage that the government has still not seen fit to outlaw Hezbollah, an active terrorist group. Canadian law enforcement officials have long said that these "fundraisers" are involved in all sorts of criminal activity as well as purchasing equipment for terror cells.

Is this what we want our beloved Canada to become? A haven for criminals and terrorists? This not the legacy that Prime Minister Jean Chrétien wants to leave behind. The ample evidence is in. It is time for Canada to take a moral stand. Chrétien, as a man who has always taken the moral path, must lead the way.

I respectfully urge the government to ban Hezbollah immediately and to order the RCMP to freeze their assets before it is too late.

What Svend lost

What was gained and lost by New Democrat MP Svend Robinson's speech outside Concordia University on Nov. 15?

Robinson gained, once again, easy media attention for a bit of self-righteous chest pounding. Some pedestrians gained a bit of diversion on what might have been a routine walk to the nearby metro.

What was lost was a window of opportunity for a rather charismatic parliamentarian to initiate a discreet, dispassionate, off-campus dialogue between a few members of the parties polarized on issues relating to the Mideast. Instead, Robinson chose to preach sanctimoniously to young people.

Also lost was even more of Robinson's credibility as a social democratic spokesperson within the arena of international conflict resolution.

Let's hope the NDP's new leader, whoever he or she may be, will be able to remedy damages already done.

It's anti-Judaism, not anti-Semitism

It is time to stop using the euphemism "anti-Semitism" and call it by its real name: "Judaism hatred." Why should we use a term coined by a hater of Jews, Wilhelm Marr, who tried to define us as a race, and apply it to the Arab world's antipathy toward us? Besides, Arabs would say, "We can't be anti-Semites, we are Semites ourselves."

"Anti-Semitism" is a politically correct term that is ultimately meaningless. Judaism – that is, our understanding of God, His ethical demands and the collective history of the people who have experienced the revelation (however it actually occurred) at Sinai – is hated. Israel's existence as an outpost of western civilization that is symbolic of these values is also hated.

As American columnist Cal Thomas has said: "The world continues to hate the Jews, not so much because of things they have done, but because their very existence is a rebuke to the inability of cultures and nation-states to deal with their own failures – most especially the failure to overcome their own bigotry. So they take it out on the Jews, because Jews are convenient and they are small in number compared to their oppressors and few will condemn them for doing so."

One need only look at the attacks by Muslim extremists everywhere to see this Judaism hatred in action.

Memories of a moment's greatness

Fifty-five years ago last week, on Nov. 29, the United Nations General Assembly voted to partition the territory that remained of Mandatory Palestine into a Jewish and an Arab state. Under the plan, Jerusalem was to be a corpus separatum, an international city. The Jews of Palestine accepted the vote; the Arabs did not. The day after the vote, the Arabs attacked Jewish settlements throughout the country.

Jews of Mandatory Palestine celebrate the news of the Partition vote.

Excerpted from Abba Eban's autobiography, Random House, New York, 1977.

The die had been cast and there was very little that most of us could do, except to accompany the forthcoming verdict with our prayers. Nevertheless, last-minute efforts had to be made to avert complications and to secure the decisive vote. The Arab delegations, led by Camille Chamoun, decided on a show of moderation in order to prevent the partition judgment from being adopted. The political committee, in adopting the partition plan, had appointed a commission of three to see whether an "agreed solution" could be found. We knew that this was impossible. After all, if an agreed solution had been feasible, there would have been no need of an Assembly discussion at all. The members designated to explore an "agreed solution" were Australia, Thailand and Iceland. The Icelandic delegate, Ambassador Thor Thors, was to be the rapporteur. By the morning of Nov. 29, the Thai delegate, Prince Wan, had prudently departed for Bangkok on the Queen Mary, ostensibly on the grounds that a revolutionary situation existed in his country, but actually in order to avoid having to cast a vote against partition. There was still some apprehension in Jewish Agency circles lest the Assembly seize on an optimistic remark by the Icelandic representative in order to defer a partition vote and explore the figment of an agreed solution. At any rate, Thor Thors would be the first speaker on that historic day, and it seemed urgent to ensure that he would set up a positive momentum. Accordingly, I began my day on Nov. 29, 1947, with a visit to him at the Barclay Hotel.

I found my position quixotic, and I thought it best to tell him so frankly. The Jewish people were at a turning point. If we succeeded, we would realize a millennial dream. If we failed, that dream might be extinguished for generations to come. The key to this turning point in the first part of the UN meeting would lie in the hands of a small island country in the middle of the Atlantic Ocean with a population of less than 175,000. It is a quality of multilateral diplomacy that governments may sometimes determine great issues in which they themselves are only remotely involved, but which are of desperate consequences to others far away. Our future as a people depended on its most decisive day on the momentum or atmosphere which would be created by a representative of Iceland. I invited Ambassador Thors to reflect on the historic mystery involved.

He replied with disconcerting emotion. He said that Iceland was far less remote from Jewish destiny than I presumed. In its culture it was deeply impregnated with biblical memories. Moreover, it was a stubborn and tenacious democracy, guarding its national particularity within its rain-swept island boundaries for century upon century – a people determined to be itself, sharing its language and literature with no other nation, and refusing to abandon its remote island outpost for warmer and gentler climes elsewhere. Such a people could be relied upon to understand the perseverance with which the Jewish people clung to its own specificity and to the recollection of its own patrimony. Ambassador Thors accepted my argument that what was needed now was "decision," not the vain pursuit of "agreement" …It was only because all prospects of an agreed solution had been exhausted in the three decades of Mandatory rule that the matter had come to the United Nations Assembly…

I made for the United Nations General Assembly headquarters, which was in a ferment of tension. Newspapermen, television and radio correspondents from all over the world were concentrated in the lobbies, while the delegates' seats and visitors' gallery were crowded as they had never been before. The United Nations was facing a momentous opportunity at a very early stage of its career. On the podium, pale and solemn, were the president of the Assembly, Oswaldo Aranha, Trygve Lie and the equally well-nourished assistant secretary-general Andrew Cordier. Aranha called the meeting to order and invited the representative of Iceland to the rostrum. Thors, to my relief, was magnificent. He stated with firm conviction that despite every examination of all avenues, he and his committee were convinced that an agreement in advance was impossible. The only hope of conciliation lay in an act of judgment and decision. If the world community was firm in support of partition, then partition would come into existence and those who opposed it now would have no course but to acquiesce.

From that moment on, the debate went inexorably our way…

Finally the speechmaking came to an end, and a solemn hush descended on the hall. Aranha announced his intention to call for a vote in alphabetical order. Some of us who were present still retain a memory of the tone in which Cordier recited the votes. "Argentina?" "Abstain." "Afghanistan?" "No." "Australia?" "Yes." "Belgium?" "Yes." "Bolivia?" "Yes." "Byelorussia?" "Yes." And so it went on. When France loudly said "Oui," there was an outbreak of applause in the hall, which Aranha sternly suppressed. By the time we had gone halfway through the alphabet, we knew that we were safely home…

I went out into the lobby, where the Jewish delegation was caught up in the embrace of an enthusiastic throng. There were Jews in tears, and non-Jews moved by the nobility of the occasion. Nobody who lived that moment will ever lose its memory from his heart…

It was evening in Jerusalem. Crowds had gathered near the Jewish Agency building in Rehavia to hear the recitation of the vote. They burst into song and began dancing in the street. Alone in his office, Ben-Gurion sat at his desk with his head buried in his hands. He understood the greatness of the moment, but he could not join the spirit of the dance. He, more than anyone, knew that the charter of Jewish freedom was also the signal for a savage war. In fact, when the partition vote was announced in the General Assembly, the Arab delegates got up and walked out of the hall, openly threatening violence. "The partition line shall be nothing but a line of fire and blood," was Assam Pasha's ominous warning…

At midnight, I went out into the New York streets to buy the next morning's papers. The headlines were strident, and for us, victorious, but they already carried the news of the first assaults on Jewish homes and shops in Jerusalem. The tide of murder was in full spate.

Few of us in New York had any illusion about the gravity of our prospect. We knew that the judgment recently given by the General Assembly would be a mere scrap of paper unless it was ratified by sacrifice and toil. And yet we had the intuition that the date would never lose its meaning.

The final vote on that fateful day was tallied as follows:

In favour of partition: 33. Australia, Belgium, Bolivia, Brazil, Byelorussia, Canada, Costa Rica, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, France, Guatemala, Haiti, Iceland, Liberia, Luxemburg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Norway, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Phillipines, Poland, Soviet Union, Sweden, Ukraine, Union of South Africa, United States, Uruguay, Venezuela.

Against: 13. Afghanistan, Cuba, Egypt, Greece, India, Iran, Iraq, Lebanon, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Turkey, Yemen.

Abstained: 10. Argentina, Chile, China, Colombia, El Salvador, Ethiopia, Honduras, Mexico, United Kingdom, Yugoslavia.

Opinions

The myth of the ultimate culprit

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Like most of my readers, I begin the day with glancing at the newspaper headlines and then reading a few articles that catch my imagination.

Lately, there has been a dangerous undertone in a lot of the news, especially when it concerns the Mideast. The news is usually bad, and when something bad happens, it is usually traced to Israel. This kind of journalism is, of course, just an updated version of the old anti-Semitism that ascribes all evil in the world to the Jewish people. The new anti-Semitism is not quite as crass, but its underlying tone is not much different.

Readers will ask how they should face the new anti-Semitism of our time, and my answer is not complicated. Everyone must belong to a Jewish organization and support it. There must be an area in our lives that is devoted to the support of our people. We must choose what appeals to us and what we believe is important and will advance the health and welfare of Jews and of Israel.

Where do you belong and pay your dues? If nowhere, then you are amongst the gravediggers of our people. That sounds very harsh, but in the broad context of Jewish history, that happens to be the truth.

The one thing you must not do is nothing except to criticize others. Everyone has to contribute something to the welfare of the community. Doing nothing injures all of us.

There's an old saying that the people most responsible for our ill fortune are those who stand aside and criticize others. This kind of "participation" is a plague on our house, and I hope that none of my readers participates in this non-activity.

The old historical attacks on Jews, which have lately re-emerged and intensified, are a part of a serious battle against western values, which include the values taught by Judaism. I do not know when this battle will come to an end; I only know that it is being fought out right now in many parts of the world, and North America is an important locus.

I have no interest in scaring my readers, but neither is it my desire to keep them shielded from the realities of our situation. We are under attack, and our defence depends on our willingness to sacrifice time and substance and to stand together.

We do not live in pleasant times. The truth is harsh, and to act upon the challenges that lie before us requires from each of us some degree of sacrifice and participation. Stand aside, and you will be joining our enemies.

Shira Herzog in Toronto

When I wrote several months ago of potential new faces in the Israeli political arena, it was not clear which – if any – of the three men I profiled would actually jump into the murky waters of national politics. Former Shin-Bet head Yaacov Peri stayed in the corporate sector; former naval chief and Shin-Bet director Ami Ayalon devoted his time to drafting a joint Israeli-Palestinian statement on the two peoples' future, while Haifa Mayor (and former general) Amram Mitzna took the plunge – and swam ashore Nov. 19 as the Labor party's new leader.

Mitzna's election is unlikely to herald a change of national leadership next Jan. 28. Israelis prefer the avuncular Sharon at the helm at a time of uncertainty and terror against civilians, even though in the polls, many hold political positions more in line with Mitzna's: He believes that for the sake of its future, Israel must negotiate now, be prepared to withdraw from the territories and to evacuate settlements.

But even if Sharon remains prime minister, these clear-cut statements on the Palestinian issue will revitalize the clear opposition voice that Labor lost when it joined Sharon's government nearly two years ago. On the left of the Israeli political spectrum, Mitzna's leadership of Labor creates a dramatically different reality than that of his predecessor, former defence minister Binyamin Ben-Eliezer.

Mitzna's votes came from the middle-class elite and thousands of new, "yuppie" members who joined the party to guarantee his election. He was not the candidate of the periphery, development towns. In this regard, Mitzna perpetuates Labor's tradition of "left-wing" positions on the priority issue of security matters, while on economic and social affairs, it remains firmly on the centre-right. Israel still lacks a social-democratic voice with a coherent position on security and socioeconomic issues, and to this extent, Labor remains alienated from the country's disadvantaged pockets. "A Different Israel," a new, populist movement of community activists, has emerged as a pressure group for this very reason.

With Mitzna at Labor's helm, Yossi Sarid's Meretz will weaken in the polls. Labor's dovish wing will now remain within the party rather than bolting to Meretz. Sarid is an effective parliamentarian, but Israelis are disenchanted with his predictable, tired voice. Given the clarity of Mitzna's positions, many voters on the left will prefer his fresh, new voice to the familiar Meretz team.

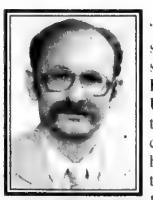
In contrast, Shinui, which burst onto the scene just a few years ago on a strong, anti-Orthodox platform, may gain in strength – almost in spite of its anti-religious stance. In a different response to Mitzna, some voters on the centre-left will actually prefer Shinui's somewhat equivocal position on the Palestinian issue – "fight terror, then talk."

Mitzna's election may have the greatest impact on Israel's Arab voters, who comprise 17 per cent of the population. Their traditional support for Labor faded in 2000. Then, Israeli Arabs stayed at home rather than voting for Barak, who had done nothing to improve their civil status in spite of their overwhelming support for him in 1999. They had no intention of coming out to vote for Ben-Eliezer, who was identified with Sharon's policies in the territories. Now, this trend may be reversed. Already in the last two weeks, there have been calls for active participation by Arab voters, lest they disenfranchise themselves.

But the most important factor in this election will be the return to the one ballot per voter parliamentary system. In 1996 and 1999, Israelis went to the polls for Knesset elections in which they cast two separate ballots: one for prime minister and one for a Knesset list. The split vote allowed smaller parties to gain in strength at the expense of Likud and Labor. This short-lived electoral reform will end with January's election, when the system will revert to Israel's traditional parliamentary, proportional representation.

This will undoubtedly cause confusion at the polls, since 30 per cent of Israelis still believe they will vote with two ballots. But more to the point, it will likely result in stronger showings for the large parties and a less fragmented Knesset. Ironically, the return to the old system may lead to a more stable – if overly homogenous – government. But two months before election day, any such speculation is hazardous at best.

Lubavitchers and liberal democracy



Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

It has long been recognized that devout religious groups or sects pose one of the greatest challenges to liberal democracies such as Canada and the United States. All liberal democracies include freedom of religion as a key element of their legal and constitutional framework.

But liberal democracies have had to wrestle with the place of religion in their societies. In the private sphere, there should be, and there generally is, scope for extensive freedom of religion. People are free to practice their faith as they wish, as long as they don't commit a crime.

While this is true of law, it's not true of the cultural climate, as reflected in public schools and popular media. For example, some of the more devout branches of Christianity, Islam and Judaism have traditions that seemingly render women subordinate to men. Such families can choose to raise girls differently from boys. While the prevailing secular cultural norm of gender equality frowns on that approach, devout families and communities can choose to reject this majority perspective. Indeed, for some, nonconformity with prevailing lifestyle defines their faith.

The problems become more acute in the public sphere. Most liberal democracies adhere to some form of separation of church and state. Of course, this adherence is uneven. Under the Canadian Constitution, Catholics and Protestants enjoy legal rights in public funding of religious schools that Jews, Muslims, and Hindus do not. But by and large, liberal democracies have evolved to a point where they all try, often via the courts, to "reasonably accommodate" religious minorities. (Remember the debate about whether Sikhs could wear turbans when serving in the RCMP.)

In general, however, devout or "fundamentalist" religious groups are seen as inimical to both the letter and spirit of true liberal democracy. Jan Feldman, a political scientist at the University of Vermont, challenges that position in a provocative forthcoming book. Using Lubavitchers as her case study, Feldman, herself identified with that community, argues that Lubavitchers make excellent citizens.

Her argument revolves around separating the principles of liberalism from those of democracy. Liberalism, according to Feldman, is based on an Enlightenment world view. It is rooted in a kind of "critical rationality" in which reason and scientific or empirical evidence should always trump religion as the basis of our beliefs. In addition, liberalism is rooted in the supremacy of the autonomous individual and his or her self-interest over the community.

Democracy, in contrast, is a process of choosing, and interacting with, political leaders. Free elections, voting rights, the rule of law, an independent judiciary and a free press are cornerstones of modern democracies. Citizens, from this perspective, are encouraged to vote, run for office, lobby governments, etc. Her book suggests that democracy can exist without liberalism.

Feldman argues that, in fact, Lubavitchers, and indeed other members of Chassidic groups, are in many ways model democratic citizens. They have very high rates of voter participation and members often seek elective office. They are not shy about mobilizing support for various candidates and lobbying governments on behalf of their interests and values.

Ironically, argues Feldman, many liberal critics of so-called fundamentalist religious groups attack them from both ends of the citizenship spectrum. At times, they are said to be too uninvolved in political life, but at other times they are said to be too involved. Indeed, their involvement is often greeted with suspicion, as somehow less worthy than that of other groups, since they often support non-liberal objectives.

Sept. 11 has increased the importance of the issues Feldman raises. North American Muslims, many of whom are devout, face problems comparable to the Chassidim in navigating a course between the dangers of liberalism, as they see it, and the benefits of democratic participation.

One question Feldman does not address is how this dilemma might change if non-liberal groups, either alone or in coalition, achieved a demographic, and thus a political, majority in democratic elections.

In such a case, the liberal secular group would become the vulnerable minority in need of protection. True believers might feel compelled to use the democratic political process – from amending the constitution to controlling Supreme Court appointees – to limit the reach of secularism. If this seems far-fetched in North America, it may be a real dilemma facing Israel in the decades to come.

The Kirshner File

The case for invading Iraq - soon

The first wave of United Nations arms inspectors arrived in Baghdad on Nov. 24 with a strong Security Council mandate to seek out and destroy Iraq's weapons of mass destruction.

Iraq has promised to co-operate, but due to its poor record of compliance with earlier UN inspection teams, Iraq's pledge cannot be taken at face value. The first moment of truth will come on Dec. 8, when Saddam Hussein is obliged to hand over a full and unambiguous accounting of his chemical, biological, nuclear and missile arsenal. If he waffles or lies, or if he obstructs UN monitors, chances are that the United States will attack Iraq, with regime change as its main objective.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Even in the unlikely event that Saddam co-operates, who can be certain that the inspectors will find Iraq's caches of weapons? Since the departure of previous UN teams in 1998, Saddam has had plenty of time to artfully conceal his poisonous chalice. Say this for him: he is a master of deceit and prevarication. And his burning desire to cling to his terrifying and frightfully expensive toys, at whatever political or economic cost, means that he will be an unending source of aggression and instability in the Middle East. He invaded Iran in 1980 and Kuwait in 1990, and he has threatened to destroy Israel.

Do we wait complacently until Iraq rearms and morphs into a clone of North Korea? Or do we nip the looming danger in the bud?

Kenneth Pollack, a former analyst at the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency and now director of research of the Brookings Institute's Saban Center for Middle East Policy, argues that the only course left open to the United States is military action to depose Saddam.

As he puts it in The Threatening Storm (Random House): "... the option that makes the most sense is for the United States to launch an invasion of Iraq to topple Saddam, eradicate his weapons of mass destruction, and rebuild Iraq as a prosperous and stable society..."

In this brilliantly researched and persuasive book, Pollack concedes that such a war will neither be "cheap" nor "easy" and would probably embroil the United States in nation-building for years to come. But he warns that the United States – and its regional allies – are likely to face "a much worse conflict" with Iraq down the road if Saddam's brutal, Stalinist regime is left in place.

"An invasion of Iraq in the near term, when Saddam has only a limited stockpile of weapons of mass destruction and his conventional forces remain weak, is likely to seem effortless and cost-free compared to a war with Saddam after he has crossed the nuclear threshold," Pollack writes. "Given Saddam's propensity to miscalculate, his penchant for aggression, and his willingness to absorb horrific punishment, it would be a terrible mistake for the United States to allow him to acquire such capabilities and risk war with a nuclear-armed Iraq."

In an analogy that some might find far-fetched, but which is really apt, Pollack compares the present moment to 1938, when Adolf Hitler was riding high and Germany was on the cusp of swallowing up Austria and Czechoslovakia. If Britain and France – which were stronger than Germany – had acted with resolve, they could have stopped Hitler in his tracks. Instead, much to their subsequent regret, British and French leaders appeased Hitler, with all its terrible consequences.

"Just as France and Britain should have taken up arms in 1938, I believe that the United States should take up arms against Iraq to end the threat from Saddam's regime once and for all," Pollack observes.

The single most important reason why the Bush administration has no alternative but to topple Saddam and his Ba'athist clique is that Washington's post-1991 Gulf War policy of containing Iraq through economic sanctions and military pressure is eroding and will ultimately fail.

Thanks to the connivance of neighbouring and distant states, the supposedly water-proof sanctions have become extremely porous, as Pollack explains at some length. Besides, there is no meaningful support for a truly tough containment policy, and Pollack also doubts whether the flip side of containment, deterrence, will actually work.

The no-fly zones, established by the United States, Britain and France in 1991 and 1992 to keep the Iraqi air force in check, may not last long due to Arab discomfort with the idea of U.S. bases in the Persian Gulf. Lest we forget, Osama bin Laden's crusade was, in part, inspired by his antipathy toward the American military presence in Saudi Arabia. In any case, the no-fly zones do not prevent Saddam from acquiring weapons of mass destruction.

The notion of solving the problem through Saddam's assassination, raised fleetingly by Ari Fleischer, U.S. President George W. Bush's press secretary, is basically a non-starter. Saddam is surrounded by rings of loyal bodyguards and security services, and he employs doubles. As for coups, they have been tried before with a singular lack of success.

What about regularly bombing Iraq's weapons sites? During the Gulf War, the United States and its allies bombarded Iraq mercilessly, but the air campaign eliminated merely a fraction of Saddam's weapons program. As UN inspectors discovered, only three of Iraq's seven major nuclear plants were destroyed during the war, and Saddam's chemical and biological programs were bigger than they had imagined.

In light of these bitter experiences, and the allies' four-day bombardment of Iraq in December 1998, why would anyone presume that air power alone is a silver bullet?

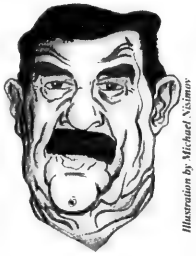


Illustration by Michael Nisimov

Saddam Hussein

That leaves full-scale regime change – a solution originally formulated by the Clinton administration – as the only viable option.

As Pollack suggests, Saddam is both weaker and stronger today. He is weaker because he was partially defanged by the Gulf War; because he lost northern Kurdish areas; because he was deprived of full sovereignty by the UN's oil-for-food system and the no-fly enclaves. Yet, he is stronger because the sanctions have given him strangleholds over aspects of Iraqi society he never previously possessed, and because his defiance of the West, as well as his financial support of the Palestinian uprising, have turned him into a hero in some Arab quarters.

In Pollack's estimation, Saddam is working assiduously to rebuild, even enhance, his armed forces. Since Saddam's conventional forces are not as powerful as they were prior to 1991, Pollack theorizes, his weapons of mass destruction programs loom larger today than in the past.

Despite the efforts of UN inspection teams, which obliterated far more of its illegal weapons than Iraq had bargained for, Iraq was able to hang on to vital equipment and stocks of potent chemical and biological weapons. Saddam's nuclear program was degraded both by Israel's 1981 raid on Iraq's reactor and by the Gulf War and its aftermath. Saddam learned a lesson from these setbacks, Pollack says. With billions of dollars in oil revenue at his disposal, he built duplicate nuclear facilities, all guarded and buried. Add to this the fact that Saddam can still call upon the knowledge and expertise of his Western-trained scientists.

Since Saddam has no intention of relinquishing his arsenal, given his ambition to dominate the region and to be a new Nebuchadnezzar (the conqueror of biblical Israel who took Jews into captivity in the Babylonian exile), the United States has no choice but to invade Iraq and unseat Saddam.

The United States can do the job itself, but Pollack, rightly, believes that an international coalition would legitimize an invasion.

Tallying up the possible costs, Pollack concludes that a campaign lasting several weeks would result in a few hundred U.S. combat deaths. A two-month war could cost the United States 500 to 1,000 soldiers. In a war of three to six months, the United States may sustain as many as 10,000 fatalities. "That said, although we must prepare the worst case, the best case is a more likely outcome."

Pollack says the United States cannot afford to fail. It must use all of its capabilities to ensure a swift and relatively painless victory. "The sooner we move against Iraq, the weaker Saddam will be in terms of both his conventional and non-conventional capabilities and therefore the lower the potential costs of an invasion."

There are vocal voices who oppose a war. At a recent "Stop this War" rally at Queen's Park, a procession of speakers denounced U.S. plans to remove Saddam. A Jewish academic equated a war with "mass murder." An official from the Canadian Labour Congress claimed it would be a war "for resources." The president of the Canadian Arab Federation urged the UN to send arms inspectors to Israel.

All of them willfully ignored the most salient and relevant issue: the urgent need to overthrow a dangerous, megalomaniac dictator who will, if left unchecked, sow misery and death in Iraq and the rest of the Middle East.

Think about it.

What Does Streaming Mean?

Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto

Streaming is grouping students according to skill level. For some children, mastering another language comes with ease, while others advance at a slower pace. We stream classes in Judaic Studies from Grade Two, so children can learn Hebrew at their own level, from basic to advanced. Placement is evaluated constantly, and children change streams as needed. In General Studies, class placements are based on the educational and social fit of each child, with no streaming. The combination of mixed grouping and streaming contributes to our success in meeting the diverse needs of our students.

Chanukah reminds us of our greatness

By RABBI AARON FLANZRAICH

What is Chanukah? our sages asked. What is its miracle? Is it the incredible military victory of the Maccabeans? Is it that the Holy Temple was re-consecrated by the Jews (hence the name "Chanukah," which means "to consecrate"), or the amazing miracle of the oil that burned for seven more days than it should have?

As it says in the Talmud, the conclusion of the rabbis was this: "As the Greeks had entered into the Sanctuary, and defiled it, the Maccabees proved victorious over them. As a result, one pitcher of all was found to bear the seal of the High Priest, and this oil, although it should have only burned for one day, by a miracle lasted eight days. The next year, that time was established as a day of festival and rejoicing."

Is Chanukah a "Jewish Christmas"? Is it a chance to light up the menorah and have family over? Is it yet another hollow, secularized celebration of Jewish tradition that has little to do with God? But before we answer this question, let's deal with the nitty gritty.

On Chanukah, we pour olive oil in the menorah and, with the help of a wick, it burns until the oil is exhausted (or we use candles to make our light). We place our menorahs in view of the public. It is a mitzvah to publicize this miracle, to make it known to all the amazing history of this event.

We are told to do this and nothing else for the entire eight days of Chanukah, one of the most ritually simple holidays in our calendar. There is no mention of giving presents or having lavish parties. Over the thousands of years since the miracle of Chanukah, other customs have been adopted, such as gelt giving, playing dreidl and eating latkes.

But if this narrow requirement for observance – all we need to do is light a candle after sunset that lasts for a minimum of a half hour – seems small compared to the rituals associated with Passover or Sukkot, why is it that Chanukah has become so big in our lives? Some say that Chanukah is an opportunity to share a common festival with our non-Jewish neighbours, or that Chanukah competes with the commercialism of Christmas.

But I see in Chanukah, with all of its smallness, a greatness that supersedes simply what we see.

Pure olive oil has a likeness to the Jewish people. It is drawn and created through a process of pressing the seed or olive that obtains all the oil. So too it is with our people: our finest qualities come out under pressure. The light cast by olive oil is superior to all others for it carries the brilliance of care, love and sacrifice. This idea of sacrifice is the foundation of Chanukah.

It's easy to forget what was given up for us as the latkes are passed around the table and the dreidels are spinning. It is easy to forget the religious oppression the Jews suffered from the Hellenists while we live in freedom. It is also easy to forget the overwhelming odds the Jews faced when they went to war against the mighty Greek military machine.

But as we pour the oil, we are reminded of this sacrifice for the survival of tradition. Indeed, as we learn from the Talmud, only the burning of the oil for those seven extra days was called a miracle; the military victory wasn't. It was only through the efforts of the Maccabees that the divine miracle occurred.

Yet even if we forget from time to time why we light these lights, this year let us remember. With the terrible situation Israel is facing, we need to believe that we will survive because Chanukah teaches us about our power. Through this wonderful holiday, we learn not to say, "It's all in God's hands." When it comes to the future of the Jewish people, it is in our hands.

Rabbi Flanzraich is the senior rabbi of Beth Sholom Synagogue in Toronto.

An ancient dialogue

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

As we light the Chanukah candles, Jewish law states that we begin by lighting one candle and add another each night until we light eight in total. There is an argument in the Talmud involving the House of Hillel and the House of Shammai disputing the order in which we light the candles.

The House of Hillel believes we should light one candle on the first night and add subsequent candles each night. The House of Shammai believes we should do the opposite: light eight candles the first night and reduce the number by one each subsequent night, ultimately ending Chanukah by lighting one candle. As is traditional, the Jewish world follows the ruling of the House of Hillel.

However, the Talmud continues by questioning the reasoning behind these two opinions. The opinion offered by one of the sages to explain the ruling of the House of Shammai involves a connection between Chanukah and a major Jewish holiday: Sukkot.

This view models the lighting of Chanukah candles on the sacrificial offerings of Sukkot, in which we began by offering many sacrifices and reduced the number each day.

This connection between Chanukah and Sukkot is not an artificial one. In fact, our record of events shows that upon rededicating the Temple, the community celebrated Sukkot, although it was months late. Affirming our victory included not allowing the enemy to rob us of an important holiday.

To maintain this connection between Chanukah and Sukkot, the House of Shammai paralleled the ritual observance of the candles and the Sukkot sacrifices.

The House of Hillel, on the other hand, is believed to be making a philosophical statement. In matters of holiness, the position holds, one should never reduce observance. Rather, the goal is to always expand it. Therefore, one would increase the number of candles each night rather than reduce the number.

Both these opinions speak to a broader worldview. The House of Shammai maintains that Chanukah should be modelled on Sukkot – that our past inform our present. The House of Hillel maintains that one should always proceed by advancing in matters of holiness – our focus should be toward the future. In effect, it is not a ritual practice that is being debated, but a worldview, a Jewish approach to life.

Both arguments have merit.

As with any debate between Hillel and Shammai, the Talmud has informed us that "these [opinions] and these [opinions] are the words of the living God." In other words, both Hillel and Shammai reflect the truth.

But how can we maintain both worldviews in our Chanukah ritual?

The holiday of Chanukah lasts for eight days. One of the reasons given for this is that Sukkot is an eight-day holiday and therefore sets the time frame for Chanukah. Our past has framed our present. Yet, we also light the candles by starting with one and adding a candle each night, so our focus is also on the future.

Both worldviews have merged into one ritual. As we light the candles for eight days, we are stating that our history speaks to us today. As we add a candle each night, we affirm that both our past and our present will inform our future.

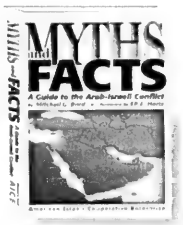
Building and demolishing in the West Bank, Gaza Strip

MYTH:

The demolition of Palestinian homes is an example of the barbaric policies of Israeli oppression.

FACT:

Israel does not decide willy-nilly to demolish the homes of Palestinians. The army usually decides to take this drastic measure only after extreme provocation, and to ensure the security of soldiers and civilians. Palestinian homes in the Gaza Strip, in particular, have been used as bomb factories, to provide cover for snipers and to conceal tunnels used to smuggle weapons from Egypt.



Homes are also sometimes demolished when they are built illegally, without government approval or the proper permits. This practice is not only applied to Palestinians; Jewish homes have also been torn down when they were built illegally. Efforts by Jews, for example, to create new outposts or to illegally expand existing communities often result in the new structures being demolished.

MYTH:

The peace agreements Israel signed with the Palestinians prohibit settlement activity.

FACT:

Neither the Declaration of Principles of Sept. 13, 1993, nor the Interim Agreement contains any provisions prohibiting or restricting the establishment or expansion of Jewish communities in the West Bank or Gaza Strip. While a clause in the accords prohibits changing the status of the territories, it was intended to ensure only that neither side would take unilateral measures to alter the legal status of the areas (such as annexation or declaration of statehood).

Tzedakah – part 1

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Though Rosh Hashanah is well behind us, the other new year draws near and with it, the last-minute impulse to donate to charity. Over the next couple of weeks, I'd like to look at some of the sites on the Jewish Highway where you can pick up a good background in charity and perhaps, even leave some tzedakah behind.

Actually, charity really isn't a very good translation of the word "tzedakah." According to Albert Vorspan, tzedakah "literally means 'righteousness.' Tzedakah is not an act of condescension from one person to another who is in a lower social and economic status. Tzedakah is the fulfillment of an obligation to a fellow-being with equal status" [http://www.geocities.com/EnchantedForest/7077/tzedakah.html].

In a very interesting overview of The Economics of Tzedakah [http://swfs.org/58_GBG_erh.htm], Rabbi Gary M. Bretton-Garanatoor of New York's Stephen Wise Free Synagogue looks at the example set by Abraham. "We know little of Abraham's early life, and one might wonder why Abraham was singled out to become God's partner in the Covenant. We learn from the text that, "Vayach'shveha lo tzedakah – God considered Abraham on account of his righteousness" (Genesis 15:6) [http://bible.ort.org/books/torahd5.asp?ACTION=displayid&id=368]. Throughout the Torah, tzedakah, acts of righteousness, are tied to the Hebrew term mishpat – legal justice, so that we learn that doing what is right and just is a legal obligation."

One of the most thought-provoking articles that I came across didn't address the giving of tzedakah but the taking of it. In When Good Money Comes From Bad People, three professionals look at Jewish sources to help grapple with the ethics of accepting donations from morally questionable sources. What would you do? [http://www.jtsa.edu/news/ jtsmag/6.3/forum.shtml].

Roger David Carasso asks a couple of other difficult questions in Directed Tzedakah: A Torah Look into Where Tzedakah Should be Given. As he explains, "In the Sh'ma, we are directed to love HaShem with all our might and all our possessions. Giving the right amount of charity means nothing or is even harmful if we do not direct it well. When the poor are not properly supported, they risk death; when Jewish education is not properly supported, it also risks death. It also shows a lack of respect to property when money is given away so whimsically."

Carasso then examines what the Torah says about tzedakah, how much and to whom [http://shlk.com/2 44].

The Just-Tzedakah Web site also has a detailed look at giving from a Jewish point of view. While the theoretical halachic minimum for giving is about $2, this only applies to someone who is living in poverty him or herself. The site suggests that most people contribute 10-20 per cent of that year's net income. Other tzedakah recommendations from the site: calculate your obligation with care, don't brag, avoid delay, give cheerfully and with compassion [http://just-tzedakah.org/guidelines/introduction .html].

Take a look at Arthur Kurzweil's Brother, Can You Spare a Dime: The Treatment of Beggars According to Jewish Tradition [http://www.ajritz.com/jew/brother.htm]. Kurzweil says that although "the organized Jewish community has gotten the mitzvah of giving tzedakah down to a virtual science," he has always been confused and inconsistent in his treatment of beggars. He poses 15 questions, including, "What if they are all fakes or frauds?", "Shouldn't these beggars be supported by official agencies?" and "Should I buy them a cup of coffee because they'll probably spend it on booze anyway?"

Kurzweil, who is not a rabbi but a well-known Jewish genealogist, clearly spent a great deal of effort sifting through traditional sources that clearly demand compassion for the needy.

Finally, kudos to the Solomon Schechter Day School of Greater Boston. Its students have created an informative and colourful series of web pages about the halachot of tzedakah. What I really love about these pages is that the students have not only included quotes from our sages but have also shared their own thoughts on giving and loving-kindness. Kol hakavod! [http://www.ssdsboston.org/tzedakah/zdk00.htm]

Conservative rabbis discuss role of women in shul ritual

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbis Wayne Allen, Baruch Frydman-Kohl and Steven Saltzman – who attended the Jewish Theological Seminary together 25 years ago – now lead mainstream Toronto congregations affiliated with the Conservative movement and operate within the framework of what they consider to be traditional Judaism.

"We're – relatively speaking – close," said Rabbi Frydman-Kohl. But there are aspects of Jewish practice on which they don't agree, including women's role in synagogue ritual, a topic that recently drew a crowd of about 130 people to hear him and Rabbi Saltzman discuss their views.

In the recent "conversational debate," held at Beth Tikvah Synagogue, Rabbi Frydman-Kohl of Beth Tzedec Congregation and Rabbi Saltzman of Adath Israel Congregation discussed their respective views about the Changing Role of Women in Synagogue Ritual.

The event, moderated by Beth Tikvah's Rabbi Allen, was the first in a series of three such "conversations" as part of the synagogue's adult education program.

Rabbi Frydman-Kohl and Rabbi Saltzman agreed on the importance of boundary-setting by congregational rabbis, but diverged on their definition of what those boundaries ought to be.

"I object to aliyot for women and women being counted in the minyan because that goes the full gamut toward obliterating whatever roles are different for men and women," said Rabbi Saltzman.

Traditional Conservative Judaism has "gone an incredible way" toward affirming women's equality, he said, citing bat mitzvah ceremonies, baby naming and singing in the choir.

But men and women are different, he stressed, adding that it is not a question of inferiority or superiority. "And I believe the synagogue has to reflect those differences."

At Beth Tzedec, however, women may receive aliyot and other Torah honours. They are not counted in a minyan.

"We are trying to maintain what I think are some traditional borders," said Rabbi Frydman-Kohl. At the same time, he added, sometimes borders are not clear-cut.

"Differences are part of how we define ourselves," Rabbi Frydman-Kohl said, agreeing with Rabbi Saltzman. But he added that for him, "trying to articulate the idea that even as there is distinctiveness, we should look at how we can use those openings because the larger social context is such that people want to find ways to be included.

"If that can be done in a way that's sensitive to the Halachic mandate, even if it goes across some of those borders, then we have to take a good look at them."

Sometimes, he said, "you react to [an outside trend] not because you buy into it," but as a result of looking at how that cultural trend will affect Jewish life and whether something can be done to take it into account.

In the American congregation that Rabbi Frydman-Kohl served before becoming senior rabbi of Beth Tzedec eight years ago, he said he was considered "slightly centre-right" with regard to issues of women and synagogue ritual.

Here in Toronto, he said he finds himself "all the way on the left." Of the seven GTA synagogues affiliated with the Conservative movement's United Synagogue, only one, Beit Rayim, is fully egalitarian. Of the others, Beth Tzedec is the most liberal regarding the role of women.

Rabbi Saltzman said he believes traditional Conservative Judaism recognizes "that the future of the Jewish people lies in the complex balancing act between what we're prepared to accept from the modern culture and what we need to reject to ensure we survive as a Jewish people."

Likewise, Rabbi Frydman-Kohl said that, for him, "anything new has to pass some sort of test."

Changes shouldn't be made, he cautioned, in order to attract more people to services or to increase personal commitment. "I can make the case for introducing some sort of ritual change... not based on trying to sort of save the Jews, but because this is part of the culture or part of a moral vision of what you want a community to be."

In Toronto, said Rabbi Saltzman, there is a "very vibrant liberal Orthodox community, which in effect sets a standard for traditional Judaism.

"We ought to take from Orthodox Judaism that which we can live with as Conservative Jews," he said.

Rabbi Saltzman said he aims to focus on "trying to define for my congregation what it is I believe in, in a careful and considered way... and to bring our congregation to... define ourselves. It doesn't fit for everybody. It has boundaries.

"Thank God," he said, "in our community there are [other] options" for people who are not comfortable with those boundaries.

Not initiating change is also difficult, said Rabbi Saltzman. "It's much easier to give in than to stand up for what you believe in," he said. "I'm standing up for your children, for your legacy."

Torontonians shouldn't be defensive about their traditional Conservative Judaism when they are in more left-wing Conservative communities, said Rabbi Frydman-Kohl. "We do have something quite precious in Toronto."

Barry S. Corbin
Fraser Milner Casgrain LLP

Q Dear PAC:

When my husband died recently, he left me a significant sum of money in the form of a registered retirement income fund. While I will need the RRIF money for financial support during my lifetime, there will likely be a considerable amount remaining on my death which I would like to leave to a charity. What is the best way to do this?

Sincerely,

H.S., Thornhill, Ontario

A Dear H.S.:

There are two ways to make a gift of your RRIF to the charity on your death.

Firstly, you can designate your estate as beneficiary and include in your Will a bequest of that RRIF to the charity. Secondly, you can sign a RRIF beneficiary designation form which names the charity. Either method will result in a generous tax credit which your executors can use to apply against your income in the year of your death. Furthermore, any unused portion of the tax credit can be used to shelter your income for the year preceding the year of your death.

While either method gives the same income tax result, making the charity a direct beneficiary of your RRIF offers several advantages over making a bequest of the RRIF through your Will. Firstly, there will be no provincial probate taxes payable on the value of the RRIF. Secondly, depending on the financial institution and the province where you live at the time of your death, your RRIF may enjoy a degree of protection from your creditors. Finally, the charity's receipt of the RRIF money will not be held up by any problems arising from the administration of your estate.

Making a direct beneficiary designation is easily done by completing a form provided by the financial institution which administers your RRIF. However, as with all tax and estate planning issues, you would be wise to consult a lawyer knowledgeable about these matters to avoid any problems.

legacy of life — Irwin Gold 1919 – 2001

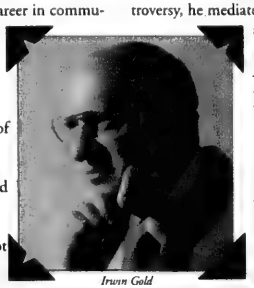
Who would have thought that a part-time job teaching children to swim could set someone up for a lifetime commitment to the Jewish community?

That's precisely what happened to young Irwin "Sonny" Gold, the Harbord Collegiate basketball star, Bloor JCC swimming instructor and decorated U.S. soldier who grew up to become one of the great leaders of North American Jewry.

Driven by a passion for the Jewish people, a flair for problem solving, and an ability to put people at ease, Irwin was the kind of leader who made things happen because he truly believed that in what he was doing. His postings took him to Cleveland, San Francisco, Denver, New York and finally back to his hometown of Toronto, where as director of Toronto Jewish Congress he spearheaded its merger with the United Jewish Welfare Fund. He also masterminded the community's effort to unite all its Jewish agencies under one roof at the Lipa Green Building on Bathurst Street and saw it built during his tenure.

Ronnie Appleby, Chairman of UJA Federation's Campaign 2003, says there was a gentleness about Irwin "that made him a pleasure to deal with." With his devotion to fundraising, to community building, to volunteer training and development, and to Jewish values and their transmission to the next generation, adds Ronnie, Irwin was truly an inspirational leader.

Irwin hadn't planned a career in communal life. Rather, he studied psychology at the University of Toronto and worked part-time at the Bloor JCC pool. After graduating as a social worker from the University of Pittsburgh, he volunteered for the U.S. Army and saw heavy action overseas. A hand wound forced Irwin to take up archery as therapy, and after the war he earned a spot on the army's G.I. Olympic Team. He also mastered his poker skills in the army and played bridge with a vengeance his entire life.



Irwin Gold

Irwin's father Harry, a member of Workmen's Circle, taught his two sons the importance of Jewish continuity and both Irwin and his older brother Bertram became Jewish community leaders in their own right. Irwin got his start in 1947 at Cleveland's Jewish community centre, where he met his wife Beverly. They were married for 53 years.

"Irwin was calm, kind, and extremely dependable," she says. "He made decisions easily and knew how to keep things from getting out of hand. Even when there was controversy, he mediated well and was exceptionally fair in his judgment. He admired the Toronto Jewish community leadership tremendously and was devoted to his staff."

Irwin was a mentor to many. Lisa Morrison, Campaign Director at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, remembers "Mr. Gold" as extremely encouraging and credits him with setting her up for "a rewarding career and an opportunity to live a rich Jewish life in this great community."

"Irwin's training and reputation in the field of social work, his experience in the United States, and the network of professionals with whom he stayed in touch enabled him to bring a wide range of perspectives to the job and provide that expertise and leadership to his laypeople," says Mark Gryfe, president of Baycrest Centre Foundation. "He was the consummate professional and had a unique ability to convey vision. The Toronto community benefited tremendously from his wisdom."

When Irwin retired in 1994, he agreed to serve as director of UJA Federation's Jewish Foundation and consultant to United Israel Appeal. He also set up the Irwin and Beverly Gold Scholarship Fund to encourage young people to become Jewish community centre professionals.

Irwin's son Larry says his father taught him to "bend with the wind but don't break" while daughter Lisa Gold says she hears the voice of her Dad's wisdom inside her all the time.

Adds daughter Donna Rothstein, a social worker and community volunteer in Westfield, N.J.: "My dad taught me to accept people from all walks of life and to contribute what I can. I'm a bit of an idealist like he was."

Jerusalem revealed as biggest city in ancient Judah

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Jerusalem was a great metropolis – the biggest city in the ancient kingdom of Judah – before its conquest by the Babylonians in 586 CE, the Biblical Archeology Society was told at its recent annual convention.

In the conference's keynote, closing address called The Size and Borders of Jerusalem during the First Temple Period, Israeli archeologist David Ussishkin described the Jerusalem of that epoch as a cultural and religious centre with thousands of inhabitants.

Heavily fortified to ward off invaders, and with its monumental buildings, Jerusalem was an impressive sight, suggested Ussishkin, who holds the Austria Chair in Archeology at Tel Aviv University.

Ussishkin, whose specialty is the Land of Israel in the biblical period, was once a visiting professor at the University of Toronto.

A member of the Israel Exploration Society's executive committee and the editor of the journal Tel Aviv, he has co-directed excavations in Jezreel and Megiddo since 1990.

In a lecture supplemented by slides, he said the City of David, where settlement of Jerusalem took root, emerged after the discovery of water in a spring adjacent to the Kidron Valley.

Five years ago, the area near the spring was excavated, he said.

Hidden in a cave today, the spring was Jerusalem's primary source of water during antiquity.

It was attached to an elaborate water-carrying system, a tunnel discovered by British archeologist Charles Warren in the 19th century.

Inside, Warren stumbled upon a tablet, now in Istanbul, with an inscription celebrating a conversation of workers who built the tunnel.

Ussishkin said that if more inscriptions are found, archeologists may gain a better understanding of Jerusalem during that era.

In the meantime, archeologists are studying the ruins of a massive tower and examining Babylonian arrowheads unearthed near its base.

In Silwan, a Palestinian village abutting Jerusalem, archeologists are poring over pottery salvaged from ancient tombs in which high officials and aristocrats were buried, he said.

While he said archeologists know very little about today's hotly-contested Temple Mount, revered by Jews and Muslims, he speculated it's possible that King Solomon constructed a royal palace on its grounds, and that a smaller version of the first temple was built there.

Replying to a question from the audience, Ussishkin said the Palestinian Authority has begun excavating the land around the Temple Mount without proper archeological supervision.

"I hope they didn't do any damage, but I think they did."

Group for widows, widowers celebrates 10 years

By HEATHER CHEIFETZ SHERMAN
Special to the CJN

Ten years after its creation, the mandate of Widows or Widowers (WoW), a 72-strong group of Jewish men and women between the ages of 50 and 65, has not changed.

"We are not a bereavement group," insists Beverly Bobkin-English, one of the group's founders. "We are all about having a good time, having fun – together."

Members are invited to twice-yearly executive meetings and pay $30 annually to receive mailings and telephone calls about upcoming events.

Activities range from monthly brunches or dinners, bowling nights and trips to the racetrack, to theatre and casino outings, ceramic and cooking classes, party cruises and square dancing socials.

"Our annual Chanukah party [this coming Dec. 7] is very popular too," says Bobkin-English excitedly. "We really go all out."

Friendship – not courting – is the top priority for WoW members, many of whom say that setting these conditions takes a lot of pressure out of meeting new people, already a difficult thing for widows and widowers.

"It's really a comfort to know that the other members understand what you've been through and can relate," say Phyllis Fraser, a member since 1997. "It makes a big difference."

It's recommended that potential new members wait at least a year after the death of their spouses before joining, in order to give themselves enough time to come to terms with their loss and feel ready to socialize again.

"In the first year or so, your family and friends give you a lot of support," remembers Pearl Brodie, a nine-year member and past-president of WoW. "After that, they see you behaving normally and feel relieved. But, still you find yourself sitting home on a Saturday night, wishing you had someone to talk to."

Bobkin-English had been widowed eight years in 1993 when she summoned up the courage to place an ad in the Toronto Star with the goal of organizing a social group for Jewish widows and widowers.

Eleven people answered the initial ad and word-of-mouth spread from there.

"I had read so many of those self-help books after my husband died, but I found them depressing," Bobkin-English recalls.

"That gave me the idea of starting up a group, but I never had the time – or the inclination – to pursue it," she says. "Then one day, I decided I was just going to try it."

From then on, the group grew, at one time reaching an all-time high of more than 100 members.

Although her intention was never to meet men through the group, Bobkin-English admits she was intrigued when Norm English joined WoW in September 1993, two years after his wife passed away.

A short time later, they started dating, and eventually they married. "We hit it off right away," English remembers.

One or two other couples have met and married through WoW, but opted not to stay members. Beverley and Norm remain active in the group and work hard to maintain the relationships they have made.

"It never occurred to me to leave," Bobkin-English says, shaking her head. "These are my friends."

"And Norm is just one of the girls!" pipes in Louie Salmons, another past-president, at a morning brunch organized by Bobkin-English.

The ratio of women to men in the group is roughly 9:1.

"Men used to stay longer and there used to be a lot more of us," English recalls. "But, maybe, for the ones who left, the group served its purpose."

There are currently eight men in WoW, and a few more who have recently called to inquire about upcoming social events.

The group has been asked in the past to include divorced or single people, but the members won't have it.

"Their priorities are different," says Annette Hess, WoW's treasurer, adding that it just wouldn't work.

"A lot of divorced people are bitter, some come with baggage and are out to meet someone immediately, not to make friends," says Brodie. "Most of us have good memories of our husbands and our marriage and want to keep it that way."

Going alone to social events such as weddings and bar mitzvahs seems to be one of the most difficult things for widows and widowers.

"It's tough to go by yourself and watch everyone dancing," says Brodie. "I get emotional."

Helen Linetsky, who joined WoW in 1996 and is currently its president, feels "lucky" that she and her husband, who died eight years ago, had separate social lives.

"So, it never felt strange to join a new social group, or to go out on my own."

But for others, WoW has helped them adjust to life on their own.

To find out more about WoW activities and membership, call Helen Linetsky at 416-633-9414 or Penny Hart at 416-739-9157.

Computer program unites Jewish youth

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Oded Golan's vision is to connect Jewish youth from around the world.

President and director of Eternity, an Israeli-based software company, Golan has developed My PersoNet, a computer program intended to be the foundation for creating a national archive for all Jewish people.

Speaking at a recent executive meeting of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, Golan said that with fewer North American students studying in Israel, it is more important now than ever to unite them by computer with Israeli students.

Although his company's goal – to present all information related to Jewish families – "sounds a bit ambitious, it can be achieved quickly," he said.

Golan, born and raised in Israel, was trained as an engineer. Known for having the largest collection of biblical antiquities in the world, he is the owner of the ossuary, the limestone box some believe contains the remains of Jesus' brother James that was damaged during its recent voyage to the Royal Ontario Museum.

Golan said My PersoNet provides users with a personal site on their own computer as well as on the Internet.

Since it has been installed in several pilot schools throughout Israel, he said, students have uploaded over 25,000 pictures and assignments.

"The program allows users with little knowledge of computers to store visual materials. When connected to the Internet, they can search for material on other members' sites.

"For example, if a student is preparing a research paper on a specific historical event, one click can lead him to other members' papers on the same topic."

The program also allows for students to chat with each other, he said.

At a time when Israel's educational system is suffering from budget cuts, he said, this system could help students, and he would like to see "Jewish communities in the Diaspora help boost the system."

In other business, Ed Morgan, CJC Ontario region chair, said that since its last meeting in June, one of the organization's main concerns has been the anti-Semitic activity on university campuses.

"It has been particularly acute in Montreal, but it has spilled over here."

CJC Ontario challenged the University of Toronto's Ontario Institute for Studies in Education (OISE/UT) after representatives of the centre of anti-racism studies circulated anti-Israel material, he said.

OISE/UT "disassociated itself from the private activities of the faculty," he said.

At York University, Morgan said, a visiting professor, Aijaz Ahmad, accused Israel in a recent speech of dictating policy to its "patron," the United States, on a consistent basis. He went further to suggest that both Israel and the United States are to blame almost entirely for the world's problems.

In at least two magazine articles, he also blamed Israel "for engaging in Nazi-like tactics."

"[When approached about it] York has been less forthcoming than University of Toronto, but we are working on it," Morgan said.

Bernie Farber, executive director of Ontario region, said they are extremely concerned about Ahmad's presence on campus. "What is a man like that doing at an important university such as York?"

With regards to Benjamin Netanyahu's recent speech here, Farber said he owed congratulations to the Metro Toronto Police Force for ensuring that there was no violence.

Cotler: Hezbollah decision is 'unconscionable'

The Canada-Israel Committee took the government to task not only for failing to include Hezbollah on the list, but also for omitting the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine and the Al-Aqsa Martyr's Brigades and Tanzim arms of Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat's Fatah movement.

"All of these groups are directly responsible for the murders of scores of innocent Israelis and have publicly proclaimed their determination to continue to use terror [to destroy] the Jewish state," the CIC said.

While welcoming the inclusion on the list of Hamas and Islamic Jihad, Congress said it finds the government's reasoning on Hezbollah "more and more perplexing."

In a statement, Stockwell Day, the Canadian Alliance's foreign affairs critic, said the "decision to allow this terrorist organization to carry out its CSIS-documented activities in Canada is outrageous."

Mount Royal Liberal MP Irwin Cotler called his government's failure to name Hezbollah "inexplicable and, given [its] murderous ideology, unconscionable."

Cotler said the first group on the list should be Hezbollah.

Hezbollah and its affiliates have been linked to a lengthy series of terrorist attacks against the United States, Israel, and other Western targets. These include:

- a series of kidnappings of Westerners, including several Americans, in the 1980s;
- the suicide truck bombings that killed more than 200 U.S. Marines at their barracks in Beirut in 1983;
- the 1985 hijacking of TWA flight 847;
- and two major attacks on Jewish targets in Buenos Aires: the 1992 bombing of the Israeli embassy, killing 29, and the 1994 bombing of a Jewish community centre, killing 95.

Irwin Cotler

Over the past few months, Foreign Affairs Minister Bill Graham has argued that an outright ban on all Hezbollah activities would hinder the work of many innocent doctors, lawyers and social workers in Lebanon, where the organization has 12 members in parliament and runs clinics, schools and charities. Outlawing all the group's activities would also harm Canada's role as a neutral broker in the international political arena, Graham has said.

"We're not going to take that step" of an outright ban, "as it would interfere with our ability to conduct peace negotiations in the Middle East," Graham said recently in the House of Commons.

In placing Hamas on the list, Ottawa has concluded that money donated to social charities operated by the group had "leaked to the terrorist apparatus," which apparently distinguishes it from Hezbollah.

Easter refused to explain the decision on Hezbollah, but called Canada's list a "work in progress." In any event, he said more groups would be named under Bill C-36.

Being named under the law "is a very, very serious matter," Easter stated. "They can have their assets seized and frozen."

Diet Chanukah favourites to help you keep slim

By JUDY BART KANCIGOR
Special to The CJN

I've never understood the reasoning. Against all odds, the Maccabees overthrew the enemy. In re-dedicating the Temple, a tiny drop of oil that should have burned for a single day miraculously lasted for eight.

And we've been frying our brains out ever since.

Where's the miracle in consuming eight days' worth of oil in one sitting? Wouldn't it be more in the spirit of Chanukah to use a tiny drop of oil to feed crispy latkes to eight hungry people? Now that would be a miracle!

At this time of year the world is divided into two kinds of dieters: those that plan to start after the holidays and those that struggle to get through the holidays. I propose a third: those that enjoy the holidays no matter what their diet regimen.

At this writing, I've lost 20 pounds on Weight Watchers and am five pounds from my goal. But mine is no overnight success story. And, believe me, if I can get through the holidays – oops, I mean enjoy the holidays – you can too.

Weight Watchers and I have had an off-again, on-again romance for 36 years. In January 1966 (after the holidays!) three months after delivering my first child, I huffed and puffed my way up the stairs to my first Weight Watchers meeting in Brooklyn, N.Y.

Sophie, our lecturer (as they were called back then) was one of the original group of friends who had sat in founder Jean Nidetch's garage where Weight Watchers was born. And what a revolutionary concept they concocted. Imagine! Losing weight while eating real food!

Previously the wonderful world of weight control was a Technicolor wonderland of diet pills and starvation. (Those pills were amphetamines, and I had been taking them since I was 12!)

Sophie began every meeting with: "Welcome, pilgrims, your search has ended!" But for me it had only begun.

Sure, I lost my 52 pounds, reached my goal and wore a new dress with the size-12 tag hanging out of my armpit for all the world to see. But like all honeymoons, reality hit – for about the next 36 years.

Up and down, back and forth, on Optifast, Nutri/System, Jenny Craig, HCG shots (from the urine of pregnant animals – you'd lose 30 pounds in six weeks and gain it back in four.) My photo albums tell the story of a human accordion. In and out; in and out. Now you see me; now you see more.

But between fad diets, there was always Weight Watchers. Then nine years ago I gave it up. Dieting, that is. Even my doctor recommended I stay fat rather than yo-yo myself into an early grave. I bought a beautiful wardrobe in size 20W, and – miracle of miracles – the minute I stopped dieting, I began losing weight.

I consulted a nutritionist, not to diet but to learn healthy eating, gave up sweets (not for everyone, but it works for me) and have kept my weight off since.

Now I'm finishing the job. I eat the way I eat, holidays or no. I'm not on a diet that I'll discard when I reach my goal.

LOW-FAT HOLIDAY STUFFING

From Melting Pot Memories

I've been making this for years and no one knows the difference.

1 tbsp. margarine
1 tbsp. oil
3 leeks, white part, chopped
1 fennel bulb, chopped
1 pound mushrooms, chopped
1 quart (approx.) chicken soup (defatted, homemade preferred)
¼ lb. turkey sausage, browned and crumbled (optional)
2 tbsp. total fresh mixed herbs (marjoram, rosemary, sage, thyme), chopped
½ tsp. ground poultry spice
10 cups (total) bread cubes: raisin bread and challah
½ cup dried cranberries (plumped in orange juice, then drained)
¼ cup fresh Italian parsley, minced
salt and pepper to taste

In large skillet, melt margarine and oil and sauté vegetables over moderately high heat. When vegetables start to stick to the pan, pour in ½ cup chicken soup and continue cooking and stirring until it evaporates.

Repeat this process by adding chicken soup as it evaporates until vegetables are nicely stewed. (This method uses quite a bit of soup and concentrates the salt, so wait for the very end to correct seasonings.) Mix with remaining ingredients, adding enough chicken soup to desired consistency. Pour into casserole dish sprayed with vegetable spray and bake at 350 about an hour or more. (Cover if it starts to dry out.) Yield: Approximately 18 half-cup servings, 3 points each. (2¼ points if you omit the sausage.)

WEIGHT WATCHERS APPLE PIE

As I mentioned, I've given up sweets (sigh), but I still use this Weight Watchers recipe I've adapted from the '60s.

8 apples, cored, pared and sliced thin
2 cups diet cola
4 envelopes kosher unflavoured gelatin
1 tsp. vanilla
3 tsp. cinnamon (divided) sweetener of your choice to taste (I use 6 packets of Sweet 'n Low)
1 tbsp. lemon juice
1¼ cups nonfat powdered milk

Preheat oven to 350. In a 9x13 baking pan, mix apples, cola, gelatin, vanilla, 2 tsp. cinnamon, sweetener and lemon juice. Press mixture evenly in pan. In a separate small bowl, mix powdered milk with 1 tsp. cinnamon. Sprinkle evenly over apple mixture.

Cover pan loosely with foil and bake for ½ hour or until liquid starts to bubble around edges. Remove foil and bake an additional ½ hour or until brown. Refrigerate until set. Yield: 8 servings, 2¼ points each.

Qumran sect confronted 'cosmic evil' with magic: expert on Dead Sea Scrolls

By STACEY STEIN
Special to The CJN

The Dead Sea Scrolls are rich with magic in the form of incantations, songs and prayers, which can be attributed to a group of priests who broke away from their Second Temple colleagues.

This was the focus of Dr. Esther Chazon's recent lecture at Beth Tikvah synagogue, titled Magic in the Dead Sea Scrolls.

The magic texts were discovered at Qumran on the northwestern shore of the Dead Sea, the site where 900 manuscripts of the Dead Sea Scrolls were found in 11 caves in the 1940s and 1950s. Of these, 300 are biblical manuscripts, 300 are manuscripts containing the community's writings and 300 contain the work of previously unknown Jewish writers.

Chazon provided insight into the Qumran community through an explanation of their magic texts. She also gave attendees copies of some of the prayers and incantations found in these texts. Chazon is director of the Orion Center for the Study of the Dead Sea Scrolls and Associated Literature at Hebrew University.

Chazon described the Qumran priests as "an opposition group of disenfranchised, unemployed priests who just couldn't stomach what was going on in the Jerusalem Temple" during the period right after the Maccabean revolt, around 150 BCE.

This group of priests and their followers left the Jerusalem Temple and established their own isolationist community at Qumran, which they conceived of as a "spiritual temple which would substitute for and achieve the same aims that the Jerusalem temple was performing for the rest of Israel."

The Qumran sect used magic in order to combat evil and protect themselves, Chazon said.

"In order to rid evil in the world, whether it be sin or disease or temptation, you have to get one step higher than the mortal human being."

Chazon defines magic as "the use of supernatural means to influence conditions and events. Magic is a way of dealing with cosmic evil in our world."

Chazon said to fight evil, the Qumran sect used three types of magic: divination, incantations (i.e. magic spells) and, lastly, protective songs and prayers.

"Basically, there is much in common with Jewish magic practices throughout the ages, from the Bible down to, I dare say, even the present," said Chazon. "Magic in the Dead Sea Scrolls, like most of the Jewish magic, primarily is magic of the word, invoking divine name, divine words to reveal scripture."

Chazon said that in the subject of magic, as in many other areas for which there are Dead Sea Scrolls, the writings are "a link in an unbroken chain of Jewish tradition that can provide countless opportunities to better understand our heritage."

Chazon described the Dead Sea Scrolls as "the greatest archeological and manuscript find of the 20th century" and emphasized their importance in understanding Judaism. Chazon is a renowned expert in the study of the Dead Sea Scrolls and was also a member of an international team that completed publishing all of the scrolls one year ago.

On Campus

Students at GA urged to be proactive

By ALIZA LIBMAN
Special to The CJN

So what does your campus care about?

This was one of the first questions asked of the 35 participants of the recent General Assembly's "Do the Write Thing" program for student journalists.

The annual conference was held this year in Philadelphia. Do the Write Thing was organized by Hagshama, the University Students' Division of the World Zionist Organization.

Many of the 400 students attending the conference as representatives of their campus Hillels gave similar answers.

The upcoming war with Iraq, skyrocketing tuition fees, environmental concerns and campus corporate sponsorship seem to be on North American students' minds this year, they said.

So where does Israel fit in?

Jeremy Greenberg, a fifth-year political science student at York University, doesn't think it does.

"I'd say most non-Jews don't care [about Israel]," Greenberg said. "If pressed for reaction, they're sickened by all the death and the killing and the murder over there... they don't want to hear about it any more.

"At York, the majority of Jews are similar to non-Jews in their reaction, but if pressed, they would tell you that they are in support of Israel."

Nevertheless, a primary focus of the General Assembly was Israel advocacy. At a press conference, famed Soviet refusenik and Israeli Deputy Prime Minister Natan Sharansky said, "One of the most important battlefields is what's happening on the college campus today."

The student participants were called to fight campus ignorance and apathy by not merely perpetuating Jewish-Arab polemic, but by finding new ways to convince students that Israel is a country they should naturally support.

Danielle Ames, a native of Vancouver who goes to McGill University, was one of more than 30 Montreal students who attended.

"Nowadays, people, especially on campus, are extremely liberal," she said. "If we really want to reach out to these liberals on campus, we need to focus on things that are universally held ideals," she said, citing democracy, women's rights and the freedom of the individual, values that Israel is based on.

Gideon Meir, the deputy director-general of the Israeli Ministry of Foreign Affairs, added, "We have to send to the world constantly the message that we are a democracy."

But representatives of Hillel, the organization that operates Jewish student clubs on campuses across North America, argued that the best way to fight for Israel is to focus on cultural programs rather than political ones, saying cultural events are more popular.

"We're doing a lot of work putting together Israeli film festivals and Israeli fairs and we're encouraging students to not focus on the conflict," said Howard Wolke, communications associate for Hillel.

"If all you do is focus on the conflict, then once the conflict is over, students won't have a connection to Israel anymore."

Gil Troy, professor of American history at McGill University, believes that university students need to "think of more creative ways to re-engage with Jewish peoplehood and with the State of Israel."

Troy encouraged the students to reinvent Zionism, which, he told them, was originally a "revolt of the young."

Second-year Concordia University student Naomi Sarna also believes that to convince non-Jews to support Israel, we must first convince other Jews.

"One of the most important things is to unify the Jews on campus," Sarna said. "You plan parties, you set up tables talking about Jewish holidays... this way, Jews start meeting other Jews and then you have everyone together and you have a list of people that you know can come out to rallies... people you've made personal contact with."

Whatever the strategy, it is clear that students must work with the existing David versus Goliath stereotype of Israel. Not to worry, said Ido Aharoni, head of Media Affairs for the Israeli Consulate in New York. "Goliath doesn't have to be a bad guy."

Aliza Libman is a Jewish education student at York University who serves as media relations co-ordinator for York's Jewish Student Federation Israel Affairs committee.

Coast to Coast

Two books out, a few more to go for Sask. senior

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Martha Blum is nearly 90, but her creative abilities are showing little sign of age. The longtime resident of Saskatoon has just had her second book published and is working on two more.

MISSION TO D.C.: Eleven members of Kingston's Jewish community recently went on a four-day Regional Jewish Communities of Ontario (RJCO) mission to Washington, D.C. Led by RJCO's director of community development Michael Soberman, the trip included meetings with professionals from the American Israel Public Affairs Committee, the Anti-Defamation League, the Israeli and Canadian embassies and a walking tour highlighting the architecture of the U.S. capital. The trip also included an emotional visit to the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum. Pictured, from left, are (from left) trip participants Bonnie Golomb, Mindy Campeau, Toby Abramsky and Cheryl Kizell at the Women's Memorial, part of the Vietnam Memorial.

Blum was born in the city of Czernowitz in 1913 when it was still part of the Austro-Hungarian empire. It fell to Romania after World War I and is now located in Ukraine.

She studied pharmaceutical chemistry and other subjects at the universities of Bucharest, Prague, Strasbourg and Paris. She survived the war years in labour camps, and came to Saskatoon with her mathematician husband, Dr. Richard Blum, in 1954.

Over the years, she worked as a pharmacist and as a French and music teacher, as well as being an author. In 1998, she received a national award given to Holocaust survivors in Canada who have contributed to the arts here.

"I have always been a writer," Blum says. "I used to write in French and German. Now I only write in English."

Blum had her first English novel, The Walnut Tree, published by Coteau Books in Regina in 1999. The World War II-era novel won two Saskatchewan book awards.

Her new book, Children of Paper was released on Oct. 24. Blum describes it as a collection of short stories linked by characters that appear off and on throughout. The setting is the fictional east European shtetl of Suczorno, circa 1900, with the synagogue in the middle and cobblestones all around.

Among the recurring characters are Simon, a young man who goes to the big city to learn a trade and modern ideas but returns home to be with his love; Bimbule the luftmensch; and Sarah who is trying "to know" God.

Suczorno and its tales are based on her grandmother's experiences and memories, Blum says. She is confident that Children of Paper will have wide appeal, not only in the Jewish community, but in the general community as well.

"The stories capture the spiritual lives of the people," she says. "The characters are marvellous."

Symposium seeks recognition of Jewish refugees from Arab lands

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

At a recent symposium on the Forgotten Exodus of Jews from Arab lands, experts called for compensation for the 900,000 Jews displaced when Israel was created and the exposure of the myth that Palestinians are the only Mideast refugees.

"This is one of the most important initiatives we have ever done. We hope it will raise the consciousness of our own community and Canadians about the tragedy of those Jews who were expelled from their countries," Keith Landy, president of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), told The CJN

Following the symposium, CJC indicated it would co-operate with the efforts of a newly formed coalition, called Justice for Jews from Arab Countries (JJAC), based in New Jersey.

JJAC is working to document the losses suffered by Jews who were expelled from Arab countries in the 20th century, win redress for them and put the issue "on the international political and judicial agenda."

The group, whose supporters include the World Jewish Congress (WJC), the American Sephardi Federation and the Conference of Presidents of Major Jewish Organizations, also wants to raise public awareness on the issue.

Modelled after a symposium held in Paris about a year ago, the Montreal gathering drew an overflow crowd of 450 to the Gelber Conference Centre.

Some were refugees from Arab lands eager to hear of concrete progress being made on their behalf. Others, such as Iraqi-born Steve Acre, gave poignant accounts of the persecution and harassment Jews suffered in their native lands before finally finding safe haven in Canada. Iraq's once-thriving Jewish population of 135,000 is now largely gone.

About 600,000 of the 900,000 refugees, expelled or forced to leave their countries as Israel fought for independence and afterwards, ended up in the Jewish state.

And the centuries-old Jewish communities in Iraq, Syria, Libya, Lebanon, Yemen, Algeria, Tunisia and Morocco, were reduced to a shell of their former selves or were extinguished.

"My family lost all of its property," Acre said in an interview. "This issue had to be brought to the forefront. Compensation should not be just for the Palestinians, but for us too."

Recurrent themes emerged as the issue was addressed by some notable international experts.

Lawyer William Goldnadel of France, who is seeking legal avenues of redress, was joined by others, including MP and human rights lawyer Irwin Cotler, in puncturing the myth that Jews were "protected" in their native lands.

Goldnadel anticipated that a class-action lawsuit would be launched by a committee of former refugees, which could ultimately result in compensation for the hundreds of thousands whose properties and assets were confiscated when they were force to leave the countries they had called home for generations.

"The time for justice is at hand," he said.

Other experts, including French lawyer Arno Klarsfeld, stressed that the principle of "reciprocity" must apply for Jewish and Palestinian refugees and that the Jewish refugee issue must be a part of peace negotiations.

Cotler, who has agreed to serve as an honorary chair of JJAC, delineated several principles that should apply, among them the right to reparations and restitution, and the obligation to memory and truth.

Cotler said United Nations Resolution 242 referred to a "just solution to the refugee problem," meaning all refugees created as a result of the birth of the State of Israel – Arabs and Jews.

Klarsfeld, son of the Nazi-hunting couple Serge and Beate Klarsfeld, said unlike Jewish refugees from Arab lands, only a "tiny portion" of Palestinian refugees were forced to leave the new Jewish state.

And while the Jewish state has acknowledged Palestinian suffering, no Palestinian has ever recognized the plight of Jews forced from their lands, he said.

Avi Beker, secretary general of the WJC, and others noted that the United Nations Relief Work Agency, which provides humanitarian aid at Palestinian refugee camps, has stood by as the camps became fertile breeding grounds for terrorism and helped to perpetuate the "tragedy" of the Palestinians.

The symposium appeared to give the Jewish refugee cause hope, although Jean Claude Niddam, an official of Israel's Justice Ministry, said that over the years, other groups, such as the WJC and WOJAC (the World Organization for Jews from Arab Lands) have had limited success in similar efforts.

What does 'occupied territory' really mean?

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Nearly every suicide bombing in Israel is followed up with comments from Islamic extremists who rationalize the attack as "justified resistance to occupation."

The horrific Nov. 21 terrorist attack on a Jerusalem bus, in which 11 people were killed and 50 wounded, was the latest strike to evoke such comments.

Stewart Bell, writing in the National Post the next day, noted that "on Arabic television, a Hamas leader said the bloodshed would continue until Israelis 'leave our land'" and noted a Hamas statement that promised more violence as long as there is occupation. Paul Adams in the Globe and Mail (Nov. 22) reported that "Palestinian officials called the bombing terrorism but blamed it on Israel's continuing occupation of much of the West Bank."

What must be emphasized is that the terms "occupation" and "our land" often do not mean merely the West Bank and Gaza Strip. Rather, for Islamic extremists, and now many secularists as well, they mean Israel proper.

James Bennet dealt with this ambiguity in the New York Times (Nov. 22). "Hamas and Islamic Jihad have not [recognized Israel's right to exist]. In practice these groups make no distinction among Israelis [whether living within the 1967 borders or beyond the Green Line] and have repeatedly shown a determination to kill them without regard to age, occupation, or geography."

Many Israeli analysts believe Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat is complicit in the rejection of Israel as the Jewish state. In turning down the offers made at the Camp David and Taba summits of 2000 and 2001, Arafat denied that Jews had any special attachment to Jerusalem. This was a signal that he was not interested in establishing any Palestinian state, though well within his grasp, in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

Yet Bennet writes that in contrast to the Islamist extremists, Arafat "has recognized Israel's right to exist." Perhaps Bennet draws this inference because Arafat "harshly criticized the violence against Israeli civilians within the 1967 borders" after the Jerusalem carnage.

But Israeli experts remain skeptical that Arafat makes a distinction between Israel's pre-1967 borders and the West Bank and Gaza Strip. If we count the number of attacks within the Green Line by groups "affiliated" with Arafat's Fatah, there is enough evidence that the distinction between Israel proper and the territories is more a convenient fiction than an accepted fact.

Bennet suggests two competing, and revealing, explanations for the present conflict: "Where Mr. Sharon sees a relentless, generations-old campaign of Arab terror to destroy the Jewish state, [Amram Mitzna, the new Labor party leader] sees some Israeli culpability, stemming from Israel's occupation of the West Bank and Gaza Strip after the Arab-Israel war of 1967.

"The wreckage of the Nov. 20 bus is a problem for the latter theory of the conflict and a possible blow to the idea that Israeli withdrawal to the pre-1967 border might end the violence. The bombing took place on land that was Israel's before the 1967 war, and its victims included schoolchildren rather than only settlers and soldiers."

$50 million gift to UJA is the largest ever

The Shermans have already paid $11 million of that amount and the interest from the endowment will be directed to UJA's annual campaign, which raised more than $60 million this year toward social service needs in Israel and in the Toronto Jewish community, now estimated at approximately 200,000 people.

The Jewish Foundation is part of a larger UJA Federation effort called Jewish Toronto Tomorrow, which aims to raise more than $1 billion over eight to 10 years for capital projects and the annual UJA campaign.

"Honey and I thought about it, and certainly we're glad to [make the donation]. In any event, it would have been our intention to give as our means enabled us to. You can't take it with you."

The best way to use money, Sherman feels, is to do what one can for others. "I enjoy working, being productive and doing good things. So does Honey. She works hard for [a variety of] organizations."

"We greatly appreciate the Shermans' generosity and vision in bestowing this tremendous gift," stated Jewish Foundation chair Neil Nisker in a news release. He called them "philanthropic pioneers" who "set a new standard for generations to come."

Although Sherman felt his donation was particularly important now – because of Israel's pressing needs and also because of needs in the Toronto Jewish community – he has no desire to have a say in where his money is spent.

"I really think it's important that the aspect of contributing be separate from the aspect of allocating," he said. "Let others who are better equipped to do so make the decisions where the money goes," he said.

Recently, the Shermans gave $1 million to the United Way's Tomorrow Fund. "We try to limit our major gifts to major institutions like UJA, the United Way, the Baycrest Centre and the University of Toronto," he said by way of explaining his philanthropic philosophy. Smaller charities receive smaller amounts, he added.

In his private life, the father of four said he wants his children to know the importance of hard work, accomplishment and contributing to society.

Al Qaeda may have launched attack to lure Israel into war

In Ottawa, Foreign Affairs Minister Bill Graham condemned the hotel car bombing and the failed missile attack on the Arkia passenger flight.

"The deaths of these innocent civilians at the hands of terrorists are tragic and senseless," Graham said in a news release. "This attack reminds us all that we must remain vigilant in the global war against terrorism."

The Foreign Affairs news release was silent about the terrorist attack on the Likud polling station, which took place the same day.

After the deadly hotel attack, Sharon vowed that Israel would pursue those who had spilled the blood of its citizens.

It is the "duty of all countries not only to offer condolences when we bury our dead, but also to support us when we fight terror," he said.

But it is not clear how much support Israel will get if it begins hunting down members of Al Qaeda.

Terrorism experts said over the weekend that Al Qaeda may have purposely targeted an Israeli site in order to draw Israel into the U.S. war on terror.

Al Qaeda believes that Israeli involvement will convince Arab states that the United States and Israel are teaming up to oppress Muslims around the world, these commentators say.

Such considerations may prompt the United States to pressure Israel to avoid action against Al Qaeda, they add.

Following last week's attack, Sharon instructed the Mossad to take responsibility for finding those responsible.

A report in Britain's Sunday Times newspaper said Sharon had given instructions to activate "sleeper" Mossad agents in Saudi Arabia and Yemen to track down those responsible for the Kenya attack.

According to the report, such agents are only activated in cases of emergency, with the goal of obstructing preparations by Arab countries to wage war against Israel.

Sharon instructed the Mossad to find those responsible

On Sunday, funerals were held for the three Israelis killed in the hotel attack.

The victims are brothers Noy Anter, 12, and Dvir Anter, 13, and tour group leader Albert de Havila, 60. The boys' mother, Ora, 38, was seriously wounded in the attack. Their young sister, Adva, 8, was slightly injured.

The bodies of the victims were flown back to Israel over the weekend in a military air convoy that also brought back the 18 Israelis injured in the attack and the more than 250 Israeli tourists who were in Mombasa when the suicide bombing took place.

When the planes returned to Israel last Friday, anxious family members gathered at the airport to welcome their loved ones, while ambulances waited on the tarmac to receive the wounded and take them to hospital.

"My father was hurt in the attack, and my mother was supposed to come together with him on the plane," Yaniv Kirman told the Israeli daily Ma'ariv as he waited for his parents to emerge from the flight.

"From the moment we heard about the attack, I tried to reach and locate my parents, but it was a nightmare. I couldn't get through."

When Kirman's father came off the plane, he was transferred to an ambulance. His mother, Tzippora, hugged her son and daughter for a long time.

"We were lucky, just lucky," she said. "We were among the last ones who were in the lobby. I had just gotten to the room and put the key in the lock, and then there was the explosion in the lobby."

But alongside the joyous family reunions with the wounded was the sorrow of the families awaiting the remains of their loved ones.

"This is my last trip, I will never go back to Kenya," said Rahamim Anter, the father of the two boys killed in the attack. The family had planned to spend Chanukah at the resort.

Will You Make Them Smile Again?

A simple photograph can tell a thousand stories.

It isn't easy being a child or a teenager in Israel these days. In the blink of an eye, a beautiful family laughing and celebrating at a Bar Mitzvah, can be blown apart by a maniacal Palestinian suicide bomber... A loving husband and wife with seven children, can be torn asunder by the relentless gunfire from another hate-filled terrorist... Over a thousand children and teenagers alike, have either been left maimed, orphaned or traumatized during the past two years.

Children Of Terror, a grassroots organization that is working tirelessly to put the "joy" back into their lives with one-to-one activities, cordially invites you to "reach-out" and connect with these precious children. We want you to actually reach out and touch these youngsters, by writing and or calling them via the Children Of Terror website. Sharon defeats Netanyahu for Likud leadership

By YOSSI VERTER
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The chairman of the Likud election committee Zvi Cohen confirmed last Friday morning that Prime Minister Ariel Sharon won the party leadership race by a 15 per cent margin over Foreign Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. The final results of the primary race were: 56 per cent of the vote for Sharon, 40 per cent for Netanyahu and just over three per cent for Moshe Feiglin. Voter turnout was 46 per cent.

Earlier television polls predicted a larger 17 to 24 point margin of victory for the prime minister.

Sharon will now face the Labor Party's newly elected chairman, Haifa mayor Amram Mitzna, in the Jan. 28 general elections.

After accepting the congratulations of his rival, Sharon opened his sombre victory speech at the Tel Aviv Exhibition Grounds by asking supporters to respect the memories of the nine Israeli killed in last Thursday's terror attacks in Beit She'an and Kenya.

Sharon reiterated a statement he had made earlier in the day, that the terror attacks were an attempt "to influence the elections in Israel." He added that "Israel will hunt down those who have spilled the blood of its citizens. No one has immunity. It is the duty of all countries not only to offer condolences when we bury out dead, but also to support us when we fight terror."

Looking ahead to the Jan. 28 election, Sharon predicted that "the Likud will double its strength; if we work together, we will achieve an even better result."

Earlier, at his campaign headquarters in Tel Aviv, Netanyahu congratulated Sharon on his victory, and called on Likud members to unite around their leader to ensure that the party "wins a huge victory in the forthcoming elections."

In an apparent signal that he intends to remain firmly in the political realm, Netanyahu vowed to help Sharon and Likud win a decisive victory in January.

After the terror attacks in Kenya and Beit She'an that day, the campaign headquarters of both candidates were almost deserted when the polls were published, a far cry from the raucous scenes that usually greet the television cameras.

Sharon aides said last Thursday night that in the coming days, until the elections for the Likud list, the prime minister would devote a lot of time to helping his supporters win "respectable places" on the Knesset list. Those supporters include ministers Reuven Rivlin, Silvan Shalom, Shaul Mofaz, Tzipi Livni, Roni Milo and Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert.

Sharon has told his associates he will not allow "political purges," but will do whatever he can to help his supporters.

Netanyahu, who promised there would be no camps in the Likud, nonetheless will do the same for his backers – MKs Yuval Steinitz and Yisrael Katz, as well as minister Meir Sheetrit, MK Moshe Arens and his former spokesperson Shai Bazak.

One of Sharon's political advisers, Ruby Yisraeli, said that for 3½ years, ever since Sharon took over the Likud when Netanyahu resigned the night he lost the premiership to Ehud Barak, "we've worked to bring the results we had tonight. We knew the Likud Central Committee didn't support Sharon, so we held a registration drive, recruited new people, and made the change."

Voter turnout increased significantly toward the end of the day, after Sharon made an impassioned call for Likud members to cast their votes – despite the terror attack hours earlier on the Likud branch in Beit She'an.

Israel has foiled Al Qaeda attacks

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel Defence Forces Chief of Staff Moshe Ya'alon said Monday that security forces had foiled attempted Al Qaeda attacks in Israel and that the terror network has Palestinian operatives in the territories.

Ya'alon made his comments at a meeting with new inductees at a recruiting base.

Questioned about the possibility of the IDF withdrawing from Bethlehem before Christmas, Ya'alon said a pullback would depend on the situation on the ground.

Ya'alon also said comments attributed to him before a closed Washington forum to the effect that most settlements would ultimately have to be dismantled and Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat would have to be expelled were "a complete distortion" of what he had said.

According to a report in Ha'aretz Monday, Ya'alon said during a closed discussion at the Washington Institute for Near East policy last week that both Israelis and Palestinians know that "at the end of the day, most of the settlements will be evacuated."

The statement came during a question-and-answer session. It did not include details about the future Ya'alon expected for the settlements or the political circumstances surrounding the evacuations.

Ya'alon said Monday morning that what he actually told the forum was that two years ago, the Palestinians understood that Israel intended to dismantle most of the settlements and that despite this no agreement was achieved and the Palestinians opted for violence.

"I am sorry to experience, not for the first time, a distortion of things I said in a closed forum. It was not done by U.S. officials, and I hope that this was not due to a language comprehension problem," Ya'alon said.

"What I said was that in the year 2000, the Palestinians understood that Israel was willing to dismantle most of the settlements. Nevertheless, the agreement was not completed and the Palestinians began fighting, that's what I said.

"I didn't use the word 'expulsion,'" Ya'alon said, referring to his comments on Arafat. He said he had told the forum that as long as Arafat is around, it would be difficult to end terror and reach an agreement with the Palestinians.

Ya'alon criticized the United States for not being fully committed to Arafat's removal

Speaking off the record to the institute's membership, Ya'alon said Hamas had agreed to far-reaching concessions during secret talks it had conducted with Palestinian leaders Abu Mazen and Mohammed Dahlan a few months ago. He called the talks "a silent coup" against Arafat, and said they had the goal of making Abu Mazen a powerful prime minister of the Palestinian Authority.

According to Ya'alon, the two initiated talks with Hamas behind Arafat's back to try to reach a three-month ceasefire. The chief of staff said Hamas representatives agreed to the ceasefire, but the Damascus-based leaders of the Islamic fundamentalist group nixed it.

Mitzna offers a clear choice

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

The Labor party's newly crowned leader, Amram Mitzna, offers Israeli voters what his predecessor, Binyamin Ben-Eliezer, did not – a clear alternative to Likud. Mitzna, having wrested the leadership from Ben-Eliezer at a recent primary, campaigned on a platform of distancing the centre-left Labor party from the right-wing Likud, its partner in the now dissolved national unity government.

Ben-Eliezer – the party's first Sephardi leader and the defence minister in Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's cabinet – was essentially co-opted by Sharon. Such was his consistent support of Sharon's policies – from the shunning of Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat to the re-occupation of towns in the Palestinian autonomous areas – that critics in the Labor party contemptuously branded him a Likud lackey.

Ben-Eliezer and his associate, Shimon Peres, who served as foreign minister, presented themselves as moderating forces in the Sharon government. At times, this was true, particularly when Sharon exercised restraint in the face of Palestinian suicide bombings. In general, however, the pair concurred with Sharon's military policies, which did not offer the Palestinians a viable political horizon. So ineffectual were they as countervailing forces that observers were hard-pressed to distinguish between Likud and Labor.

By the time Ben-Eliezer walked out of the government, setting the stage for the Jan. 28 election, the Labor party had, more or less, been absorbed by the Likud and was a pale shadow of its former self. The widespread perception that Ben-Eliezer had essentially sold out the party's principles for the sake of power and had lent a hand in the demolition of the Oslo peace process were the major causes for Mitzna's emergence.

The son of German-born parents who was raised on a kibbutz and nurtured on Labour Zionist ideals, Mitzna was a career army officer – a major-general – whose first exposure to professional politics was as mayor of Haifa from 1993 onward. By all accounts, he acquitted himself competently.

Although Mitzna, 57, is effectively a newcomer, he lacks neither self-confidence nor the ability to articulate the claim that Israel is in dire need of a " different reality" in light of a ruinous Palestinian uprising, the second in 13 years.

Like one of his predecessors, Yitzhak Rabin, Mitzna believes that Israel "must fight terrorism as if there are no negotiations and negotiate as if there is no terrorism." This, of course, is the polar opposite of what Sharon espouses.

More to the point, Mitzna has set out to achieve a decisive solution to the Palestinian problem, if that is still possible after the failure of the Camp David summit in July 2000 and the eruption of wholesale Palestinian violence.

Mitzna, an advocate of a two-state solution, calls for the unconditional resumption of talks with the Palestinians. If an agreement is unattainable, Israel should separate from the Palestinians by withdrawing unilaterally from the bulk of the West Bank, leaving behind isolated Jewish settlements. Mitzna also believes that Israel should give up Israel's foothold in the Gaza Strip within one year.

In this spirit, he maintains that Israel should stop spending money on settlements in the territories and divert the funds to Israeli inner cities and development towns. Like Ehud Barak, the former Labor party prime minister, Mitzna holds there should be shared sovereignty in eastern Jerusalem.

Short of the Likud adopting his guidelines, which is extremely unlikely, Mitzna is not interested in joining the Likud in a unity government.

Given Israel's current mood, few observers think Mitzna can win next month's election. But this much seems clear. If Ben-Eliezer had defeated Mitzna in the primary, the Labor party probably would have been torn asunder by internecine rivalries, and Yossi Beilin, one of its leading figures, would have bolted to form a new social democratic party.

• At least six Israelis were killed and some 43 injured in an attack by two terrorists who opened fire on voters in the Likud leadership primary at the party branch in Beit She'an. Eleven people were in serious condition and seven sustained moderate wounds. The Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade, which is linked to Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat's Fatah faction, claimed responsibility.

HRT considered effective for menopausal symptoms

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

A controversy erupted this summer when a study of 16,608 women found that hormone replacement therapy (HRT), when given to prevent heart disease and stroke, actually led to an increased risk for both.

Nevertheless, it "is still the most effective treatment for menopausal symptoms and does not appear to have ill effects if taken for relatively short periods of time," said Jennifer Blake, the head of Women's health and chief of obstetrics and gynecology at Sunnybrook & Women's College Hospital.

Blake, who is also a professor of obstetrics and gynecology at the University of Toronto, said at a forum on HRT, that in part, the overwhelming concerns arose about the results of the study because only certain aspects of the study were made public, and "science is not well understood if reported in sound bites."

It is also important to understand, Blake said, that this was a study of asymptomatic women, given estrogen (actually various combinations of estrogen and progestin) purely for the purposes of preventing heart disease.

Participants in the study, she said, were generally older and more overweight than those usually coming for HRT, both factors that increase the risk of heart disease and stroke.

Other participants on the panel, sponsored by the Weizmann Institute's Women & Science, and Toronto's Centre for Research in Women's Health and held at Toronto's Four Seasons Hotel, included Florence Haseltine, director of the National Institute of Health Center for Population Research in Bethesda, Md., rheumatologist Laurence Rubin, director of the division of rheumatology at St. Michael's Hospital; and Len Sternberg, director of cardiology at Sunnybrook & Women's College Hospital and associate professor of medicine at the University of Toronto. Heather Maclean, director of the Centre for Research in Women's Health, was moderator.

Haseltine stressed that the use of HRT to decrease the chances of heart disease and stroke had nothing to do with the original purpose of HRT, which was to alleviate symptoms of menopause.

Previous studies, she said, had found that women before menopause had a reduced rate of heart attack compared to men, although this is not necessarily true, since "women tend to not show symptoms of heart attack."

Researchers felt that since the only difference in women before and after menopause was the production of estrogen, then estrogen must have a preventative effect. Hence the study.

Sternberg cited statistics showing that in Canada, heart disease is the major killer of women – six times as many women die from heart disease as from breast cancer.

"We can see how important it would have been had HRT been effective [in preventing heart disease]."

A follow-up report in October, he said, also showed that HRT does not decrease, and, in fact, may increase the risk of coronary heart disease, although not necessarily fatally, and that it may increase the risk of stroke.

However, he said, "the absolute increase in risk is modest, and some may say that the benefits outweigh the risks."

Lifestyle changes, such as quitting smoking, maintaining a healthy weight and exercising, are more beneficial than HRT to prevent heart disease Sternberg said.

Addressing another aspect of the study, Rubin said it "confirms what we all thought – that HRT does indeed work in terms of preventing bone disease and fractures."

Osteoporosis often leads to serious fractures, which "are very disabling. In fact, adjusted for all other factors, fracture of the hip or vertebrae is a marker for premature death."

However, he said, he would not recommend HRT if the only problem a woman has is osteoporosis.

"There are alternative drug therapies, such as Fosomax and Didrocal, which are just as effective, cause few side effects and work specifically on bone."

All the panellists emphasized the importance of making HRT a short-term therapy, not longer than five years, and keeping the dose as low as possible.

During the question period, Haseltine urged a calm response. "It's not a matter of going on or off it immediately."

Blake agreed, saying that the two reports are just the first results of the study.

The Battle

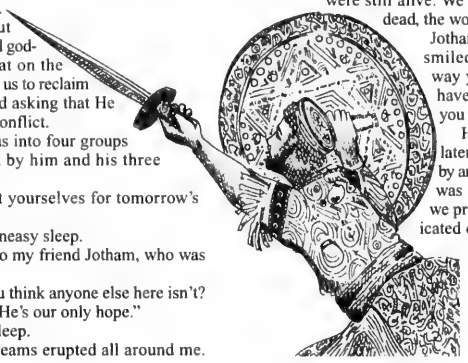
based on material from the Book of Maccabees, a historical account of the Chanukah period.

They were coming. The Greek army was coming – 47,000 soldiers, led by Syria's greatest generals, Ptolemy, Nikanor and Georgias. They were coming to squelch our revolution.

Judah Maccabee had called us, a force of 4,000 men, to the town of Mitzpah, where we were to prepare for the onslaught. But we did not prepare for battle the way most armies do. Yes, we had gathered whatever weapons we could get hold of. Yes, we had trained for battle. But today we fasted and prayed.

How we longed to return to the Temple, the place where all Jews could come and worship God together, where Jews from all over the world gathered at festival times to offer their best fruits, grains and sheep in thanks to God.

The Temple now lay in ruins. The Greeks had driven us out and put statues to their gods and goddesses there. And now we sat on the ground, begging God to enable us to reclaim our Temple and our land. And asking that He let us survive the upcoming conflict.



Judah Maccabee divided us into four groups of 1,000, to be commanded by him and his three brothers. I was with Judah.

"Go to sleep now and rest yourselves for tomorrow's battle," he commanded.

The camp settled into an uneasy sleep.

"I'm scared," I confessed to my friend Jotham, who was sleeping next to me.

"Of course you are! Do you think anyone else here isn't? We just have to trust in God. He's our only hope."

Exhausted, I finally fell asleep.

"Wake up! Wake up!" Screams erupted all around me. "We're under attack!"

I jumped up, tired and disoriented. Elephants! There were elephants all around our camp! And thousands of soldiers, with heavy armour and swords and spears! "What's going on?" I demanded.

Jotham didn't even look up from sharpening his sword. "Georgias snuck up and surrounded our entire camp last night!"

Panicking, I reached for my sword. "We're dead! We're cut off from the rest of our men!"

"Shhh! Shhh!" Judah Maccabee hushed the panicked soldiers under his command. "Remember how God miraculously saved our ancestors from Pharaoh by the Sea of Reeds! Cry out to God and beg Him that He save us here today!"

The commanders blew on their shofars, and we charged forward, toward the soldiers, toward the bellowing elephants…

Jotham screamed and crumpled to the ground as an arrow tore into him.

I stopped running and turned around. He was lying on the ground, gasping in deep breaths.

"Jotham!"

"What are you doing?" he screamed at me. "Turn around! Get out there and fight!"

I turned and ran, into the rain of arrows and spears, waving my sword ahead of me, fighting for myself, for my family, for Jotham, for my Temple, for my people…

The shofars blared and we tore into the enemy's front lines. Fiercely, they tried to fight us off, but I could tell they were weakening. Then they were scattering, running away, dropping their belongings as they fled.

Some of our men bent to pick up the dropped items.

"What are you doing?" shouted Judah. "The rest of their army's still in the mountains! The fighting's just begun!"

We ran through Georgias' abandoned camp, and set it on fire. Then we waited for the rest of the army to come. But they never did. I guess when they saw Georgias' camp burning they became frightened, and fled.

No, we didn't have our Temple back yet. But at least we were still alive. We went back to retrieve the dead, the wounded.

Jotham was weak, but alive. He smiled when he saw me. "The way you were fighting, we'll have our Temple back before you can say Judah Maccabee!"

He was almost right. A year later, we were attacked again, by an even larger army. But God was with us this time too, and we prevailed. And then we dedicated ourselves to regaining the Temple. After fighting off the Greeks stationed there, again we could come together and offer our best fruits, grain, and sheep to God. We could light the Menorah too. Except there was no oil.

But you already know that story…

Resistance fighter play only half a great Dane

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

If The Danish Play had followed the old sports adage, "Start strong but finish stronger," the impact of this historical re-enactment would have hit home with more ferocity.

Instead, The Danish Play, staged by Nightwood Theatre and running until Dec. 15 at Tarragon Theatre's Extra Space, falls flat in the second half after an explosive beginning. While the acting is strong and the drama poignant, a hefty portion of the piece falters under laborious dialogue and summary scenes.

The story of famed Danish Resistance fighter Agnette Ottosen follows a group of former rebels during a Danish Christmas in 1962. Meeting seasonally to raise their glasses over a robust "Skol!" (the Danish version of l'chaim), the group mourns the loss of Ottosen, who died years after her concentration camp internment.

In flowing scenes, past and present shuttle back and forth, a tactic that is confusing for the first 20 minutes, but becomes seamless thereafter.

Ottosen, played by the riveting Kate Hennig, fronts as a tight-lipped prim-and-proper secretary who lets her hair down when talk turns to rebellion. With her boss Mads (Bruce Hunter), Ottosen plots resistance against the oncoming Nazi regime and schemes to smuggle Jews out of Denmark.

Switch back quickly to another 1962 "Skol!" and more memories of the courageous woman. Switch back again to pre-World War II, and extensive plans to fight the Germans and sneak to Copenhagen.

In a blink, the scene shifts to a small room hidden behind a transparent screen, which the audience previously assumed was a rug hung on a wall. An SS guard questions Ottosen and pokes her painfully with his club, prompting her to flex her vocal chords and sing the Danish national anthem under interrogation. The screen serves beautifully as a double-duty set design, masquerading as the doorway to Holocaust horrors.

The concentration camp scenes are acted brilliantly. When bedmate Bente (Christine Brubaker) complains of scant rations and recounts Danish pastries, Ottosen's eyes sparkle under her sagging face and she scribbles down the recipe of the beloved pastry. The desire to sleep is so desperate in the Ravensbruck camp that another woman complains of Ottosen's scribbling pencil.

In fact, Ottosen's writing plays a crucial role – both symbolic and practical – to the piece. Not only does her poetry add lyrical insight into Holocaust suffering, but playwright Sonja Mills discovered Ottosen's diaries quite naturally – Ottosen is her great aunt. With that close connection, Mills crafts Ottosen in the play's first half as a pillar of strength, leadership and empowerment.

But after the intermission, when Ottosen returns (in flashbacks) from the concentration camp under duress from illegal surgeries and a "poisoned mind," the scenes bog down with irrelevant exposition and roundabout dialogue.

The drama shifts to Ottosen's struggle to have a child rather than a husband – a less interesting plot considering the play's initial intensity. The climax hovers, waiting to be devoured, but Mills is content to dangle the carrot a little longer. Unfortunately, it turns out to be not all that savoury, considering it is summed up in two sentences.

But the diminished strength of a weak second half occurs through no fault of the actors. Hennig shines throughout, following Kelly Thornton's direction with controlled intensity. A wry smile or a blank stare reveals more character insight than a two-minute monologue.

Hunter follows suit, playing the tight-lipped straight man who is, he says, "just a little bit in love with Agnette." One of the more entertaining scenes occurs during an alcohol-soaked dinner, as Hunter teeters on his chair and slurs his crass comments with convincing muster.

Michael Cehptovestky, as the eager young rebel Michael, also delivers his role with a natural joie de vivre — especially when he's toasted "Skol!" one too many times.

But what The Danish Play delivers dramatically, it lacks in clarity. The scenes never reveal Ottosen's implicit role in saving the Danish Jews, except for a 30-second discussion on where to house a family of 10. Also, the exodus of 7,500 Jews to neutral Sweden is barely discussed, leaving audience members scrambling for encyclopedias to discover Denmark's wartime heroics.

Kate Hennig in The Danish Play

What saves The Danish Play is not only Hennig's performance – coupled with the supporting actors' skills – but the subject matter itself. The world knows of the Schindlers and Wallenbergs, but this piece focuses the spotlight on a courageous woman who had to battle sexism and incredible suffering to share her story. Kudos to Mills for the idea, and bravo to the cast for intimating the soul of rebellion.

Nevertheless, an enjoyable experience must be enjoyable throughout. The flab deflates the full emotional impact the audience surely missed.

Books & Bagels: Born into a strongly Zionist circle, Judith Merril became involved with Trotskyism in the 1930s and '40s, then with the anti-war and anti-drug movements; she moved to Canada in 1968 and settled into Toronto's Rochdale College. When Merril died five years ago, she left an unfinished manuscript with her granddaughter, Emily Pohl-Weary.

Pohl-Weary, who taped many interviews with her grandmother in her last year, fulfilled her dying request by completing the manuscript, which was published as Better To Have Loved. She is the featured author at the Books & Bagels literary event. Miles Nadal JCC, 750 Spadina Ave. at Bloor. Admission $5, members free; includes coffee and bagels. Sunday, Dec. 8, 11 a.m. 416-924-6211.

Toronto native stars in 'Jewsical review'

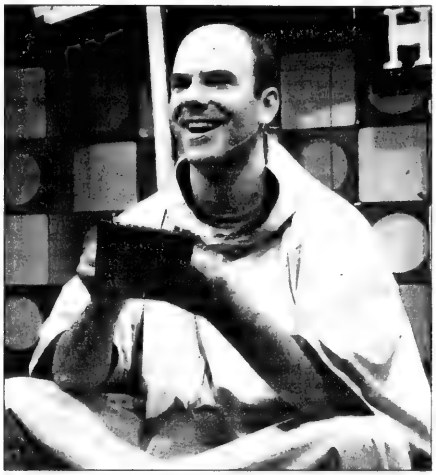
By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Toronto-born actor and director Darrin Baker, 37, is reprising his off-Broadway role as Barry Brockman in Hello Muddah, Hello Fadduh! the Allan Sherman Musical running until Jan. 5 at Toronto's New Yorker Theatre.

When cast in this production that Baker affectionately calls a "Jewsical review," the actor already knew the musical parodies of the late composer.

"I got to know Allan Sherman's stuff because my grandfather had a slew of his albums, which were passed on to my mother and then passed on to me. I love that schtick and listened to it often as a child," Baker says.

"Barry Brockman is the straight man of the show. All of this craziness happens around him. The review is really an excuse to celebrate Allan Sherman's songs and we do it through the life of Barry, who is every man. Hopefully, the audience will enjoy Barry's world," Baker adds.



Darrin Baker stars as Barry Brockman.

Hello Muddah, Hello Fadduh revolves around a story of love, marriage, summer camp and suburbia and includes favourite Sherman ditties such as A Satchel and a Seck (A Bushel and a Peck) and Harvey and Shelia (Hava Nagila) and the title song Hello Muddah, Hello Fadduh... A Letter from Camp.

Although he didn't attend the Camp Grenada of the infamous song, ironically it was in a play at Huntsville, Ont.'s Camp Winnebago at the tender age of 7, that Baker caught the acting bug.

Coming full circle, Baker has plans to create an annual 10-day theatre camp program for teens at the same summer camp that gave him his first theatrical break.

Baker left Canada 14 years ago for Los Angeles.

"I went to Los Angeles and did a lot of television. I always joke that I got my first Broadway show by going to Los Angeles, which is so backwards because I had always dreamed about working on Broadway. I got a role in Sunset Boulevard with Glenn Close and when it closed in L.A., I was asked to come to New York. I thought I'd stay for six months and it has been seven years," he says.

He has appeared on television shows like Queer as Folk, Law and Order and My Secret Identity. In theatre, he has recently toured in Dirty Blonde and with Dick Van Patten in Scandals. Baker has also received the Los Angeles Dramalogue Award for best direction of a musical for Personals and has lent his voice to many cast albums.

He's recorded his own CD What's A Nice Girl Like You... Singing Duets with Darrin Baker? with a who's who of Broadway's biggest divas, including Donna McKechnie, Dee Hoty and Alice Ripley. The album is available at stores or online at www.darrinbaker.com.

"The album is a real throwback to the kind of jazz duets that nobody of my generation really does anymore. I sing I Won't Dance with Donna McKechnie, who won the Tony for A Chorus Line. Of course, she's one of the greatest dancers of all times," says Baker.

For tickets to Hello Muddah, Hello Fadduh! call Ticketmaster at 416-872-1111, visit www.ticketmaster.ca or go to the New Yorker box office

Richler's stories summon up Montreal's Jewish community

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The late Mordecai Richler was a lively storyteller who was fond of reminiscing about his colourful boyhood and adulthood in Montreal, the multicultural city in which he was born and raised.

These pungent stories, some of which were broadcast on CBC radio years ago, summon up sentimental memories of Montreal's Jewish community.

Unfortunately, they have been virtually forgotten.

Thanks to Toronto-based Scenario Productions, they have been dredged from CBC's archives and remastered on two cassettes entitled Stories by Mordecai Richler.

Read by Lewis Negin, these stories and sketches brim with sardonic humour and reach back to the bygone era of the 1940s and 1950s.

Bennie, The War in Europe and Myerson's Daughter Bella turns on a psychologically disabled World War II vet whose traumas shape him and his mousey, club-footed new bride. The story is awash in sorrow and pathos.

In The War, Chaverim (Good Friends) and After, Richler nostalgically remembers his days in Habonim, the Zionist youth movement, and the diverse cast of characters he encountered in post-war Montreal. Notable among them were Blumberg, the Talmud Torah teacher and ardent Zionist, and Tansky, the shopkeeper whose faith in Communism burned brightly.

The upheaval brought on by the rise of Nazism in Germany and the outbreak of war in Europe is encapsulated in Bambinger. It's a poignant tale about a German Jewish refugee who has been torn from his family and the edgy relationship he has with a resentful boy in whose parents' house he lives as a boarder.

Circus Book, perhaps Richler's most accomplished story here, is set in 1954. He is 22 years old and has just returned from a two-year sojourn in Europe, where he has written his first novel, The Acrobats.

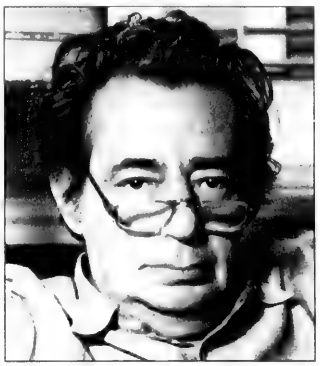
The manuscript is eventually published, but in the meantime, he must find gainful employment. Much to his disappointment, the novel is all but ignored by the media.

The Red Menace conjures up the period when some Canadian Jews were infatuated with Communism. Tansky is back again, trying to convert Richler into a Red. The spectre of Fred Rose, the Communist member of parliament, haunts the Jewish community. Danny, a fellow student, refuses to sing God Save the King. A stimulating story.

Richler, in Shooting the Breeze at St. Urbain, recalls Ziggy, the baseball pitcher who lasted but a year in the Texas minor leagues; Molly, the curvaceous secretary who raised eyebrows and adrenaline counts when she sauntered by; and Sugarman, the jailbird who deigned not to eat non-kosher meals in prison.

In this memorable piece, Richler also delights in describing the "circumscribed" world of St. Urbain Street, a microcosm of Montreal's immigrant community.

"Any dame is better than no dame." This sound advice comes from the lips of an alleged maven in Making it with the Chicks, a ribald yarn of adolescent sexual longing. Richler sets the tone when he recounts the trouble he got himself into by playing Hospital with a girl of his own age.



Mordecai Richler

Years later, Richler counts his lucky stars when Zelda, an Outremount knockout, agrees to go out on a date with him.

The "wisdom" dispensed in Making it with the Chicks runs the gamut from the theory that young Jewish ladies prefer guys with cars and that Japanese women and swinging hammocks are well worth watching.

The weakest stories in the collection are Mr. Sun, the First Citizen of the World, which revolves around a white-bearded "mystery man" in Paris; Sticking Together, in which Richler holds forth on Jewish clannishness; and E.G.C., a portrait of the theatre designer Edward Gordon Craig.

These weak links in the chain do not detract from the enjoyment a listener extracts from the better stories.

Business Profile

Software company manager a born salesman

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Jack Sebbag is a born salesman, the kind of guy, as the cliché goes, who could sell carpets to the Bedouin.

Well, maybe that's not the way the cliché goes – at least not in Canada – but were it not for a fortuitous decision by his parents when he was a child, the Casablanca-born executive might have embarked on that kind of career in his native Morocco.

"I could have had a whole new life selling carpets off a donkey," he says with a grin. "I thank my parents for coming to Canada."

The hours may be longer, but the pay is certainly better in his Canadian career, which is more 21st century than 15th.

Sebbag is vice-president and general manager of the Canadian office of Network Associates, the U.S.-based corporation that developed the anti-virus programs marketed under the McAfee brand.

He came to his position somewhat reluctantly, as it meant giving up most of the hands-on sales work he was most happy doing.

Instead he switched his focus from the micro to the macro, from closing the deal to "Canadianizing" the company's strategic vision developed in the United States and applying it north of the border.

McAfee, as most computerphiles will attest, along with Norton products, provides the most commonly used virus detection and security software. McAfee also offers "Sniffer Technologies" and "Magic Solutions" that are used to keep networks running and manage IT resources, respectively.

The company, headquartered in Santa Clara, Calif., maintains offices around the world, including Israel, and employs more than 3,800 people. Revenues in 2001 reached $834 million (US).

Like most other tech companies, its share price took a hit in 2002, dropping more than 30 per cent on the New York Stock Exchange. But the company's prospects are turning around, and in Canada, in particular, it is experiencing substantial growth, Sebbag said. The events of 9/11 proved a shock to many and increased interest in protective software.

"People went out to protect against cyberterrorism, against the Ninja and Code Red viruses," he said. The example of "Mafia Boy," the Montreal teenager who played havoc with the Internet, provided another boost to the company's core business, he said.

McAfee is one of the most used virus detectors

While Sebbag would not reveal revenue figures for Network Associates' Canadian operations – they can't be "broken out from the world," he said – he did say the company counts important blue chip corporations and governments in Canada among its client base.

"The majority of the banks, the federal government, Quebec, Ontario, Saskatchewan, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia" all do business with Network Associates, as do insurance companies and other big players, he said.

Norton's anti-virus product, produced by Symantec, provides the major competition for McAfee, but Sebbag maintains McAfee is particularly strong in the large-scale enterprise market, while Norton has a better grip on the retail sector.

But that may well change, he continued. McAfee is shifting its focus to the "SOHO" (small office, home office) market as well as the home user. It is coming out with a new easy-to-learn product featuring a colourful user interface.

Sebbag said he expects Canadians to take to the new product, as "Canada has been outgrowing the rest of the Network Associates world," exceeding revenue growth in the company's other 40 offices by at least 10 per cent.

To continue that trend, it's important to educate the market, Sebbag said. To that end, he attends trade shows, appears on television and radio and speaks to a variety of audiences. Early in the fall, he flew to British Columbia where he addressed the University of Victoria's business school.

It's a go-go job that perfectly suits Sebbag's temperament.

He readily admits he's a Type A personality who needs to keep busy. Nevertheless, when he was offered the job last spring, he hesitated before accepting it. Not only did he like what he was doing as the company's regional director of sales for Eastern Canada and the federal government – he increased revenue 55 per cent year over year – but he was not looking to disrupt his young family by moving to the company's office in Toronto.

When the option was presented to him of remaining in Montreal and doing business through conference calls, e-mails, and quick in-and-out visits, he felt able to accept the offer.

Jack Sebbag

What's more, the job still allows him to keep his hand in sales. He meets with his sales team in Toronto once a week, and though he's not as hands-on as he once was, he spends time with his regional directors to discuss sales and strategy.

Though only 40, Sebbag has been in sales for most of his adult life. Back in high school, he worked at three part-time jobs – at Pascal's, a hardware store; at a flea market on Sundays; and selling high school graduation rings.

'I love the feeling of a closed deal.'

"Making money was very important," he said. "I was spending a lot of it."

A graduate of McGill University, where he studied economics and union/management negotiations, he was steered to a different career by a counsellor at Jewish Vocational Services. Judging his personality, she suggested he try sales.

"She really changed my career," Sebbag acknowledged.

His first interview was with Computerland, a large U.S.-based chain. After two or three interviews, "I was sold on the idea to give it a shot." He went on to a lucrative 15-year career with the company and with System House and EDS Innovations, the two corporations that later acquired it. For more than 12 of those years, he "carried a bag," working the small towns of Quebec. With his Parisian accent and outgoing personality, he enjoyed good success.

"My forte was sales and I loved it. I love the feeling of closing the deal," he said.

Sebbag was eventually offered a position as Quebec regional sales director and for the last two years at EDS, he led a team of 18, including inside and outside sales representatives.

A headhunter eventually approached him with an opportunity to work at Network Associates. For 1½ years, he worked as regional director of sales and in April 2002, his predecessor, Gus Malezis, took an international position with the company. Sebbag stepped in, originally on a temporary basis, to fill the gap until a replacement was found. When the opportunity to work from Montreal was offered, he took the job full time.

Sebbag's career objective had evolved to the desire to run a large organization. "I saw the opportunity to not limit myself to one territory and have a large area where I could have an impact on a much larger number of customers."

Far more than he ever would have selling carpets off a donkey.

Israel's triple failure

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

Analysis

Israel has failed miserably in its military confrontation with the Palestinians.

It has done so on three counts. The first failure is Israel's inability, over the past two years, to halt the transfer of money that fuels Palestinian terror. The second failure is Israel's inability to put a stop to the massive smuggling of arms and ammunition into the territories controlled by the Palestinian Authority (PA). The third failure, and perhaps the most serious, is Israel's inability to block the shipment of chemicals from Israel to the territories, which are used to produce explosives that end up killing hundreds of Israelis.

As this is an overall and ongoing systemic failure, we cannot allow ourselves to accept the excuses of evasive spokesmen. The Knesset Foreign Affairs and Defense Committee should be called in to investigate.

The transfer of funding also includes money from Iraq, Iran and Syria, not to mention the Saudi largesse that reaches Hamas. In the case of the first three countries, the money not only goes into the pockets of the families of suicide bombers, but also into the coffers of Islamic Jihad, sometimes as a reward for terrorist operations. The money from donor countries and Israel's debts to the PA goes into the Palestinian treasury and then, on PA President Yasser Arafat's orders, pays the salaries of the Tanzim.

A substantial portion of this money is transferred through legal channels in Israel, and also involves Jordanian banks. It took a long time for the cabinet to issue instructions to the Bank of Israel regarding the need for transparency when dealing with suspicious accounts. It is doubtful that the flow of money to the PA can be halted completely, but much more can be done to block the money intended for terror organizations.

In the war on arms smuggling, there have been some successes: the capture of the Karine-A munitions ship, for example, in which Israeli intelligence was able to prove a link to Arafat and his cronies. When the armed struggle began, Israel estimated that the weapons and ammunition in the arsenal of the PA would run out within a few months. The siege was tightened, but new shipments of arms continued to reach the Palestinians. Until now, all efforts to seal the Egyptian border hermetically against such smuggling have failed. The price of an American-made M-16 rifle and six cartridge clips can go as high as NIS 18,000 but when prices in Gaza drop, it's a sign a new shipment has arrived.

It took over a year, for example, for Israel to realize the Palestinians were exploiting the absence of an effective X-ray machine at the Adam Bridge. Large quantities of arms and explosives reached the West Bank as a result of this lapse in security, which has since been rectified.

No less worrying is that some of these arms reach the terror organizations by way of criminal gangs, Jewish and Arab, operating in Israel. There have been cases of weapons being stolen from IDF warehouses. Considering the gravity of such an offense, the penalties are ridiculous.

Worst of all is the smuggling of chemicals used to manufacture explosive devices. To think that these substances fall into the hands of suicide bombers who are out to murder hundreds of Israelis is frightening

Cross country runner stumbles in big race

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

Long-time University of Western Ontario coach Bob Vigars says he didn't do a good job of calming down Ashley Korman prior to the first-year runner's debut at the recent Canadian university cross-country championships.

The seven-time national women's cross country coach of the year admits he should have known better after she started asking questions about what it would take to be Canadian rookie of the year.

Korman had two weeks to think about it after being named the Ontario University Athletics' (OUA) top rookie in late October, leading up to the Canadian Interuniversity Sport (CIS) championships that Western hosted on the Thames Valley Golf Course.

"She had a great year, but at the CI's, she had a brain cramp," said Vigars, indicating nerves and the huge crowd numbering close to 3,000 watching the 5-kilometre competition played a big factor in her performance. "She put too much pressure on herself and didn't have a good race."

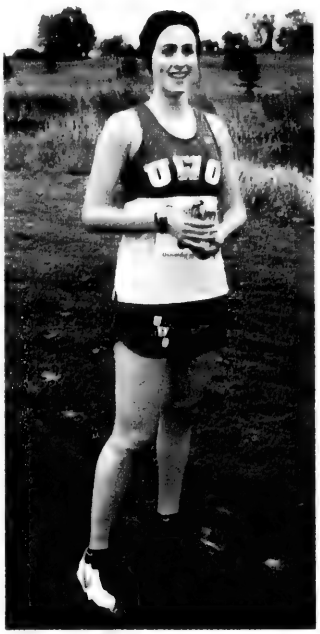
The 19-year-old visual arts student concluded her season the following weekend with a strong run for her North York club, placing ninth at the Ontario Cross Country Championships held at the Hamilton Olympic Club.

Korman plans to run for Western's indoor track team over the winter at distances of 800, 1,000, and 1,500 metres, trying to put her cross-country implosion behind her.

"Ashley just kind of blew up early in the race," Vigars said of Korman, his team's number 2 runner for most of the season.

"She ran out of gas before the 2K mark and that's nothing for her. She didn't know what it was, but I'm 35 years in coaching and quite aware of those situations."

Vigars' credentials include coaching the track and field team at the 1981 Maccabiah Games. He says it was a marvelous experience and, as a Gentile, quite an honour to attend. Vigars keeps the commemorative medal from that competition on a shelf in his office.



He said he was amazed at what Korman accomplished in her first year, without having been recruited for the team.

"She had such a great attitude about things," he said. "I was surprised she did as well as she did."

Korman credits her success this season to training with a team for the first time and with intense practices at the university level.

The 5-8, 128-lb. Thornhill resident has been involved in the sport for the past decade. She runs an average of more than 10 kilometres a day and lifts weights three times a week as part of her endurance training.

"I like the competition and it gives me something to do with my time," Korman said in a telephone interview from her campus residence in London. "It keeps me healthy and in good shape."

OUA top rookie Ashley Korman was having a great year until her final race.

She found it very uncomfortable, however, to talk about what went wrong when she fell and momentarily quit in the midst of the year's biggest meet.

"My brother made me get up and finish the race," said Korman, who placed well back at 102nd overall (with a time of 21:07) and last on the sixth-place Mustangs team, which might have medaled had she run up to her potential.

"He told me it would feel more special to finish it even though I wouldn't finish very well, rather than just walk away from the race."

About Teens

Dear Karilani,

At my school, a lot of students and teachers are very anti-Israel. I feel uncomfortable stating my beliefs because I am afraid that people will hold them against me. The people who are anti-Israel are very vocal, and I feel that they are disguising anti-Semitism as anti-Zionism. I also feel that they are uninformed about the conflict and are just reacting to what they have heard from other people. How can I stop this?

Concerned

Dear Concerned,

We all know that Israel is experiencing very difficult times right now, and that is why we must make sure not to let people bad-mouth the country. It's important that you speak up. You may not feel comfortable taking on a whole group of other students when you're all by yourself, so try to make sure you're always with a pro-Israel friend whenever you think a Mideast discussion might occur. Make sure you're well-armed with the facts about the conflict – you can refute any argument if you know enough about Israeli history and politics. You'll be surprised at how much a barrage of facts can accomplish.

As for teachers, it is not their place to be expressing their opinions on this issue when students are around, and you should let them know that it makes you uncomfortable. Of course, they are your teachers, so don't be too pushy or angry. Just go up to them discreetly after class and politely say, "You know, I really feel that your view is one-sided, and I'm not comfortable with you expressing it in class because it influences other students."

Chances are, you won't have a problem again. You probably won't have too much of a problem with other students either, if you argue with them once or twice. Just make sure you're not overly aggressive, and be sensitive to your environment – if you feel like the people you're talking to are just arguing for the sake of bashing Israel and Jews, or if you suspect they might get violent, then it's absolutely not worth it. Instead, go to the school administration.

Good luck!

Dear Karilani is written on a rotating basis by three high school students. The drawing is a composite. We welcome questions from our readers. Please mail, e-mail or fax them to The CJN.

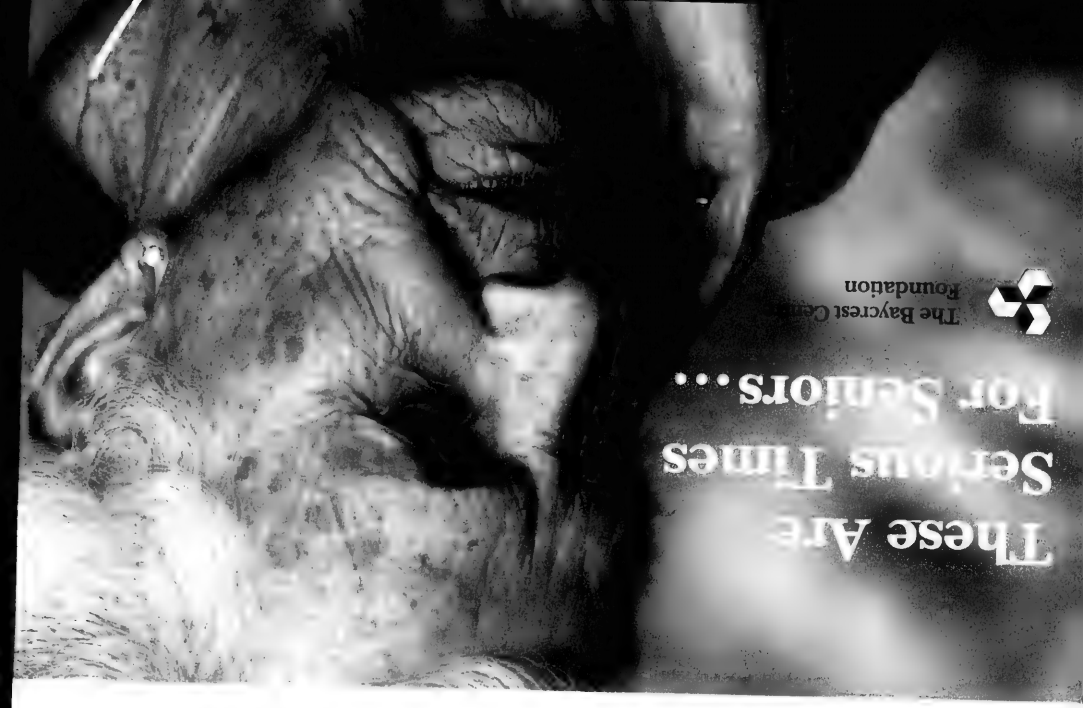
Help Baycrest Meet The Challenge

For 84 years, Baycrest has been the jewel in the crown of a community that respects and cares for its seniors. Today, Baycrest is home to more than 1,000 people, serves more than 2,500 seniors daily and touches the lives of more than 35,000 members of our community every year. If it hasn't already, it will likely touch you – directly, or through your parents, grandparents, relatives, or friends.

Baycrest is the community's trusted source on aging.

But now, government cutbacks in funding for long-term care facilities have resulted in the loss of $6-million annually for our Home for the Aged. This is a serious financial blow that has forced Baycrest to seek community support in a significant way. Without this support, our standard of excellence is at risk.

Only YOU can help... there is no other source of funding!



Baycrest... So much more than a Home for the Aged!

These are just a few of our jewels:

Apotex Centre, Jewish Home for the Aged
Baycrest Home Care Services
Baycrest Hospital – The Ben & Hilda Katz Building
Baycrest Terrace--Supportive Housing and Assisted Living
Elm Ridge Group Living Residence
Joseph E. & Minnie Wagman Centre – Community Centre
The Ben & Hilda Katz Centre for Gerontological Social Work
The Sydney & Florence Cooper Dept. of Rehabilitation
Kunin-Lunenfeld Applied Research Unit
Louis & Leah Posluns Centre for Stroke & Cognition
Samuel Lunenfeld Mountainview Special Day Care Program
Reuben & Helene Dennis Ambulatory Clinics
The Rotman Research Institute
Saul & Rae Saltzman Day Treatment Centre
Two Neptune Drive – Independent Living Condominium

For more information on how you can support Baycrest, call 416-785-2500, ext. 8 or visit our Web site at www.baycrest.org

Baycrest thanks participants in its Corporate Partners Program for their generous support that helps make so many initiatives possible.

APOTEX INC. DANIER Pfizer RICHTER RIOCAN TD Securities

Baycrest has already made extremely difficult staff and program reductions. Further cuts cannot be tolerated, and we must turn to you for your support in our effort to raise the funds necessary to offset government reductions.

Last year, nearly one out of every two people approached responded with a contribution. Amazingly, this included 500 gifts of $1,000 or more including 65 gifts of $10,000 or more. This gratifying response demonstrates the special place Baycrest holds in the heart of the community.

Now Baycrest needs you. Serious times demand serious action. Every gift at every level is important. Together, we must make certain Baycrest remains strong today and into the future.

This is your opportunity to make a difference. Please respond generously.

Better Care!

At the core of Baycrest's mission is compassionate care – care that makes the qualitative difference in the lives of seniors.

Better Applied Research...

The Kunin-Lunenfeld Applied Research Unit applies basic research findings to real-life settings in order to continuously improve client care and treatment programs.

Better Science...

Baycrest's Rotman Research Institute is a leader in research affecting the aging brain. With some of the most renowned scientists in the field, it has been ranked among the top 5 facilities of its kind in the world.

Baycrest will help meet the growing demands of our aging population and fight debilitating diseases through the integration of care, research and education.

4 out of every 10 people, aged 80 or over, suffer some form of dementia such as Alzheimer's.

Our seniors deserve the best. You can help make sure they get it.

Hillel promises to fight Concordia Student Union ban

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Hillel had its funding and right to hold activities on campus suspended last week by the Concordia Student Union (CSU) for distributing flyers about Mahal, a program that allows young Jews from abroad to serve in the Israel Defence Forces (IDF) for 18 months.

As The CJN went to press, the CSU had reportedly rescinded the decision, but a Hillel spokesperson said it had not been contacted by the student union and had no statement to make.

Hillel has sent a letter to the CSU warning that it will take it to court if the suspension is not lifted. Lawyer Michael Bergman says the CSU did not follow proper procedures in adopting the resolution to suspend Hillel and that the suspension is a violation of Jewish students' constitutional rights of speech, assembly and religion.

World Jewry numbers decline

By YAIR SHELEG
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The number of Jews in the world is declining and there has been a net loss of 300,000 American Jews in the last decade, according to a new study that comes after a preliminary examination of the recent census of American Jewry.

According to the Jewish Agency's Institute for Jewish People Policy Planning, which convened an emergency session last week to deal with what it called a "demographic crisis," there are now some 12.9 million Jews in the world.

Demographic crisis

Earlier this year, estimates put the number at 13.2 million.

The main reason for the decline comes from data in the census of American Jewish communities, which shows that the number of American Jews has dropped by 300,000 during the 1990s, from 5.5 million in 1990 to 5.2 million in 2002.

Experts say some 300,000 Jews came to the United States during the 1990s, but, nonetheless, the community lost some 50,000 Jews a year during that 12-year period, mostly to natural attrition.

CANADA

Another Advisory

OTTAWA — The Department of Foreign Affairs and Trade last month renewed an advisory issued over the summer that urges Canadians to defer all tourist travel to Israel, the West Bank and Gaza.

ROM Dating Switch

TORONTO — The Royal Ontario Museum has abandoned the use of BC and AD to mark calendar years on its exhibits in order "to be more inclusive," its director of collections, Dan Rahimi, told the National Post last week. BCE, an acronym for "before the common era," replaces BC, which stands for "before Christ," while CE, for "common era," referring to the years after Jesus' birth, replaces AD, which stands for the Latin "anno Domini," meaning "year of the Lord." The first exhibit to use the new system is the James ossuary, which is believed to have contained the bones of Jesus's brother James.

ISRAEL

More Transit Security

JERUSALEM — Israel's Transportation Ministry has hired some 450 former combat soldiers to safeguard public transportation as part of efforts to prevent further Palestinian terror attacks.

PA Leaders Criticized

JERUSALEM — Jailed Palestinian militia leader Marwan Barghouti has called for a change in Palestinian leadership. "It is time for many of the Palestinian leaders and officials to leave their positions after failing in their roles and responsibilities in this decisive battle" against Israel, he told Associated Press in a written response to questions. Barghouti did not mention Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat by name, nor did he condemn the violence of the intifadah, as some Palestinian officials recently have. Barghouti is on trial in Israel for alleged involvement in terror attacks.

More Female Fighters?

JERUSALEM — Israel is reportedly planning to increase the number of female soldiers in combat units. The military is creating brochures to send to young women about to be drafted suggesting they volunteer for combat units, Ha'aretz has reported. Most of the new recruits will be sent to positions along the "seam line" separating Israel from the West Bank. Most women now in combat units serve in infantry units along the Egyptian and Jordanian borders.

Envoy Censured

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Foreign Minister Benjamin Netanyahu last week censured Yehuda Lancry, Israel's ambassador to the United Nations, saying they hadn't approved his recent remarks that Israel accepts the principle of a Palestinian state as the basis for peace with the Palestinians. Netanyahu said he intends to probe the matter.

WORLD

Cemetery Vandalized

LONDON — Vandals spray-painted red swastikas late last month on all 13 Jewish gravestones in a cemetery in Milton Keynes, a town near London. The graffiti were removed after the city council had the stones cleaned, community leaders said. It was the sixth such desecration of a Jewish cemetery in Britain this year.

Greek Anti-Semitism

ATHENS — Anti-Semitism is on the rise in Greece, according to a new report from the Greek Helsinki Monitor, a non-governmental organization affiliated with the International Helsinki Federation for Human Rights. Since the start of the second intifadah more than two years ago, "blatant anti-Semitism" has been expressed in the Greek media "by a spectrum of influential personalities in politics, labour, education and culture," it said.

Aussie Anti-Semitism

SYDNEY — The number of anti-Semitic incidents in Australia has risen dramatically, according to the Executive Council of Australian Jewry. In the year ending Sept. 30, 593 incidents were reported, up from 362 the previous year. They included arson attempts, assaults, harassment and threatening phone calls.

Haggadah Displayed

SARAJEVO — The 14th-century Sarajevo Haggadah was put on display last week in a secure, climate-controlled room in the Sarajevo National Museum. The famed manuscript was restored last year in part with funding from a United Nations campaign.

Menorah Allowed

WASHINGTON, D.C. — A U.S. Supreme Court ruling issued just before Chanukah said Cincinnati city officials could not ban Chabad of Southern Ohio from putting a menorah in downtown Fountain Square. The city's lawyers had argued that letting private groups erect unattended displays would make it hard to keep order in the square. But Chabad argued the ordinance violates the First Amendment guarantee of free speech.

S. African March Glorifies Suicide Bombers

CAPE TOWN — The South African Jewish Board of Deputies is considering filing charges against organizers of a march here late last month that included boys dressed as Muslim suicide bombers, some even wearing mock dynamite sticks strapped to their chests.

The march, arranged by the radical Muslim group Kibla to show solidarity with Palestinians "under Israeli occupation," coincided with the anniversary of the 1947 United Nations partition resolution that led to the birth of the State of Israel.

Two youths in the march wore Hezbollah headbands, followed by eight other young people with mock weapons. They led more than 300 protesters from a mosque near downtown Cape Town to the U.S. Consulate, about a mile away.

The children, some as young as seven, carried placards stating: "Death to America, death to Israel." Marchers shouted, "One American, one bullet," echoing an apartheid-era slogan referring to whites: "one settler, one bullet."

Organizers asked protesters to stop chanting the slogans.

Imam Gassan Solomon of the more moderate Muslim Judicial Council said Muslims "are duty bound to condemn terrorism." He said it's irresponsible to expose children to such a march, but added the march and its message are symptoms of a bigger problem that needs to be recognized.

Palestinian texts portray Israel as foreign entity

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Palestinian school texts as well as final examinations continue to present Jews and Israel in a negative light, says Arnon Groiss, the author of the latest report issued by the Center for Monitoring the Impact of Peace.

The centre, which has systematically studied schools in the Palestinian Authority (PA) since 1998, is a non-governmental organization based in New York state.

For its most recent report, dated October 2002, the centre examined 14 books published by the PA in 2001 and 2002 for Grades 1, 2, 6, 7 and 11.

The centre also scrutinized 16 high school exams from 2000 and 2002.

The books surveyed do not provide objective information about Jews, but they mention supposedly Jewish traits such as trickery, greed and barbarity, the centre found.

The texts also insinuate that Jews do not honour agreements and treaties, as Muslims do.

In the newest books, negative references touch on the relations of Jews with Jesus and on the Torah.

(Mathematics, Grade 2, part 2, (2002) p. 18)

"Activity: Let us color the Negev desert on the map of Palestine."
(National Education, Grade 2, part 2, (2001)p. 28)

A Grade 2 book entitled Christian Education says, "Pilate ordered Jesus to be flagellated, perhaps the Jews may be content with that, but they cried 'crucify him, crucify him.'"

In a high school exam, students are asked why Europeans persecuted Jews. There are four possible answers, two of which state:

"The Torah is full of many passages that strengthen the Jews' inclination for religious and racial fanaticism [and] inspire a spirit of malice toward the other nations…"

"The Jews' sense of racial, religious, cultural and political superiority, and their interaction with the peoples of the world basing on that sense, was an important reason for their persecution by the peoples of the world."

In the new books, Israel is not recognized as a sovereign state but portrayed as a foreign entity imposed on the Palestinians in 1948, the year of Israeli statehood, the centre found.

As well, Israel itself is perceived as a source of aggression, death and destruction to the Palestinians, especially Palestinian refugees.

Israel's name does not appear on any maps. Nor do any towns established by Jews in modern times, such as Tel Aviv.

Four Israeli cities – Haifa, Acre, Safed and Jaffa – are presented as Palestinian.

And in a grade two book, National Education, a passage suggests that the Negev does not rightfully belong to Israel: "Let us colour the Negev desert on the map of Palestine."

In an Islamic education final exam, students are asked to

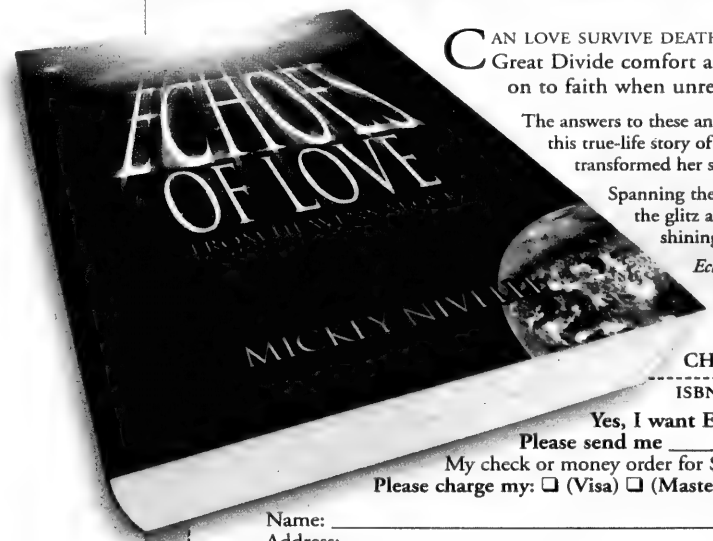
AN INSPIRING TRUE STORY OF ETERNAL LOVE



CAN LOVE SURVIVE DEATH? Do the voices of those who cross the Great Divide comfort and guide the living? How does one hold on to faith when unrelenting hatred and evil assail one's life?

The answers to these and other pertinent questions are illuminated in this true-life story of Lotte, a German-born Jewish woman, who transformed her suffering into spiritual enlightenment.

Spanning the most terrifying period of human history, to the glitz and glamour of show business, this book is a shining testament to the power of love and faith.

Echoes of Love From Heavens Above is a poetic treasure and a rich resource for readers on a journey of personal and spiritual growth.

A visit to Germany (4)

From the editor's desk

The walk from Raschihaus and the synagogue in the northern part of the old city of Worms, due south and west to the Jewish cemetery that lies just outside the walls of the old city, is not more than 10 minutes at a slow leisurely pace.

But as one strolls there, in the company of a courteous, articulate guide, expert in the Jewish history of the city, the thought is inescapable that apart from Shabbat, there was probably not very much that was leisurely about the pace and nature of life of the Jews of the town through the ages.

The fact that Rashi lived in Worms for five years in the mid-11th century drew Jewish scholars there like a seismic magnet, pulling them and their families from far and wide to settle in the community. The presence of these scholars in turn attracted other Jews to Worms and the Rhine River, on whose bank the city rests. The river was the highway for commerce and for carrying news to and from the heartland of central Europe.

The cemetery of Worms, therefore, was a deeply descriptive, though silent testimony to the span and richness of the city's once-upon-a-time Jewish life. Founded in 1034, the cemetery is said to be the oldest known Jewish cemetery in Europe. The first burial there was recorded in 1076, merely two decades before – although the townspeople did not know it then – the driving Crusader hordes, on their way to the Holy Land, would slash through the Jews of Worms and their co-religionists along the Rhine, like a sharp scythe slicing through tall dry grass.

The Hebrew inscriptions are clearly visible on all the headstones and are legible on most of them. The names, the occupations, the family connections – in some cases, even the origins of their arrival to the area – are precious pieces of information that mesh in poignant, lachrymose detail to tell the magisterial tale of some 850 years of German Jewish life in that city.

The much-revered Rabbi Meir of Rothenburg is buried there. In 1286, he was arrested and held captive by the corrupt local authorities who saw an opportunity to extort a handsome payment from the local Jews to secure the release of their beloved rabbi. But Rabbi Meir refused to allow his co-religionists to pay the ransom, lest it encourage the malign practice and thus jeopardize other Jews. As a result, Rabbi Meir died in jail in 1293. But even after his sorrowful, lonely death, the authorities would not surrender his body for burial.

Fourteen years later, in 1307, Frankfurt businessman Alexander ben Salomon Wimpfen gave up his entire fortune to finally redeem the rabbi's body. A short time after that melancholy transaction, Wimpfen also passed away. The two saintly men are buried side by side, their headstones among the first a visitor sees as he walks through the cemetery gates. The cemetery was closed in 1911.

During my few days in Germany, I also visited the old Jewish cemetery in Frankfurt, which forms part of a three-part complex of Jewish history along with the Museum of the Judengasse and the community's Holocaust memorial at Neuer Borneplatz. The Holocaust memorial, a stark arrangement of 11,000 blocks on which are inscribed the names of Frankfurt Jews who were deported and murdered during World War II, is actually intertwined with the cemetery: the blocks are embedded in the cemetery's outer wall.

Most of my observations about the sites I saw in Germany cannot be accommodated in this space. But, as this is the last column I dedicate to those observations, I do want to record some thoughts on the Judisches Museum Berlin (Jewish Museum Berlin).

The museum is as much a declarative statement as it is an architectural structure. Since its opening on Sept. 9, 2001, more than 2,000 people have visited it each day.

It is an imposing, sharply-angled building of linear motion and jagged movement with an exterior of "stretched" stainless steel that rises from the ground like a many-sided, mega-mirror, a luminescent testament to modern Germany's determination to refract and reflect light back onto the mass murder of European Jewry.

The museum's structure, designed by architect Daniel Libeskind, performs a double function. It houses the numerous displays, exhibitions and archives depicting two millennia of German Jewish life in a manner typical of most conventional museums. In addition, certain spaces are themselves the very symbol and the display, in much the same way, for example, that the Children's Memorial at Yad Vashem in Jerusalem is itself the symbol and the display intended to challenge the visitor.

The visitor's very first step into the museum is laden with symbolic significance. The building can only be entered by passing through the adjacent baroque Kollegienhaus, to make the unambiguous point that the new can only be understood by passing through the old.

Visitors descend a staircase from the Kollegienhaus deep into the museum, into a labyrinth of rising and tilting axes. The entrance leads to three lines of exploration: The Axis of Continuity, from which the Axis of Exile and the Axis of Holocaust branch off. At the intersection of these axes are the unique, specifically designated spaces, or Voids as Libeskind has called them, that rise vertically through the entire museum, in which the visitor is confronted, only, with the stirrings of his own heart.

One of the purposes of my trip was to better understand my own place in the long, infinite line of Jewish time and peoplehood that coursed through Jewish wandering and disaster in Europe to rerooting and rebirth in Israel and further wandering and settlement to the Diaspora. I have a great deal more to see and to understand.

CJC blames PM for delay in banning Hezbollah

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Along with Foreign Minister Bill Graham, Prime Minister Jean Chrétien is "holding things up" in the effort to outlaw the activities of Hezbollah in this country, charges the president of Canadian Jewish Congress.

Keith Landy told The CJN last week there "seems to be a split at the cabinet table" on whether to ban the activities of all of Hezbollah, not just its military wing.

"It's Graham versus the rest," Landy speculated. Asked where he feels Chrétien stands, Landy said, "I think he's holding things up. There's realpolitik at work" relating to Canada's efforts to upgrade bilateral relations with Lebanon, a fellow member of the Francophonie.

The Liberals have come under intense pressure recently from fellow and opposition MPs and Jewish groups to ban all of Hezbollah's activities in Canada.

Last month, Canada added six radical Islamic groups to its list of 13 banned terrorist organizations, but failed to include Hezbollah by again citing a distinction between the organization's military wing and its humanitarian arm.

Pressure to ban all of Hezbollah's activities intensified last week after an address on Lebanese television by Sheikh Hassan Nasrallah in which he reportedly urged that suicide attacks "should be exported outside Palestine. I encourage Palestinians to take suicide bombings worldwide. Don't be shy about it."

According to the Washington Times, Nasrallah repeated the message in a second speech, telling gun-toting commandos that "we will act everywhere around the world" if the Al-Aqsa mosque in Jerusalem is damaged.

Calls to the Prime Minister's Office were referred to Graham's office.

Spokesperson Isabelle Savard refused to comment on cabinet discussion of the issue, but she said Graham's comments to reporters last week, in which he strongly condemned Nasrallah's remarks and said Ottawa is considering a complete ban on the Lebanese-based Muslim group, show "he's following the situation" as it evolves.

"Hezbollah as an entity clearly is indicating that it does not intend to be governed by the rules of civilized conduct," Graham told reporters. "The last statement by the leader of Hezbollah is clearly an indication his party is advocating a form of conduct which we do not approve and would be contributing to global terrorism."

After the revised terror list was unveiled last month, B'nai Brith Canada announced it's suing the government to force cabinet to place all of Hezbollah on Canada's list of "Terrorist Entities" whose assets must be frozen.

Landy said "while it's commendable that Canada is playing a role to help Lebanon return to democracy, these things come with a price, and one of the prices is not taking steps against Hezbollah."

Hezbollah, the Iran-backed Party of God, has 12 seats in the Lebanese parliament and is a prominent political and social force in the country. A foreign affairs spokesperson in Ottawa was quoted last week as saying Hezbollah is "a significant political party in Lebanon."

Ottawa committed new aid to Lebanon after the Francophonie summit this fall in Beirut, after which Chrétien was excoriated for speaking to an audience of dignitaries that included Hezbollah's leader Nasrallah.

In a Nov. 7 handwritten note to Landy, released to The CJN, Chrétien said he "worked very hard to make sure this meeting in Beirut did not turn into another Durban," referring to last year's UN-sponsored anti-racism summit in Durban, South Africa, which saw several days of Israel-bashing and overt anti-Semitism.

Landy suggested one way to pressure Chrétien on Hezbollah: "I think he has to be embarrassed. I think if he sees Canada standing alone among nations in the outlawing of all of Hezbollah's activities, he'll be embarrassed."

Published reports in Canada last week said Ottawa will eventually outlaw Hezbollah, but that a decision to do so could take several more weeks because of ongoing investigations into the group's intelligence activities.

Opposition foreign affairs critic Stockwell Day seized on Nasrallah's remarks, telling the House of Commons that "it is crystal clear Hezbollah is committed to attacks beyond Israel and on to western countries."

In his response, solicitor-general Wayne Easter left the door open to eventually banning Hezbollah, saying, "we have to make our decisions based on the facts. It is spelled out very clearly that we must take into consideration the criminal and the security intelligence reports. That is what we will do, and we will come forward with other listings in the future."

Easter assured MPs Canada won't be a base for future terrorist acts involving Hezbollah.

National Revenue Minister Elinor Caplan, whose Thornhill riding has a large Jewish population, has reportedly been working to have Hezbollah added to the terrorist list. She declined comment last week, saying, "I will have my say at the cabinet table."

Mount Royal MP Irwin Cotler, an outspoken critic of his government on this issue, said he will soon present "clear and unmistakable" evidence to Graham and Easter of a link between Hezbollah and the Al Qaeda terror network. He said not listing Hezbollah is "inexplicable" and "unacceptable," and "an affront to the diplomatic, moral and financial war against terrorism."

In a Dec. 2 letter to Chrétien, Landy said "Canada is making a serious error in adhering to the untenable notion that Hezbollah comprises autonomous military and civilian component organizations subject to differential treatment under Canadian law and policy. Hezbollah must rather be regarded as a single house with different rooms under the same roof, all to be dealt with in exactly the same fashion."

Last year, Ottawa put Hezbollah's military arm on a list of groups whose assets are subject to seizure. In adding Hamas to the list of banned groups last month, Ottawa concluded money donated to social charities operated by Hamas had "leaked to the terrorist apparatus," which apparently distinguishes it from Hezbollah.

"Housewife reports astounding 85 lb. weight loss!"

My name is Carol Hooper. I'm a housewife and part-time personal care giver. I lost 85 pounds. It was effortless! I went from a baggy XXL to a petite size six. This is my story.

Carol Hooper Before Hypnosis

I was overweight nearly my entire life. Everything revolved around food. I was obsessed. It was like an alien took over my brain. I couldn't control it. I spent the majority of my life living to eat.

Carrying an extra 85 pounds is a lot of work. I was always tired. One or two naps a day was my normal routine. I looked for excuses to stay home. I spent a lot of time in bed.

The truth is I was hiding. There's no way I could be happy like that. I was heavy, miserable and uncomfortable. Confidence was nil.

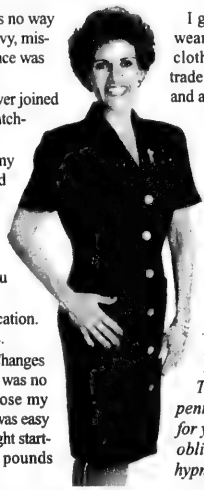
My weight embarrassed me. I never joined athletic events. I was a spectator watching life go by.

I tried everything to lose my weight. I choked down pre-packaged food and chalky shakes. I counted, weighed, measured and starved. I've done all the weird diets. The grapefruit, high protein, low fat, to name a few. Every crazy diet you can think of, I tried it.

I lost my weight once with medication. I gained it all back plus 70 pounds.

[When I finally visited Positive Changes Hypnosis], I was impressed. There was no pressure. To be honest, I didn't lose my weight right away. I didn't mind. It was easy to stay motivated. Suddenly the weight started dropping off me. The last 55 pounds melted away in five short months.

I recently saw my doctor. She asked me how I lost the weight. She will be recommending Positive Changes Hypnosis to her patients.



Carol Hooper After Hypnosis

I get compliments galore. I'm wearing a lot of my daughter's clothes. She's 15 years old. We trade back and forth. I feel young and alive.

I started a business. It's taken off for me. I know the next half of my life will be great. No extra baggage.

I recommend Positive Changes Hypnosis to everyone. I'm living testimony. Hypnosis works!

Overweight hurts. I know. I was there. Don't let past failures stand in the way of your happiness. Call Positive Changes Hypnosis. They won't charge you a penny to find out if hypnosis is for you. There's no pressure. No obligation. If they don't think hypnosis is right for you, they'll tell you so. Don't be left to wonder what might have been . . . Pick up the phone and call now.

Jewish relations with left 'in worse shape than ever'

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

U.S. Jewry's longstanding relationship with the American left has been badly frayed in the past two years, the editor of The New Republic said here recently.

"It's not over, but it's in worse shape than ever," Peter Beinart told a forum at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am synagogue sponsored by the Canada-Israel Committee and Israel Now.

Calling himself a "passionate believer in the possibilities" of that relationship, Beinart described it as being "on the rocks," and conceded he feels betrayed by the turn of events.

Throughout the 1990s, he said, Jews and the left shared values and policy positions, from gay and women's rights to the need to maintain the separation of church and state.

In addition, Jews felt comfortable with the left because of similar views on globalization and Israel's peace process with the Palestinians.

Beinart did not spell out his definition of the left, but he said the left and American Jewry parted ways after the Sept. 11, 2001 terror attacks in New York City and Washington, D.C.

In the wake of these incidents, the left embraced the belief that global problems are caused by U.S. imperialism and its oppression of the Third World, he said.

To the left, Israel is an "obvious, obnoxious" extension of U.S. imperialism, "the great sin of our time." By contrast, Muslims are regarded as diehard opponents of American power, Beinart said.

The left champions the current divestment campaign against Israel because leftists equate Israel with apartheid South Africa. And while the left does not condone Palestinian suicide bombers, it supports the Palestinians' struggle to end Israel's occupation of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, he said.

More than that, Beinart added, the left is now in favour of a one-state rather than a two-state solution to the Arab-Israeli conflict.

The left's preoccupation with imperialism is such that it overlooks an important fact. Israel, rather than the Palestinian Authority or Arab states, is an exemplar of left-wing principles, from freedom of speech and religion to women's rights.

"I don't take any pleasure from this," said Beinart, expressing the hope that the left will return to its "better traditions."

Castigating its myopia, Beinart said the left has to understand that Israelis have deep historical roots in the Middle East and are not "colonial settlers," like the French in Algeria.

And, he added, the left should understand that widespread support of suicide bombings among Palestinians means that something is not right in the Palestinian body politic.

Since Sept. 11, there has also been a major change in how American Jews relate to the Republican party and the Christian right, he observed.

For years, the vast majority of Jews voted for the Democratic party because they felt ill at ease with the Republicans, which he described as "the country club you didn't go to."

Before Sept. 11, Beinart said, the Republican party was composed of three factions – the isolationists, who were associated with anti-Israel media commentator Patrick Buchanan; the realists, who were identified with the first Bush administration; and the neo-conservatives, the weakest faction, who believe the U.S. has to be engaged in a constant ideological struggle to promote democratic values abroad.

On Sept. 11, the isolationist faction disappeared, while the neo-conservatives morphed into the most dominant wing of the party, he claimed.

Neo-conservatives, Beinart said, are inextricably linked with such Jewish public figures as Paul Wolfowitz, the U.S. deputy secretary of defence; Richard Perle, a former high-ranking official in the Reagan administration, and William Kristol, the editor of The Weekly Standard.

As a result of this seismic political shift, American Jews now "feel at home" in the Republican party, he said.

As for the Christian right, Jews no longer see it as the "central enemy" due to its ardent support of Israel.

Beinart acknowledged that many Jews are "flabbergasted" by this phenomenon and are still struggling to understand it.

To evangelical Christians, he said, Israel's right to exist in peace and security is fundamental and an extremely important issue in their agenda.

The flip side is that some evangelical Christians tend to idealize Jews and are disappointed to learn most American Jews live secular lives, he said.

Group fights for equal rights for Israel's Arab citizens

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

For the past two years, Israeli grassroots movements have increased their pursuit of equal rights for Arab citizens, says Sikkuy co-director Shalom (Shuli) Dichter.

Sikkuy, the Association for the Advancement of Civic Equality, is a non-partisan NGO created in 1991. The members of the Jewish-Arab advocacy organization follow government budgets, resource allocations and land usage policies, and then develop strategies to deal with the system's inequities.

Shuli Dichter

Since the creation of the State of Israel, Arab towns and villages have had less access and enjoy a smaller proportion of the state's resources than their Jewish counterparts, Dichter told a small group in Toronto recently.

Dichter described small villages without basic water services and said disparities exist within the same cities – Jews of Nazareth, Lod or Ramla benefit from a higher proportion of city budgets than do Palestinian Arab residents.

Dichter referred to Israeli Arabs as Palestinian Arabs, saying they refer to themselves that way.

Sikkuy hopes to reverse this trend by informing Israelis of the inequities that exist in the system so that no one can hide behind a claim of ignorance. Dichter spoke about the importance of "mainstreaming" the search "for civic equality between the Jewish and Arab citizens of Israel" because it is the general Jewish voter who initiates changes in government policies.

Public discourse on these issues is having a huge impact in Israel. Heads of municipalities are listening to mainstream Israelis who became disillusioned after October 2000 when 13 Arab citizens were killed by police during a two-week period of demonstrations and riots, he said.

The notion of peaceful coexistence has become more urgent, Dichter said, and more Israelis recognize that adults must become involved in the quest for equality. Until now, it was assumed that encounters between Arab and Israeli students and teachers would bring future resolution of these issues.

However, we now realize "it was wrong to make the children the meeting point for Palestinians and Israelis and load them with the responsibility" of creating change, Dichter said.

Israelis and Jews are now becoming more active and it's making a difference, he said, pointing to the western Galilean area of Misgav as an example of a "bottom-up" approach in which Jewish citizens groups have advanced civic equality on the local level.

The regional municipality of Misgav includes 10,000 Jews and 5,000 Bedouin Arabs, some of whom live in shacks. Dichter said local Jewish activists work together with Sikkuy to raise awareness and hold public meetings every six weeks, speaking out and distributing flyers. The group then follows up by advocating for change in the allocation of budgets and resources.

The work in the area illustrates the positive effects public diplomacy can have in creating connections between regional municipalities and Arab villages and towns, Dichter said.

"One of the group members has been nominated by the Ministry of Industry to establish the joint industrial area of Sachnin and Misgav."

The intent, he said, is for the Bedouin and Palestinian Arabs that live in the region to be empowered and work independently for change in the allocation of funds, assignment of land zoning permits and the designation of infrastructure development.

Besides civic action groups, Sikkuy also organizes affirmative action projects for Israel's Palestinian Arab citizens and assists Arab women to achieve leadership positions in local Arab authorities in Israel.

While Dichter conceded that the economic inequities between Israel's Palestinian Arabs and Jews is smaller than the disparity that exists between Arab citizens and their counterparts in most European countries, he noted many Israelis feel they must do better.

"With full equality, we would still have a conflict, but it would be one we could live with," Dichter said, adding that "when the inequities in material resources are dealt with, the dispute would be similar to the Franco-Anglo conflict here in Canada."

Dry Bones

Administration has failed Concordia

Ironically and very sadly, the name of Concordia University is a foul, smirking jest of itself. "A state of agreement and harmony," or some variation on that theme, is what Concordia actually means. Yet, for too long, agreement and harmony have been but a distant chimera for the administration and the vast majority of students at that university in Montreal.

For the last three years in particular, the university has been hijacked and the majority of its students held hostage by a hardcore rabble of anti-Israel ideologues who have abused academia's long-cherished, vital traditions of tolerance and freedom, and manipulated the democratic structures of student governance to impose their extreme, radical ideology on the entire university.

Last week, Concordia's Student Union (CSU) effectively ousted Hillel, the Jewish student organization, from that campus. On questionable grounds and by procedural stealth, the CSU voted 8-1 to suspend Hillel's funding and its right to hold campus activities.

In violation of its own rules of procedure, the motion to suspend Hillel was placed on the agenda without the requisite notice to the parties. Adding to the Kafkaesque surrealism of the proceedings, the motion was introduced and argued at midnight, without regard to the facts, without regard to the proper application of law and without regard to the barest concession to due process and civil decency.

The ostensible grounds for the motion was the unproven allegation that Hillel had distributed on campus promotional brochures for a program encouraging Jewish men and women to volunteer for brief service with the Israel Defence Forces. But the grounds were a pretext, just as the process was a sham.

The transparent purpose of the CSU exercise was, once again, to target the Jewish, pro-Israel students on campus. As Ariela Cotler, president of Montreal Hillel, told the Jewish Telegraphic Agency, "I have no doubt this is an attempt to shut down Israel's voice in this community... There was an obvious agenda to disrupt the activities of Hillel on campus."

This latest CSU tactic is of a piece with its thuggish pattern of behaviour going back to the student handbook it distributed last year called Uprising. The atmosphere on the university is a stewing hothouse of poisoned gases and violent eruptions, in which Jewish students are singled out, Israel is vilified, pro-Israel speakers are prevented from addressing the public and property is vandalized.

But the Jewish students on campus will not be intimidated, nor will the name of Israel or the justice of its cause be diminished by the CSU and their followers, for whom democracy and due process mean nothing. The same, alas, cannot be said for the university. Its name has already been severely tarnished in Canada and beyond.

Concordia's administration is presiding over the ruination of the its reputation. Unless it acts quickly, the thuggery of the CSU and its anti-Israel followers will bring long-lasting harm upon the university. It may already be too late.

Reconstructionists answer

Contrary to the false impression given by the article "Reconstructionists mull relationship with Israel" (CJN, Nov. 28), the recent call for a task force on Israel policies was an initiative of the Jewish Reconstructionist Federation (JRF) to strengthen, not weaken, its historic ties with Zionism and the Jewish homeland.

As the written proposal for this new task force, distributed at the recent biennial convention in Montreal, states: "The JRF has since its inception been committed to serious engagement with the concerns of the State of Israel... [A]s a member of the United Jewish Communities and the Conference of Presidents of Major Jewish Organizations, the JRF is more and more frequently called on to express its views on the current situation in Israel... We are convinced that we should now lay the groundwork for the articulation of such policies.

"We do not write on a clean slate. Mordecai Kaplan [founder of the movement] was a prominent leader of the 20th century Zionist movement, and a commitment to Zionism has always been a bedrock principle of the Reconstructionist movement. Indeed, the JRF's by-laws specify 'commitment to the support of the State of Israel' as one of the principles to which a congregation or chavurah must be dedicated in order to be eligible for membership."

The centrality of Israel to Reconstructionist Judaism stems from Rabbi Kaplan's vision of Judaism as a civilization of the Jewish people. Writing in the 1920s and '30s, Kaplan argued that Zion was the historic centre and heart of this civilization. He depicted the centrality of Zion to Jewish life in the logo of The Reconstructionist magazine: the words "Diaspora Jewry" appear around the perimeter of a circle with "Zion" in the hub. The three spokes of Jewish civilization that connected Zion and the Diaspora were, he said, religion, ethics and culture. Kaplan's own involvement in Jewish life was such that he was offered the position of becoming the first president of Hebrew University in the 1920s.

Kaplan's Zionism, together with his focus on "peoplehood" – a term he coined to emphasize Jewish communal life as the primary expression of Jewish identity in modern times – perhaps accounts for the disproportionate number of Reconstructionist Jews involved in Israel-based and community-based organizations. Canadian Reconstructionists have been or are currently executive directors of the Jewish National Fund, the New Israel Fund, Canadian Friends of Ben Gurion University, the Ben Weider Jewish Community Centre in Montreal (the JCC concept was another of Kaplan's innovations), Jewish Vocational Services and Jewish Family Services, to name a few. When you include top lay leadership, the list expands to include the presidents of Montreal's FEDERATION CJA, Montreal's Cummings Jewish Centre for Seniors, JIAS, Hillel, ORT and others.

Regrettably, the historic and current realities of the Reconstructionist commitment to Israel and communal Jewish life did not come across in your article.

Eban's greatness

Jews around the world will mourn the death of Abba Eban, a most remarkable stateman and unquestionably the most eloquent diplomat the small State of Israel ever produced. In 1978, after addressing a large delegation of Ontario lawyers and jurists in Jerusalem, he responded to some questions from the floor. His Labour party had been defeated in recent elections, and he was asked how it felt to be a member of the opposition. His response was that after telling the world for 30 years that Israel was a democracy, he could hardly complain if it acted like one. It is a monument to his greatness that with all the adversity Israel undergoes on a daily basis, it continues to function as the only true democracy in the Middle East.

Re: Payments from Germany and Austria

Further to the article "URO Toronto office left to handle survivor claims" (CJN, Nov. 7), the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany (Claims Conference) in New York has negotiated compensation payments for Holocaust survivors and victims' heirs from Germany and Austria. The Claims Conference has several programs, including the longtime Article 2 Fund, the Program for Former Slave and Forced Labourers, funds from the Swiss Banks Settlement, and others, all with varying eligibility requirements and application deadlines.

The Claims Conference also distributes funds to organizations and institutions that provide essential social services to elderly, needy survivors, and that engage in Shoah education, research and documentation.

Detailed information about these and other programs is available at www.claimscon.org. Information on restitution available from Austria, Switzerland and other European countries is on the Web site.

For more information, call the Claims Conference directly at 212-696-4944 and ask for the department of services.

As well, the United Restitution Organization (URO) may be contacted in Toronto at 416-630-2920 or in Montreal at 514-931-7933.

My suicide bomber

By NAOMI ISCOVE

The bus pulled out of the Tel Aviv Central Station and made a right turn onto the crowded street. I peered out the window at the pedestrians rushing around and the drivers honking at each other. I tried not to be nervous.

The security checks had intensified since my last visit to Israel. Before boarding the bus, I walked through a metal detector and my bags were examined using an X-ray machine. A guard brushed a wand up and down my body and made me empty my pockets before he allowed me to pass.

It was January 2002. More than a year had passed since the intifadah had started. Suicide bombings had become routine. And most occurred on buses.

My bus was half full. Soldiers in uniform talked on cellphones. Families with young children cuddled in their seats and chatted excitedly. Older people leaned against the windows and tried to rest. I sat alone and observed.

I decided not to let fear influence my decisions. I wanted to live freely in my homeland. I had faith that the Israeli security system would protect me. The added measures calmed me. For the first 20 minutes I eavesdropped on conversations around me, listened to the radio and glanced out the window. My eyes darted from street performers to soldiers to mountains in the distance.

The bus driver pulled over at a bus stop off the highway. A dishevelled young man threw one of his bags under the bus and climbed aboard. He paid the driver and inched his way down the bus, clutching a second bag to his chest. He glanced at me as he approached my row. I put my purse on the seat next to me and rummaged through it, pretending to look for something important.

My mind exploded with thoughts. Did he just throw a bomb under the bus? What if he had a bomb in the bag he was carrying?

He walked to the back of the bus and sat down in the last row. He surveyed the other passengers.

I knew he was a suicide bomber. My stomach knotted. I heard ringing in my ears. What should I do? Did anyone else notice? Why isn't anyone else panicking? Should I tell the bus driver? One of the soldiers? Call someone on my cellphone? No other stops were scheduled for the remainder of the ride. I couldn't get off the bus. If I asked the driver to stop, the bomber would realize I knew his plan. I was trapped.

I reached in my wallet for my copy of the traveller's prayer. Tears formed in my eyes, blurring my vision. My hands trembled as I whispered the prayer to myself:

"Yehee ratzon melefanecha HaShem Elokeinu – May it be your will, God and God of our ancestors to lead us toward peace… and make our path a path of peace. Help us to reach our desired destination for life, joy, and peace. Rescue us from the hands of any danger, ambush, criminal or wild animal on the road, and from all emotional ordeals that are in this world… May you hear the sound of our heart's cry, for you are a listener, a God who hears cries and prayers. Blessed are you, who listens to words from the heart."

I wiped my tears and breathed deeply. Turning my head cautiously, I let my eyes rest on the suicide bomber. I estimated his age to be around the same as mine – early 20s. He wore a dirty shirt, ripped jeans and work boots. His skin was dark, and his black curly hair hung messily around his face. His backpack looked old and was made of leather. I saw no wires coming out of it – a good sign.

How much time left until we arrive in Jerusalem? When we get there, if we get there, the guards will catch him for sure. My mind raced. I tried to remember everything I'd read about a suicide bomber's mentality. These guys are determined. They see this as a last resort, thinking they have nothing to live for. Maybe I have to distract him to save us. Could I distract him for the rest of the ride?

My throat was dry. My head felt heavy. He tilted his head and his eyes caught mine.

Is eye contact good? Maybe I needed him to acknowledge that I'm a human being and to have sympathy for me. It's easier to kill people you don't know than to kill people you have a connection with. My eyes penetrated his. I tried to smile, but my mouth froze. I jerked my head back, and focused on the seat in front of me.

Beads of sweat formed on my forehead. Does he know I suspect him? If I call the police on my cellphone, will that tip him off and make him explode right away? I couldn't let on that I knew. I put my foot up on my seat casually and leaned back. I tried to appear relaxed.

I turned and faced him again. He was observing me. A quizzical look appeared on his face. I managed a smile. There were about 10 rows between us, so I couldn't get a close look at his features. In another context, he could be attractive. What a shame that he feels so desperate.

I studied his body movements. His legs were crossed and he was leaning back against his seat, still clutching the bag to his chest. He fidgeted with the straps as he gazed out the window. The laces from his brown boots [illegible] moving his feet back and forth. He checked his watch and muttered something to himself in disgust.

My cellphone beeped and I jumped in my seat. A text message from my friend said she'd meet me at the bus station in 10 minutes. We were almost there. I only had to distract the bomber for a little while longer before security in Jerusalem would catch him. I read my prayer again and slouched in my seat. I surveyed the other passengers on the bus. Most people slept or listened to their walkmans. Two soldiers talked on cellphones. The driver drummed his hands against the steering wheel to the beat of the music on the radio.

I sat sideways and leaned my head on the seat next to me, giving myself a clear view of the bomber. He was watching me again. When our eyes met, he pushed his hair behind his ears and uncrossed his legs. He placed the bag on the floor in front of him, and smiled an awkward smile. He was crazy. My heart pounded loudly and quickly like a bass drum. I smiled back at him, again. He looked down and noticed his bootlaces were untied. Blushing, he tied them quickly.

Then he opened his bag. I held my breath. He pulled out a red sweater and a new-looking baseball cap and put them on. The grungy air about him faded. He became a different person, a cleaner person, a less suspicious person. I didn't know what to think. I continued staring. He checked his watch again, re-crossed his legs and looked right at me.

"Mom, are we home yet?"

The little boy in front of me had awakened. His question startled me, and broke my concentration. I looked out the window and saw downtown Jerusalem.

The bus pulled into the station. After checking that I hadn't forgotten anything, I joined the other passengers exiting the bus. The bomber stood a few passengers behind me with his backpack slung over his shoulder. He fidgeted with the straps again as he stared blankly ahead. I climbed down the stairs and hurried towards the main area of the bus terminal for security checks.

"Wait!"

I whipped my head around and saw him running towards me. I quickened my pace.

"Wait! I want to talk to you!"

I froze. My face became hot and red. I felt dizzy.

"I saw you looking at me during the bus ride."

I panicked. I lowered my head and began rambling.

"What? Really? Oh, I didn't even notice. I'm a tourist here. I was just looking out the windows at the scenery and at all the people on the bus and…"

"Hey, whoa, calm down. Don't be shy. It's OK. If you want my phone number – just ask!"

My mouth dropped open. I gawked at him in disbelief.

Suddenly, it occurred to me that we were speaking in Hebrew. Was he Israeli? Had I misjudged him? My dizziness got worse. After a long pause, I managed to string together a sentence.

"Wow, that's, um, that's really nice of you. I'm actually leaving the country tomorrow, but if I wasn't, I, I would definitely take your number."

He shrugged and laughed.

"You're such a tease! OK then, enjoy your [illegible]. It was fun to flirt with you on the bus!"

He flashed me a smile and winked. I stared back, expressionless.

"Hey, are you OK? What's wrong? You look like you've seen a ghost."

"I'm fine."

He squinted and studied my face.

"You're not fine. Did I offend you? I'm sorry, I really thought you were flirting with me. I hope I didn't embarrass you."

"No, that's not it."

"OK. Well, we should be getting to the security checks."

We walked to the guards and stood in line silently. A dream-like fog surrounded me as I opened my bag for inspection. The guard brushed a wand up and down my body and I passed through the metal detector.

From the other side, I witnessed my suicide bomber empty his bags. He removed a shirt, underwear, a pair of pants, a toothbrush, toothpaste and deodorant from the first bag. His second bag contained textbooks. After the guard nodded in approval, he repacked his bags, passed the metal detector and met me on the other side. I closed my eyes and thanked God.

"Are you sure you're OK?"

"Yeah, I'm sorry, I'm OK now." My voice was shaky and unconvincing. I felt exhausted.

"What's going on? I know I saw you looking at me on the bus, and just now, I saw you staring at me when the guards were brushing me with the wand and…"

He turned his head and glimpsed back at the security guards searching bags. As he faced me again, he noticed the newspaper stand beside us. The front page of the Jerusalem Post pictured the wreckage from a bomb explosion from the day before in Northern Israel. He looked down at his ripped jeans and his bags. Then his glance returned to me.

"Wow, you didn't think… Oh my God, you thought I was a…"

I lowered my head.

"I can't believe this. I don't usually look like this – I just overslept and missed the bus I usually take, and then I rushed like crazy to get to the second one on time. I didn't have a chance to shower or find clean clothes or anything. I just… You weren't flirting with me on the bus."

I shook my head slightly as the tears returned to my eyes. I looked at him pleadingly.

He studied his feet while and mumbled, "Wow, do I feel stupid now. I'm so sorry for scaring you. I feel awful. You must have been terrified." He slid his foot back and forth on the floor.

I swallowed and spoke softly. "Don't be sorry. It's not your fault. I'm so sorry that I suspected you. I feel awful."

"We hardly get any tourists here anymore, and the locals just know how to recognize each other most of the time. OK, let's start this again. I'm Yossi. What's your name?"

"Nomi."

"Are you really leaving Israel tomorrow?"

"Actually, in three days. I was just visiting my cousins and now I'm going to stay with friends here in Jerusalem." My heart beat slowed to a normal rhythm.

"Well Nomi, it's nice to meet you. I hope you enjoy the rest of your visit. I think it's great that you came here, despite the mess."

"Thanks," I fumbled in my purse for a tissue, "Thanks for coming up to talk to me."

He handed me a tissue from his pocket. "No problem. You take care of yourself. OK, Nomi?"

He waved goodbye and wandered towards the exit of the terminal. People bustled around me. Guards continued opening bags and brushing wands over passengers. I heard a siren come closer and then watched an ambulance race past. I pulled my coat tight around me and looked for my friend.

The price of security

There was a time when it was difficult to distinguish between Canada and the United States. English was spoken on both sides of the border, and – unless politics was the subject of conversation – the border between the two nations seemed to be an artificial divide.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Going from Canada to the United States was hardly different than travelling at home.

That was then, but the laissez faire of those days is gone.

Some weeks ago, I wrote about security measures at the border, highlighted for me by a request to take off my shoes and prove thereby that no bomb was hidden in them.

More recently, I was spared that request and waved through by the officer in charge without having to prove there were no explosives in my footwear.

Does this mean that security is no longer the central concern it was a few months ago? Hardly.

Security was, and remains, a central American preoccupation. In an insecure world, this is apparently the price that the globe's superpower must pay.

America has lately been threatened outright by its Middle Eastern enemies, who predict that an attack on the homeland will be launched in the not-too-distant future.

Their major beef is the close alliance that binds the United States to Israel. The fundamental enmity of many Arab states toward the United States has its root in U.S. support for the Jewish state.

No wonder that the name of Tom Ridge, America's new security chief, is on its way to becoming a household word.

This kind of thing seems strange to most Canadians, who have had the luxury of being removed from such concerns. But nothing lasts forever, and Canada's present level security is likely to suffer a blow at some point. Just when this will happen is of course unknown to me, though I hope it is still far off.

But because of the threat, I am strongly in favour of measures that will protect the nation, both externally and internally. At the same time, I, like many others, want civil liberties preserved as much as possible.

In fact, the proper balance between security and liberty is democracy's main challenge.

I trust that Canada will always pass the test.

Parental pride, Palestinian style

To hear his parents tell it, Nael Abu Hilayel is nothing short of a hero. They hope their other 12 children will follow in his footsteps.

In late November, on a clear, crisp autumn morning, Hilayel boarded a bus in Jerusalem's working class neighbourhood of Kiryat Menachem not far from my home. Young people heading to school and adults going to work filled the bus that two of my oldest daughter's classmates also usually take to school.

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

A young man on a mission, Hilayel was dressed for the occasion. He wore loose-fitting clothes to help conceal a belt packed with explosives and shrapnel. Just after 7 o'clock, while standing in the front section of the bus, Hilayel detonated the bomb strapped to his waist.

For his efforts, Hilayel murdered 11 Israelis, wounded 50 others, killed himself – and won the hearts of his people. "Of course, I am proud of him and all the other martyrs," said his mother. "It's all because of Israel's daily atrocities against our people."

Hilayel's father also showered his son with glory. "I thanked God when I heard that my son had died in an operation for the sake of God, Islam and the homeland," Azmi Abu Hilayel told reporters hours after the massacre.

The father claimed he did not know that his 23-year-old son was a member of the Hamas terrorist organization, but said it made no difference. "We are all one people fighting against the common enemy, the Jews," he said.

Following the bombing, many residents in Hilayel's hometown of El-Khader near Bethlehem openly expressed their joy over the carnage. There was similar celebration elsewhere in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. Never mind that several children were blown to pieces in the Jerusalem attack, that dozens were maimed and traumatized for life, that such terrorism inevitably leads to retaliatory actions by the Israeli army and further undermines Palestinian aspirations for statehood.

If only this were an isolated case. But on the contrary: following many suicide bombings against Israel, the parents of Palestinian terrorists pay tribute in front of TV cameras to the evil deeds of their offspring. Try to imagine a more despicable performance. I watch these parents and my blood starts to boil. Their words trigger in me unspeakable thoughts.

Sanity check, please. We are speaking here of the premeditated mass murder of innocent men, women and children. The Palestinians, of course, would not describe it this way. They don't see it this way. They seem incapable of seeing it this way. For them, such bloodletting constitutes "resistance" and "martyr operations."

For Israelis, whose Jewish tradition holds that life is the most precious thing, the Palestinian glorification of death and murder is bone-chilling. It is a stark example of the gap between the Israelis and Palestinians and their conflicting narratives, a divide that is gigantic, if not unbridgeable, and which grows all the time.

Far be it for me to profess any deep insight into the Arab/Islamic mindset so rife with hatred against Jews. I'm at a loss to comprehend a society that weans its children on unbridled hostility toward its neighbours and gleefully uses young people as murderous vehicles.

Last winter, the mother of Wafa Idris, the first female Palestinian suicide bomber, said she was proud of her daughter's attack in Jerusalem and hoped more women would follow her example. Mariam Farahat was equally proud of her son Mohammed, who killed five Israeli students and wounded 23 others with an assault rifle and grenades last spring in the Gaza Strip before he was gunned down.

"I don't want condolences," she told reporters after the attack. "I want congratulations. I encouraged my son to sacrifice himself. It is a victory."

A long time ago, former Israeli prime minister Golda Meir said, "Peace will come only when Palestinians love their children more than they hate Jews." Sadly, decades later, with Palestinian teenagers volunteering to carry out suicide atrocities against Israel with their parents' approval, Meir's words are more applicable today than ever.

Arab rejectionism destroyed the UN

The United Nations was and remains a wonderful idea. What could be better than representatives of the nations of the world sitting down together as equals in order to prevent war and forge a culture of peace?

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

The reality, however, is quite different, and the UN is a very flawed, even counterproductive, institution. Instead of promoting peace, many regimes, including Syria, which was recently elected to the UN Security Council, seek war and defend the use of violence and even terrorism. The UN's moral authority has never been solid, and recent years have seen a steady and perhaps terminal decline.

Many of the UN's failures are highlighted in its action, or inaction, in the Middle East. The UN has passed dozens of resolutions and presented scores of unfulfilled peace plans while adopting a strong pro-Palestinian ideology. The UN-sponsored anti-racism conference of September 2001 in Durban, South Africa marked a new low in the demonization of Israel.

The UN's efforts in Arab-Israeli peacemaking began on Nov. 29 1947, with General Assembly Resolution 181, also known as the Partition Plan (or the "mother of all UN resolutions on the Middle East"). After careful study, the assembly overwhelmingly adopted the recommendation to divide this tiny land, claimed by Jews and Arabs (the term "Palestinian" was not introduced until the 1960s).

On this basis, two independent states were to be created, while the sacred city of Jerusalem would be placed under some form of international control.

The Jews, under David Ben-Gurion, agreed to accept a small portion of the land, allowing the restoration of Jewish sovereignty. In contrast, the representatives of the various Arab delegations unanimously rejected the concept, and their war began immediately.

Brutal terror attacks were carried out on major Jewish institutions in Jerusalem, Jews were attacked in the streets and in restaurants, cars were ambushed and the occupants were killed on the roads and in the convoy to Hadassah Hospital. A few months later, when the British formally withdrew, the armies of Egypt, Jordan, Syria, and Iraq launched full-scale attacks.

Since these events, the Arab states have been in blatant violation of the UN charter and international law. Only Egypt, in 1979, and Jordan, in 1994, reversed course, and belatedly accepted the legitimacy of Israel, although Egypt's commitment remains half-hearted, at best.

As this history makes clear, the UN's fundamental structural problem from the beginning has been its inability to gain adherence to its resolutions and charter.

In the case of UN Resolution 181, and the Arab war against Israel that began in its wake, there were no penalties for defiance and violations of the core principles of maintaining international peace. Aggressors were, and are not, punished, unless they are particularly weak politically and are easy prey for the automatic Arab/Islamic majority in the UN.

After being defeated in this first round (the Israeli War of Independence), the Arabs would only sign a limited truce, again in defiance of the UN and the ceasefire documents that explicitly directed the parties to conclude permanent peace agreements.

Preparations began immediately for the next rounds, leading to the 1956, 1967 and 1973 wars. In between the wars, waves of terrorism were launched, also in blatant violation of the UN charter and resolutions. Eventually, as their power at the UN grew, and others began to tire of this conflict, the terms of the resolutions improved steadily in favour of the Arab position. The obvious conclusion is that under the UN system, warfare and violation of resolutions and agreements carry no stigma or cost, at least for the Arab bloc.

For Israelis, in contrast, the terrorism and wars that began Nov. 29 1947 with the rejection of Resolution 181 have exacted a terrible cost. The thousands of victims cannot be brought back to life. The shattered families cannot be compensated.

Before the UN and its renewed efforts to broker Arab-Israeli peace can be taken seriously, an accounting for the initial offence, 55 years ago, must be completed.

The Kirshner File

A cornucopia of books...

New books roll off the presses day and night. The latest cornucopia, dealing with subjects ranging from Yiddish to Jewish history, are well worth reading.

Bassam Tibi, a Syrian scholar based in Germany, grapples with the disturbing phenomenon of political, or radical, Islam in The Challenge of Fundamentalism (University of California Press). After the terrorist events of Sept. 11, 2001, this is a topic that can no longer be brushed aside. Tibi argues that Islamism springs from Islam's confrontation with modernity and the inability of Muslim states to integrate into the new secular order. And while Islamism should not necessarily be equated with Islam, he warns, political Islam remains "a major stream within contemporary Islamic civilization."

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

A cogent companion volume, What Everyone Needs To Know About Islam (Oxford University Press), by John Esposito, is a slim but revealing book that unfolds in a question-and-answer format. Among the questions posed: Does Islam permit suicide bombers? Does the Koran condone terrorism? Why is Jerusalem so important to Muslims? How do Muslims view Judaism? Whatever your opinion of his views, Esposito opens a window on the world's fastest-growing religion.

The 1979 Islamic revolution in Iran sent a shudder of fear through non-Muslim communities. Jews, Christians, Bahais and others understandably wondered how they would be treated by the new militant order. Eliz Sanasarian, in Religious Minorities in Iran (Cambridge University Press), provides valuable insights into this still-unfolding problem.

Tom Segev, in Elvis in Jerusalem (Metropolitan Books), writes that the Americanization of Israeli culture, during which Israel has evolved from a collective society to a culture of individualism, has been quite beneficial. Americanization, he claims, has brought the virtues of pragmatism, tolerance and diversity. An intriguing but debatable theory.

In A Book of Life (Random House), Rabbi Michael Strassfeld presents Judaism as an unerring guide to behaviour and values. His message of faith and spirituality strikes a profound chord. Read it in conjunction with Rabbi Lawrence Hoffman's The Journey Home (Beacon Press), which, among other topics, deals with the meaning of study in Jewish life and the importance of a home.

Books of related interest include Harold Kushner's Living a Life That Matters (Random House), which is basically a self-improvement manual suffused with wisdom; David Bader's Zen Judaism (Random House), which also dispenses sage advice on how to be a better person, and Alan King's Great Jewish Joke Book (Random House), a sardonic celebration of Jewish humour. (Example: Why do Jewish mothers make such terrible parole officers? They never let anyone finish a sentence.)

Yiddish, that earthy lingua franca, is the subject of Miriam Weinstein's Yiddish: A Nation of Words (Random House) – an accessible, erudite history of a peculiar language whose delights never cease.

How about a little history?

In Rewriting the Jew: Assimilation Narratives in the Russian Empire (Stanford University Press), Gabriella Safran examines the notion of Jewish acculturation as reflected in the works of four Russian novelists, among them Anton Chekhov. Howard Sachar, in Dreamland: Europeans and Jews in the Aftermath of the Great War (Random House), offers a penetrating analysis of the effect of World War I on Jewish communities from Romania to Germany.

The Jews of Europe after the Black Death (University of California Press), by Anna Foa, is an illuminating account of how a 14th century plague shaped anti-Semitic stereotypes. Jews in the Canary Islands (University of Toronto Press), translated and edited by Lucien Wolf, is a reprint of an esoteric 1925 book turning on an obscure aspect of the infamous Inquisition.

Cynthia Scheinberg, in an original work of literary criticism, Women's Poetry and Religion in Victorian England (Cambridge University Press), explains how Judaic texts and images influenced a whole host of poets – Jewish and Christian – during that epoch.

Beth Hatefutsoth, the Museum of the Jewish Diaspora on the campus of Tel Aviv University, has published two intriguing catalogues in connection with recent exhibitions. The first, In the Heart of the Atlas: Jews of Rural Morocco, consists of rare photographs depicting Jewish life in the 1940s and 1950s. My copy, in French, is titled Juifs parmi les Berberes. The second catalogue, Icons of War, features the graphic photos of Yevgeny Khaldei, a Jewish photographer who documented the fall of Berlin to Soviet forces in early 1945.

Fritz Stern skillfully blends history and biography in Einstein's German World (Princeton University Press), a dissection of German-Jewish relations before and during the Third Reich. Richard Wolin, in Heidegger's Children (Princeton University Press), explores the strange relationship between pro-Nazi German philosopher Martin Heidegger and four of his star pupils who were Jewish.

Erik Ryding and Rebecca Pechefsky, in Bruno Walter (Yale University Press), profile the life and times of a great Jewish conductor, and protege of Gustav Mahler, who was driven out of Germany and Austria by the Nazis. The Inextinguishable Symphony: The True Story of Music and Love in Nazi Germany (John Wiley & Sons), by Martin Goldsmith, is about a resilient young Jewish couple who refused to be separated by persecution and terror.

Emily Rose, whose German ancestors immigrated to the United States in 1857, tells a little-known tale in Portraits of Our Past (Jewish Publication Society). In a folksy style, she paints a vivid portrait of 18th and 19th century Jews who lived in Germany's countryside.

In the wake of World War II, 250,000 Jews found a temporary haven in, of all places, Allied-occupied Germany. Ruth Gay, in Safe Among the Germans (Yale University Press), describes this curious interlude.

What was it like to subsist in the Warsaw ghetto under the Nazi boot? Through the medium of diaries and journals, Words to Outlive Us (Metropolitan Books), edited by Michal Grynberg, draws a poignant picture of Jews trapped in the ghettto's ghastly maw.

Before being shot to death in 1944, Herman Kruk kept a meticulous diary of the atrocities visited upon the Jews of Vilna by the Nazis. Originally published in Yiddish, The Last Days of the Jerusalem of Lithuania (Yale University Press), as translated by Barbara Harshav, is a gripping, excruciating account of life on the edge of the abyss.

Etty: The Letters and Diaries of Etty Hillesum, 1941-1943 charts the personal development of a courageous Jewish woman caught in the jaws of the Holocaust in Holland

Varian Fry, who died in 1967, is the only American who was honoured as a Righteous Gentile by Yad Vashem. He saved about 1,000 refugees, most of whom were Jewish. In A Hero Of Our Own (Random House), Sheila Isenberg shows how one inspiring person can make a difference.

Marthe Cohn, an amazing Jewish woman, posed as a German nurse during Nazi Germany's occupation of France. By doing so, she obtained invaluable information for the Allied cause. In Behind Enemy Lines: The True Story of a French Jewish Spy in Nazi Germany (Random House), she recalls her daring deeds.

Assault in Norway (Fitzhenry & Whiteside), by Thomas Gallagher, describes the 1942 Allied raid that knocked out Germany's heavy-water plant in Norway and thus sabotaged its nuclear program. A fine read.

Rosetta Loy gives readers an unusual perspective of the Holocaust in Italy. In First Words (Fitzhenry & Whiteside), this Catholic writer shifts seamlessly between her memories of a happy childhood in fascist Italy and her outrage at her country's vile treatment of its Jewish citizens. Loy, in particular, singles out the Vatican – the object of Daniel Jonah Goldhagen's wrath in A Moral Reckoning: The Role of the Catholic Church in the Holocaust And Its Unfulfilled Duty of Repair (Alfred N. Knopf). In his blistering but not unreasonable polemic, Goldhagen sets out the incriminating facts and suggests practical remedies.

Racial hatred in all its complexities and permutations is thoroughly explored by four authors: George Fredrickson in Racism: A Short History (Princeton University Press); Warren Kinsella in the paperback edition of Web of Hate: Inside Canada's Far Right Network (HarperCollins); and Kathleen Blee in Inside Organized Racism: Women in the Hate Movement (University of California Press), and Adam Fairclough in Better Day Coming: Blacks and Equality, 1890-2000. The last two works focus exclusively on the United States.

In general: Four excellent reference books have crossed my desk – the Oxford English Reference Dictionary (Oxford University Press); The Oxford Dictionary of Modern Quotations (Oxford University Press); the Encyclopedia of Literature in Canada (University of Toronto Press), and The Internet Handbook for Writers, Researchers and Journalists (Fitzhenry & Whiteside). All four should be in your library.

What is Derech Eretz In School?

Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto

The Talmud says "Derech Eretz Kadma LaTorah"- one cannot learn Torah without Derech Eretz. (kind, polite behaviour). Our Derech Eretz education begins in Nursery and continues through Grade 8. Our educators encourage and role model this behaviour. A Nursery child will help another child get their boots off. An Elementary class will send cards home to a sick classmate, and homework buddies in Middle School help each other daily. Derech Eretz is part of our life, and students are recognized with a gold brick on the "Derech Eretz Wall of Fame" prominently placed in the school's hallway.

Friction in human life

By RABBI LEIGH LERNER

In Vayigash, Joseph, Pharaoh's prime minister, toys with his brothers when they come to Egypt from Canaan seeking food. Why does Joseph agitate them?

Akio Morita, founder of Sony, noted that the level of friction in a relationship marks its closeness. Friction results from contact and movement. If we can use friction for forward movement, then a little friction can catalyze positive change.

Rabbinic Reflections

Joseph, in rubbing his brothers' nerves raw, draws them into his circle of concern. This friction opens them to receive Joseph – whose very existence will stun them – but it will also result in healing the violence of their familial past.

Sometimes good things happen in families under friction. People who have not spoken for awhile may be drawn together by a death or an illness. They may feel immense tension at having to rub shoulders together, so that rather than live with such emotional pressure, they choose to rehabilitate their relationship. Friction can create the energy people need to change.

The friction that Joseph creates with his brothers promises a grand finale. Imagine the uncertainty in the air when Joseph is alone with them. They must have thought, "We're either doomed or facing disaster."

Then Joseph weeps before his astounded family, crying, "I am Joseph your brother. Is my father still alive?... Don't be worried." Immediately, stress melts into the need to recap the history of the intervening years, and the denouement has occurred.

Tension and denouement are the nature of a good story, but they also shape real life situations.

Once Rabbi Berish Meisels, the rabbi of Krakow from 1831 to 1856, received an unhappy merchant who had come to Warsaw to buy goods with 5,000 rubles in his purse. Because he feared for his safety, he lodged with a fellow merchant, to whom he gave the money to hold until after Shabbat. When the visitor asked for the money, the man said, "What are you talking about?"

The visiting merchant asked Rabbi Meisels, "What should I do? The money was borrowed, and now I have nothing."

Rabbi Meisels reassured him. "You will have your money. I'll call your friend. You wait in the other room."

The Warsaw merchant came, and the rabbi spoke loudly to him, arousing the curiosity of the other merchant, who walked in and cried, "Here he is! Make him return my money."

"Do you know this man?" the rabbi asked?

"Yes, rabbi, he stayed at my house Saturday. I gave him victuals, and now he says that I took his 5,000 rubles. He must be insane."

The Jew gave him a piercing glance. "You yourself accepted the money and counted it before my very eyes. How can a Jew tell such a falsehood?"

"You'll not easily be rid of this man," the rabbi intervened. "Give him some rubles, and be done with it."

"If you say so, rabbi" the Warsaw merchant agreed, "I'll give him 100 rubles not to bother me."

The Jew refused the compromise. "I don't want charity," he wailed. "I want my money."

"Try again," the sage pleaded. "Give him 500."

"As you say, rabbi," the Warsaw merchant consented.

"You are a liar and a scoundrel," the rabbi suddenly called out. "Give the man his 5,000 rubles immediately! Now I clearly see that you took the money from him. I know you. You are not such a generous man. When I asked you for a donation, you refused. Now you give away 500 rubles so freely? Unless you return the money, I'll call the police."

The Warsaw merchant became pale, confessed and returned all 5,000 rubles.

The heat of friction may produce positive energy to solve human problems, or it can, as in the Joseph story or the Rabbi Meisels tale, provide a denouement that improves human relations. We generally avoid human friction, but we must recognize that it sometimes cannot be avoided, and when it occurs, it should be put to positive purpose.

Torah isn't the malady, it's the cure

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

According to recent studies, there are about 120,000 children in the Reform movement studying in congregational schools, and up to 5,000 more attending day schools. By nature devoted to the independence of each congregational culture and wary of textbooks as the essence of education, the movement has sought to address curricular concerns with often mixed results.

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

As Rabbi Jan Katzew, director of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations' department of jewish education, stridently confesses, "Whom are we kidding? We are short on teachers who are Jewishly literate and as competent as they are caring. We lack teachers... who come to class with a clear, cogent and compelling lesson plan." (In my experience, such deficiencies are surely not specific to Reform Judaism.)

Part of the problem is structural: many teachers in afternoon schools come to the task either after a full day at work, or they are not full-time Jewish educators and hence lack the requisite skills and experience to do the job in the best possible manner. But the question of what parents bring to such an enterprise is also an open one.

Not that Jewish day schools are a panacea for whatever ails you, but the notion of shlepping a child to a congregational school "after school" sounds like a hard sell. Even with compliance on the child's part, there seems little promise of continued Jewish literacy beyond the obvious goal of a bar or bat mitzvah.

But maybe an impassioned relationship to Judaism is not of primary importance to the parents anyway. Just making it to the bimah for the rite of passage is all the Judaism the child need endure.

Much of this bespeaks the general decline of religious culture in the West. The moral relativism of Western students has almost become a cliche since the publication of Allan Bloom's much-debated book The Closing of the American Mind.

Early in the book, Bloom argues that an inclination toward indiscriminate freedom can be found in the origins of liberal thought. Seeking to counteract centuries of religious coercion, the American founding fathers made a conscious effort to "weaken religious beliefs, partly by assigning religion to the realm of opinion as opposed to knowledge."

The long-term consequences of this laudable undertaking by democracy have been to deflect all discourse away from questions of truth and to substitute preferences for convictions. We cannot know anything for certain anymore. All we have are opinions. And if Judaism is just another sentiment, then who really has the time or interest to digest it?

As the Canadian philosopher Bruce Powe argues persuasively, we live in a "multiple message environment. It's deeply distracting, overwhelming, confusing. And there's so much stuff coming at us that people have a great deal of difficulty making selections. What is it that we really need to know? Because everything is pressing... always urgent, always at you."

Glutted with information about every conceivable person and cause, one is challenged to champion religion when bombs are falling, investments are melting down and ozone is depleting.

With moral weariness constituting the virus of our age, and as Judaism searches for immunity, perhaps the key is to focus on Torah not as the malady, but as the cure.

Tzedakah, part 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

So many worthy causes. So little money.

You'll find many of them on the World Wide Web. I couldn't possibly list even a fraction of them. Nor would I recommend one over another. However, I would like to examine a few sites with advice about how to give and what to look for in a well-run charity. Thankfully, there are a few people who research charities (many of which are not well-known) and recommend the ones that truly make a difference.

First, a few words of caution. Though there are many worthwhile charitable institutions on the Internet, I strongly advise further investigation before you donate. If a charitable donation receipt is important to you, find out whether one is available before you give. Also, there is much debate about whether you should send a credit card donation online. If you are hesitant, no charity would turn down a donation by mail.

One of the most incredible advocates of tzedakah is mitzvah maven Danny Siegel. Based in Rockville, Md., Siegel operates the Ziv Tzedakah Fund Inc [http://www.ziv.org]. He proclaims "mitzvah heroes," such as Elana Erdstein from Detroit, who requested and received for her bat mitzvah 25,000 hotel-size soaps, shampoos and conditioners to be given to the poor. Or John Beltzer, who writes songs for children with cancer. You can read an article about Siegel's dumpster-dipping for good merchandise that had been thrown out [http://www.jewishsf.com/bk970919/ebmaven.htm].

Similar to Ziv, Kavod [http://kavod.org] describes itself as a Nebraska-based "non-profit tzedakah collective." Kavod's goal is to "enable our beneficiaries to live in dignity and honor by funding and creating programs that provide for their material, physical, emotional, intellectual, and spiritual well-being... We strive to operate as close to zero per cent overhead as possible and to support programs which demand the same efficiency."

Many charities accept donations via the Internet. The Just Tzedakah Web site has set up "The Tzedakah Box," which allows you to give online to dozens of Jewish charities [http://just-tzedakah.org]. As the site points out, Just Tzedakah itself is a charity, and up to four per cent of your donation will go to cover its processing costs. You may also want to check whether your favorite charity accepts secure donations online.

The Internet also gives you another relatively easy way to donate. The Shop for Tzedakah Web site allows you to purchase products online from over 200 merchants who donate a portion of each purchase (0.5 per cent to 30 per cent) to the Israel Emergency Campaign or the charity of your choice [http://www.shopfortzedakah.com/s4t/default.asp].

If you are unfamiliar with a specific charity, you may want to research its goals, its overhead and the amount of money it raises. You can learn about any registered Canadian charity right at your keyboard. The Canada Customs and Review Agency's (CCRA) list of Canadian registered charities has information about 78,000 charities. You can examine recent "information returns" in which the charities describe their work, the amount they raise and their expenses. Please note that the information in the CCRA database is provided by the charities themselves [http://shlk.com/258].

Guidestar: The National Database of Nonprofit Organizations allows to you search online for information about more than 850,000 IRS-recognized American non-profits [http://www.guidestar.org]. For Israeli charities, visit Giving Wisely: The Internet Directory of Israeli Nonprofit and Philanthropic Organizations [http://www.givingwisely.org.il].

I was fascinated by a chart at the Jewish Virtual Library that tracks money raised by American charities and the percentage of funds allocated to Israel. That share has ranged from a 78 per cent in 1967 to 36 per cent in 1999. There's also an accompanying essay on the History of Jewish Giving in America [http://www.us-israel.org/jsource/Judaism/Tzedakahtoc.html].

Still looking for more information about giving? Try these tzedakah links [http://www.ajritz.com/jew/tzedlnk.htm], Tzedaka.org [http://www.tzedaka.org] and Maven [http://www.maven.co.il/subjects.asp?S=172].

There may never be enough money for all the worthy institutions and individuals who deserve it. But Brandeis University professor Reuven Kimelman says the recipient of the donation is not the only one who gains. "Tzedakah may not save us, but it makes us worth saving" [http://www.usisrael.org/jsource/Judaism/Tzedaka.html].

Sharon biography skims the surface

Sharon: Israel's Warrior-Politician*, by Anita Miller, Jordan Miller and Sigalit Zetouni, Academy Chicago Publishers & Olive Publishers, $41.25

Books
Bernard Baskin

Few people are neutral about Ariel Sharon, the barrel-framed ex-general, who realized a life long ambition when he toppled incumbent Ehud Barak in the February 2001 election for prime minister.

At 72, Sharon can look back on a life of almost constant strife. He grew up on a moshav during the British mandate, joined the Haganah at the age of 14, participated in the 1948 War of Independence, commanded an armoured division in the 1967 Six Day War and, in a climactic battle of the Yom Kippur War, audaciously led his troops across the Suez Canal.

Elected to the Knesset in 1977, he masterminded Israel's disastrous invasion of Lebanon in 1982. As defence minister, and without explicitly telling then-prime minister Menachem Begin, he sent the Israeli army all the way to Beirut, a move that ended in the expulsion of Yasser Arafat's Palestine Liberation Organization from Lebanon. The move stopped the PLO from using Lebanon to launch attacks against Israel, but it also resulted in the massacre of hundreds of Palestinians by Lebanese Christian militiamen in two refugee camps under Israeli control.

Sharon was removed from office in 1983 by an Israeli tribunal investigating the 1982 Lebanon invasion. The tribunal found him indirectly responsible for the killings.

The authors of this first full English biography of Sharon, recalling the events that led to his censure, report that when he arrived in Jerusalem to testify, he encountered two demonstrations, one by supporters who reached out "a thousand hands" to shake his, and another by marchers calling him a "murderer".

The book reveals aspects of Sharon's life that were new to me: The loss of his first wife in a car accident and the death of his second wife from cancer at the age of 63.

In 1967, on the eve of Rosh Hashanah, he heard the sound of a gunshot in front of his house and rushed outside: to his horror, he found Gur, his 12-year-old son stretched out on the grass, his face covered with blood. Next to him lay an antique shotgun. Evidently, one of his playmates had filled it with powder, playfully pointed it at Gur – and it had gone off. Sharon rushed him to the hospital, but it was useless. The child died.

Almost a third of the book focuses on events since Sharon's election as prime minister. The facts are all dutifully presented, as are those in the 400 pages that come before. But, there is no attempt to probe beneath the façade, to provide insights into the mind of a many-sided and complex personality.

The authors are not students of the Middle East, and although they have compiled a vast amount of information – much of it well documented and useful – there is no attempt at analysis or evaluation.

Readers will appreciate the book's well-chosen photographs, as well as a helpful section of 12 maps, from the United Nations Partition Plan of 1947 to the Oslo II Interim Agreement of 1995.

ASTEH volunteers assist abused women

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

For the women who stay at the alternative short-term emergency housing (ASTEH) for abused women run by Jewish Women International and Jewish Family & Child Service, Helen Davis and her group of volunteers are their eyes and ears to the outside world.

"Many of these women [seeking shelter from domestic violence] have [virtually] no outside contact; we are usually their only visitors," says Davis, who has been an ASTEH volunteer for 10 years and is its Toronto chair.

As chair, Davis co-ordinates the volunteers' activities, which could include cleaning, shopping and preparing the kosher apartment, accompanying women to their lawyers, court or even a movie, or they could include babysitting or taking children on outings.

Davis is also the main liaison between volunteers and clients' social workers.

The volunteers' role is completely non-judgmental, she says.

"We are friends first; we give no advice. The women know they can tell us what they want without being judged, and we often build up a close relationship."

If a woman decides to leave her home permanently, the volunteers can help her find accommodations and provide help with her move, she says.

"We respect their anonymity. If we happen to run into them after they've left the apartment, we wait for them to acknowledge us. Our respect for their privacy is the key and central issue.

"Although we try to reach them on a daily basis, they cannot reach us directly. If they do want to speak to us, they go through their social worker. This helps keep things anonymous."

Isa Nevsky, an ASTEH volunteer, says that when the women move into the apartment, they often feel numb.

"Our main role is to listen. It takes a lot of courage for them to take these steps, and many are plagued with self-doubts. It is a lonely journey because they are cut off from the outside world. We have to help them through.

"Because their self-esteem is probably shattered, we put our arms around them and show them that someone cares. It might be the first time someone has told them that things would be alright," Nevsky says.

After about three months, however, they usually begin to feel nurtured, she says. "They've been to counselling, they've had time out and they've had a chance to think about the future. We are the stepping stone to being independent and being on their own."

The volunteers find it very rewarding to see women who come to the apartment totally broken leave with some kind of fight in them, Nevsky says.

Penny Krowitz, executive director of JWI Canada, says that after running ASTEH for 14 years, the organization has never been able to come up with a profile of abused women.

"We've thrown out the notion that there is any one profile. Each woman is an individual with individual needs. It is impossible to generalize.

"Women of all ages come from different ethnic groups and religious backgrounds. We have had older women come to us who have been in abusive relationships for years. They may have only just realized it because they never had another role model."

Krowitz says that although JWI is not accepting ASTEH volunteers until next fall, those who are interested can call JWI for information at 416-630-9313.

"If they are accepted, they are obligated to join the organization and take part in two training sessions, which include some theoretical background around abuse.

"It is definitely not the usual volunteer assignment. The hours are not scheduled and it is very intense with a lot of week-end work," she says.

However, there are few positions that are as rewarding, Nevsky says. "These women have taught us to appreciate our lives and to think about our marriages.

"We really come away with a good feeling about life and about ourselves. We all give our hearts and our souls to these women. Although we have learned to detach ourselves, we go to bed at night thinking about what we can do for them next."

PA school books give negative view of Israel

elaborate on "America's role in the establishment of the Jews' state and in its continued existence in Palestine."

The implication is that Israel does not have a right to exist, the report concludes.

The report takes note of the Palestinian argument that Israel is not included in their maps because final borders have yet to be fixed.

But this rationale, the report adds, fails to explain why maps of Palestine are printed in PA schoolbooks.

The city of Jerusalem is presented as exclusively Palestinian and as the capital of the state of Palestine.

Jews are not mentioned in the history of Jerusalem, but for the first time Jerusalem's importance to "the three religions" – Islam, Christianity and Judaism – is noted.

The following passage appears in Christian Education: "Jerusalem (Urushalim): A Palestinian city built by the Arab Canaanites... Later it was renamed Urasalem, and after that it was called by many [other] names such as City of Justice, the Holy City, Noble Jerusalem [al-Quds al-Sharif]. The prevalent name is al-Quds."

The ideals of peace, tolerance and coexistence are missing from Palestinian books, the report says.

"Palestinian education does not foster peaceful relations with Israel, nor does it support the peace process between the two parties," the report observes.

Concepts such as war, jihad (holy war) and martyrdom, which were widely dealt with in old texts, do not appear in the latest ones.

In the English final exam, the Palestinians are depicted as victims, while Israel is seen as a brutal aggressor, the report says.

Building on bagels: Kehilla connection in York

By JENNIFER M. PAQUETTE
Special to The CJN

It's a long way from bagels to bricks, but the road was paved with warmth and dedication at a Nov. 26 workshop sponsored by Kehilla Residential Programme, the housing agency of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Almost 60 planners, financial analysts, architects, lawyers and representatives of community agencies came together to seek practical solutions for developing affordable rental housing projects in York Region.

Following introductory remarks by representatives of Kehilla and York Region, participants in the workshop, Bagels to Bricks: Focus on York Region, held at Beth Avraham Yoseph Synagogue, split into three groups, corresponding to three pre-selected sites, chosen for their potential for lower-cost housing. Each group was given site plans and a list of special considerations for its location.

For one location, the future site of Temple Kol Ami on Dufferin Street north of Highway 7 in Vaughan, Kol Ami has stipulated that any development must preserve the property's natural maple grove. The other two sites, one also in Vaughan and the other in Newmarket, presented different challenges, from how to deal with hydro lines to parking considerations and public transit access.

Currently, almost half of York Region's renters and one-quarter of homeowners spend more than 30 per cent of their income on housing, a standard measure of affordability. Average resale home prices and rents in York Region have ballooned over the last 10 years, while vacancies have plummeted to 0.7 per cent.

The Jewish community is particularly vulnerable. York Region is anticipating a mass migration of Jews over the next few years, from 45,000 currently to 75,000 by 2011. Meanwhile, the number of seniors will triple, along with other potentially at-risk populations.

No new social housing has been built since the loss of government funds in 1995, a problem addressed by Newmarket Mayor Tom Taylor in his opening comments.

Taylor, chair of York Region's community services and housing committee, said the event was timely, in light of a recent York Region bylaw that offers private-sector incentives in exchange for commitments to provide affordable housing.

The workshop's intense number-crunching was followed by a wrap-up session over a bagel lunch. Representatives summarized their groups' brainstorming efforts, describing the kind of residences they had determined would best suit each location. They also provided detailed construction estimates and the average monthly cost to live in the units.

Several common elements emerged: all plans relied on "stick construction," wood-frame, low-rise structures, which, though they yield fewer units, ultimately offer much lower per-unit costs. The groups also factored in known incentives, such as York Region's Development Charge grants, which could lower the cost of building a two-bedroom apartment or townhouse by $6,000 to $8,000. Proposed monthly rents varied greatly depending on unit size and location, but generally ranged from $700 to $1,100.

Proposals also addressed human factors, describing how structures would meet the needs of at-risk populations, including seniors and people with disabilities. Other considerations, gleaned from participants' professional experience, ranged from accessibility and flameproofing to cost scalability and ownership subsidies.

Bagels to Bricks has become an annual event for Kehilla. The 2001 program focused on project possibilities within the GTA. Kehilla has built and still manages two non-profit housing projects in the GTA, and has partnered with organizations including the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, NaMeRes (Native Mens' Residence) and Ve'ahavta to promote housing solutions for diverse sectors.

Barry Bernstein, vice-president of Temple Kol Ami seemed pleased at the prospect of affordable homes sharing his synagogue's beautiful wooded property.

"We've got almost six acres," he offered with a smile. "There should be enough room."

WHY DEMOCRACIES SHOULD SUPPORT ISRAEL

David Kirk, co-editor, will discuss the revised work of late Dutch-Canadian journalist Pierre Van Paassen. Van Paassen, one of the greatest Christian friends of the Jewish people, was among the first to warn the world of Hitler's intentions and to join forces with the "extremists" who demanded there be a Jewish army.

The public is welcome to attend the launch of this important book.

IDF choir puts on rousing performance in Toronto

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Orit Karasso, a major in the Israel Defence Forces, was on duty in Toronto and Montreal recently in the combined roles of commanding officer, "mom" and spokesperson for the IDF Choir.

While the six-person troupe – five singers and a keyboardist, plus their 23-year-old sound engineer – rehearsed for an evening performance at Toronto's Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation, co-sponsored by the synagogue and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, Karasso, 33, discussed the role of the Jerusalem-based performers.

Although such troupes are part of an IDF tradition dating back more than 40 years, now that terrorism has increased, the choir is more popular than ever, Karasso said.

"The soldiers need a lift. This war was forced upon us."

On the other hand, she noted, there is still normal life in Israel. "It seems that people here think that in Israel, it's one big battle."

The troupe that visited Canada is one of about 20 such groups. Singer Alon Litvak, 20, told The CJN that the troupe's performances bring smiles to the soldiers' faces and keep them motivated. "That is why I'm doing this kind of job," he said.

IDF choir member Matan Dagan sings My Yiddishe Mameh to an audience member at a recent concert in Toronto. [Eve Marks photo]

Ilil Tamir, also 20, has always loved to sing. Her father, a professional singer, used to perform in a band. "I said to myself, if I love to make people happy [by singing], why don't I do it in the army?"

But with daily rehearsals, and cross-country travel to places such as Hebron and Gaza, where tensions are highest, it's a lot of work, Tamir said.

"The job they do is very important," said Karasso. "Their goal is to make the soldiers happy, to give them some relief from the fighting, an hour to sing, to smile, to forget all their other problems. The soldiers love them."

The audience at Beth David had a chance to see why later that evening, when the performers strutted their high-energy, rousing, interactive stuff before an appreciative crowd that clapped and danced along for much of the evening.

Although their repertoire includes rock and pop music ("things the soldiers like," Karasso said), here they stuck to more traditional standards – such as Adon Olam, a Sephardi medley, Halleluyah and a heartfelt version of Naomi Shemer's Jerusalem of Gold.

There was even a bilingual Hebrew and Yiddish version of My Yiddishe Mameh, highlighting the cantorial prowess of Matan Dagan, 20, who sprinted into the audience to clasp the hand of a white-haired woman and sing to her.

Despite what is happening in Israel, "Israelis still have hope," Litvak told the audience in his introduction to Ani Noladti La'Shalom (I Was Born to Peace).

The theme of solidarity with Israel was stressed by the performers and representatives of the evening's sponsors: Cantor Marshall Loomer of Beth David and Dodi Weill, a UJA Federation lay leader, who were both in Israel recently on missions organized by their respective institutions. UJA Federation raised $61.3 million this year to assist terror victims and provide other social services, Weill noted.

'Hockey mom' gets double dose of naches

By HEATHER CHEIFETZ SHERMAN
Special to the CJN

Andrea Iscoe received a double-dose of naches in the mail recently – from royalty, no less.

First, Iscoe received an invitation to an awards ceremony from the Duke of Edinburgh. The invitation announced that her eldest son Alex, 22, was a winner of the Duke of Edinburgh's Gold Award of Achievement for demonstrating excellence in leadership and skill development, physical fitness and expeditions, and community service.

Days later, another invitation arrived in her mailbox. This time, her husband Dr. Neill Iscoe, a medical oncologist with the Sunnybrook Regional Cancer Centre, was being awarded with the Queen's Golden Jubilee Medal by Ontario Lt.-Gov. James Bartleman.

A Canadian Cancer Society volunteer for more than two decades, Neill was being honoured for his dedication to the charity.

The Duke of Edinburgh's Award was founded in 1956 in the United Kingdom by Prince Philip to encourage personal development and community involvement in young people. The program, which operates in more than 90 countries, has Bronze, Silver and Gold Awards, and is open to all young people between the ages of 14 and 25.

To satisfy the criteria for the award, Alex coached hockey several times a week, enrolled in a week-long wilderness emergency response course and worked as business editor of his high school yearbook at Upper Canada College.

"The award is based completely on your own initiative," says Alex, who is currently finishing up a business degree at the University of Western Ontario. "So you have to be really motivated."

Alex, who was hired recently by CIBC World Markets, will begin work in one of the investment bank's New York offices next summer.

Neill's work in cancer treatment and research began when he was at McGill University's medical school in Montreal. Losing his mother to the disease in 1974 also had an impact on his career, he says.

"It gives me a much better perspective into what cancer patients and their families go through," he says. "I think it makes me a better doctor."

Andrea says community service has always been top priority for the Iscoe family, which also includes Ben, 20, and Charlie, 15.

"They all grew up with a great sense of community and giving back," Andrea says, referring to their help in such events as fundraisers for the Sunnybrook Cancer Clinic. "We did it as a family."

But there were sacrifices. Neill's donating close to 40 hours a month to charity work took a significant chunk out of the family's quality time together, he says.

"I missed some hockey games," Neill says. "That's probably what they remember most."

Andrea Iscoe with her two award winners, husband Neill and son Alex.

Andrea, a self-admitted "hockey nut," who has her late father's Maple Leaf Gardens chair prominently displayed in her dining room, says the sport has been the mainstay of the Iscoe family since her three sons were born. She credits hockey with giving them strong self-esteem, a healthy competitive attitude and an ambitious streak.

Both Ben and Charlie have big-league ambitions.

Ben, who is currently studying radio and television arts at Ryerson University, hopes to go to Hollywood one day.

After finishing high school, Charlie hopes to win a hockey scholarship to a top American university, although, he says that at the moment, he has no desire to play professionally in the NHL.

"I haven't got it all figured out just yet," he grins.

No matter, says mom, as long as all of her men are happy.

"I want them to be focused," Andrea says. "But I also want them to be keen and curious, to see and do a lot, to be capable and explore."

A Taste Of Canada

It may take 11 non-stop flight hours to reach Ben Gurion Airport from Toronto, but set aside physical distance and you'll see that Israel and Canada are closely connected. So, if you're looking for a taste of Canada in Israel, eh, here's where to turn.

Canada Centre, Metulla – There's nothing else like it in all of Israel – an all purpose recreation complex, housing two skating rinks – one Olympic size, a large swimming pool a basketball court and even a bowling alley (sorry, it's 10 pin). Canada Centre, built by Canadian donations to the UIA network is the jewel of Metulla, where you're likely to see future skating superstars practising their award-winning moves.

Skating & Hockey – Hockey in Israel is alive and well at four rinks across the country. Israel's first hockey school started in 1986 and the Israeli national team has been competing since the 1989-90 season. There's even an ice skating rink on the Mediterranean coast - in Bat Yam - just south of Tel Aviv.

Ayalon Park – Located between Tel Aviv and Jerusalem, the 7500-acre park, built by the Jewish National Fund of Canada, is a huge refuge for recreation or relaxation in the biblical Ayalon valley.

Eilat/Elot & Beersheba – Israel's southernmost region is twinned with Toronto under the Jewish Agency's Partnership 2000 program. Montreal is closely linked with Beersheba and Western Canada is connected to the Galilee.

Discovering Canada in Israel is one more reason to visit our magnificent country, knowing how much the people of Israel appreciate your presence and the positive impact of your trip on Israel's struggling economy.

After all, Israel is yours. So please say I care and I'm going.

Dessen was 'dedicated to his beliefs and values'

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Community leader Harold Dessen died recently of cancer. He was 81.

Dessen was particularly passionate about Jewish education and scholarship, his granddaughter Sharrona Pearl said at his funeral.

Obituary

Dessen was an active leader at Associated Hebrew Schools, having served as school president, honorary chairman of the board of governors, chair of the va'ad hachinuch and chair of the budget and finance committee and the scholarship and endowment fund committee.

He was also a past president of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) and a life member of its board of directors. As well, he was involved with the funding arms of UJA Federation and its predecessors, and worked to ensure proper funding for Jewish day schools.

For many years, he was also active in the Chug HaTanach, a group that included Rabbi Leo Jacober and Jack Burke of Associated who gathered every second week to study Torah. At least once a year, Dessen led the session.

Pearl said her grandfather was "a proud man, dedicated to his beliefs and values." He had a passion for life, she said.

Dessen was a chartered accountant, who worked with numbers and statistics his whole life, but he had a romantic side.

He loved poetry, Pearl said, and wrote a special poem for every family anniversary, birthday or special event.

Rabbi Benjamin Friedberg, Dessen's brother-in-law, said Dessen was self-disciplined, making it a point to keep fit by adhering to a healthy diet and exercising, even when he was ill.

He insisted on the highest standards, not only for himself, but in the causes he championed, especially education.

Dessen was born in Toronto and grew up on Henry Street, attending shul at Chevra Shas on Cecil Street and later on Bathurst Street, where he continued to go to say kaddish and where he began to study Talmud. He continued to study Talmud every Shabbat.

He grew up, Rabbi Friedberg said, "in a culture of learning," and was able to blend the "immigrant environment with the Canadian reality."

Dessen and his wife Eva recently celebrated their 59th anniversary. "They were the most beautiful couple," Pearl said. "There was magic in how they looked at each other."

Dessen is survived by his wife, Eva, daughters Susan Pearl and Serena Dessen, grandchildren Mayeer and Sharrona Pearl, and brother Sol. He was predeceased by brothers Jack, Harry, Sam and Morris.

Jewish students on campus celebrate a sweet peace

By SHIRA ZELIGER
Special to The CJN

"Peace by Piece, Peace is Possible" read the colourful poster above a huge table-sized cake with the message of the day written in frosting: "Celebrating 25 Years of Peace: Israel and Egypt."

This display of hope for and celebration of peace on Nov. 20 was made possible by the centres for Jewish campus life at York University, the University of Toronto (U of T) and Ryerson University.

The idea of distributing pieces of cake in celebration of Israel's peace efforts was proposed at the Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto (JCS) Israel Advocacy Retreat in October by Mike Schneider.

President and CEO of Rhino International Inc., a training and development company that works with university students, Schneider told the students it is one way Jewish students on campus can bring the issue of the Middle East to the general campus community, in a calm and positive manner.

To celebrate the 25th anniversary of former Egyptian president Anwar Sadat's historic trip to Jerusalem on Nov. 20, 1977, about 3,000 free pieces of cake, as well as stickers celebrating peace and leaflets explaining the anniversary, were handed out in busy areas of the three university campuses.

At York, many students said the Jewish Student Federation should be commended for taking a step in the right direction.

At U of T, hundreds of pieces of cake were distributed. "Everyone enjoyed the event whether it was for gastronomic or political reasons," said Adam Cutler, 20, chair of the student co-ordinating committee at the U of T Hillel-Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life.

"With the help of something universally tempting such as cake, we were able to educate those who were unfamiliar with Israel's continuous efforts to make peace with her neighbours," said Philip Abramson, a second-year engineering student at U of T.

At Ryerson, Gaby Hanna, president of Ryerson's Christian-Arab Association, assisted the Jewish Students Association (JSA) in distributing cake.

"The event was a wonderful way to calm tensions on campus and although the JSA does have a good working relationship with the Muslim Students Association, we wanted to promote Israel and show the campus community that we are a peace-loving and cake-eating group," said Elyse Zarek, a second-year journalism student at Ryerson. "It was definitely one of our best events so far."

Many students said it was a refreshing change to see positive and peaceful Israel advocacy on campus, since just a few weeks earlier, there were frequent outbreaks of disagreement between the Young Zionist Partnership and the Middle Eastern Students Association's Palestinian human rights committee at York University.

Since the event fell during the holy month of Ramadan, Muslim students were not able to participate. However, the Jewish Students Federation (JSF) at York gave the leftover cake to the Muslim Students Association to have when they broke their fast at nightfall.

JCS is preparing more activities that promote Israel in a positive light. The plans for Israel Fest 2003, to be held in January at university campuses across Ontario, are in full swing.

"While we are celebrating peace, we were also celebrating the bravery and vision of Anwar Sadat who made a historic move toward peace. Through Peace by Piece, we challenge the Palestinian leadership to follow in Sadat's vision and take steps toward a lasting peace," said Daniel Held, JSF's Israel affairs co-ordinator.

Shira Zeliger is a first-year religious studies major at York University as well as a member of the JSF Israel affairs committee.

Ont. students to party for Israel in Toronto

Jewish students representing almost a dozen campuses across Ontario are joining forces for an Israel fundraiser, to be held in Toronto.

Doors will open at 9:30 p.m. on Dec. 21 for a Winter Fundraiser for Israel, being held at Planet Hollywood, 277 Front St. W. All proceeds will go to the UIA Federations Canada Israel Emergency Relief Fund and Canadian Magen David Adom. Entry is $5, and all ages are welcome. A wristband policy will be in effect.

In May, a similar event at the Hard Rock Cafe at Skydome raised $3,500 for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Israel Emergency Campaign.

"We hope to exceed that," said Josh Shuval, immediate past president of the Jewish Students' Union at the University of Western Ontario, who is co-ordinating the event with Carly Shiner, president of McMaster University's Jewish Student Association (JSA).

"The vast majority of Jewish students who go to these [Ontario] campuses are from Toronto," said Shuval, explaining the rationale for holding the event in Toronto.

With the May event, and a leadership seminar held in October, "we've begun taking the first steps towards closer ties between campuses," he said.

For further information, contact Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto at 416-785-1465, London Jewish Campus Services at 519-642-3256, the JSA in Hamilton at 905-522-7215 or Regional Jewish Communities of Ontario at 416-697-3575.

'I was bashert to be a chazzan,' 22-year-old says

By PHYLLIS SHRAGGE
Hamilton Correspondent

HAMILTON — The youngest cantor in Canada, Cantor Shneur Bielak, 22, of Beth Jacob Synagogue, thanks God each day for providing him with a lifetime commitment to a calling that defines all aspects of his being.

"I'm eternally thankful that HaShem chose me to pray on behalf of others," Bielak said in an interview.

"Sometimes people regret what they are doing with their life. I respect my own decision. Every day I say the first prayer, and I really mean it. I am thankful to God for waking up in the morning," he said.

"Since I was little, one of my earliest memories was of my mother teaching me how to say the Shema. I still take time to speak to HaShem every night," Bielak said, adding he wants to help others make a similar connection.

"The most important thing to me is being a chazzan so I can bring people closer to HaShem. I want to share the feeling I feel with them. The best way I can do it is through the gift God gave me."

Cantor Shneur Bielak

He sees it as his calling.

"There is a difference between doing something you like and doing something that you were created to do," Bielak said. "I believe that this was my destiny. I was bashert to be a chazzan. This was my path."

Bielak, who has officiated at Beth Jacob since July, was certain about his destiny at a young age. When he became a bar mitzvah, he was overcome with a sense of spirituality. He said he felt close to God.

"I became elevated."

As a youngster in Toronto, he and his four brothers grew up listening to cantorial music in what he describes as a modern Orthodox home. "We would listen to it often, even in my father's van. On erev Shabbat, my mother would sing to a CD or a record."

Music was the focus of Bielak's life. He walked for hours to shuls in order to hear various chazzanim sing. He studied cantorial music on his own, using tapes, and he studied with various cantors. He also studied at the Royal Conservatory of Music.

At the age of 16, he was the High Holy Day cantor at a synagogue in Nova Scotia.

"That was the clincher. That was the point when I knew I could do it. I just had to continue to work at this."

He majored in religious studies at York University. Then he attended the cantorial program at Yeshiva University but dropped out after one semester. He now studies with Cantor David Nemtzov and Esther Gershony, a vocal coach, in Toronto.

Bielak was the cantor at Beth Radom Synagogue in Toronto for a year before becoming cantor at Beth Jacob. His position at Beth Jacob includes the responsibility of being administrator of the Hebrew school.

He said the cantor who had the greatest influence on him was Montreal's Sidney Dworkin, formerly of Toronto.

Bielak recalls Dworkin saying: "It is not enough to sing well. You have to incorporate being a chazzan into your life. You have to bring spirituality into people's lives when you are davening."

Bielak lives by that philosophy.

"For me davening and chazzanut are two things that have to come together. When you combine the chazzanut and the respect the liturgy deserves, it becomes something else. You have to get to a person's soul. You have to let them feel that closeness [to God] that you feel," Bielak said.

In preparation for High Holy Day services, he sits in his office for about 15 minutes in order to get into the spiritual mode." The words, "Know before whom you stand," inspire him, he said.

"You have to actually feel you are standing before God and treat the davening with that much respect."

Bielak's interests include an appreciation for opera and a passion for cars. He said the letters on his car license plate, "BRCH HSHM," exemplify the public expression of his love for God.

Catholic students create Holocaust exhibit in Winnipeg

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Jewish Museum of Western Canada's current exhibit contains works related to the Holocaust that come from a rather unusual source – the Grade 8 students at Holy Cross School, a private Catholic school here.

Holy Cross teacher Gerry Bohemier has been teaching a unit on the Holocaust for the past 10 years.

"It grew out of the issue of bullying in our school," says Bohemier.

"What the Nazis did was certainly a form of bullying on a very large scale. We were also discussing The Diary of Anne Frank. It just evolved from there."

Bohemier's Holocaust studies program also received a major boost from the late Hersh Zentner (who died last summer), a pioneer of Holocaust education in Manitoba.

"Hersh came to speak to us twice," Bohemier says. "He was a big influence in our moving from studying films and books to creating displays and presentations."

The exhibit at the JMWC, which opened Nov. 14 and runs to Jan. 10, focuses on individual stories of the Holocaust, Bohemier says.

Some of the projects are based on the story of Gerda Weisner, author of One Survivor Remembers. One group did a presentation on Katie Simmons, a Winnipegger who was recognized earlier this year by Yad Vashem for sheltering a Jewish family in wartime Holland.

"Some students did a presentation on a book called The Poisonous Mushrooms, written in Germany in the 1930s, which taught readers how to spot a Jewish person," Bohemier says.

One of the features of the exhibit, says curator Stephanie Middagh, are masks made by the students painted with images indicating what they learned about the Holocaust and how it made them feel.

Bohemier adds that what his students learn about the Holocaust significantly affects how they feel about people of other races.

"They develop greater respect for each other as well," he says.

The impact on their parents is also profound, Bohemier says.

"The parents were not really aware of what happened," he says. "When we were in high school and studied history, the Holocaust was never discussed. It seems that it has only been in the last 15 years that people have been studying the subject and talking about it.

"The parents have learned a lot from their children's displays and presentations. Some break down in tears."

As to the reaction of the Jewish community, Bohemier says it has been outstanding.

Middagh says more than 400 people showed up for the opening of the JMWC exhibit.

"We presented the displays at our school last year. This was the first time that the museum has invited us to mount an exhibit," Bohemier says.

10-year-old Winnipeger cuts his first CD

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Zach Raizman is in the very early years of what promises to be a brilliant career.

The 10-year-old Shore Elementary School student has already compiled a solid resume in the theatre and performing arts. Now, with the release of his first CD, he has become one of Canada's youngest original recording artists.

Raizman co-wrote the pop radio single A Child's Prayer, a call for peace, with Winnipeg-based music producer Danny Schur, who has worked with Canadian artists Chantal Kreviazuk and McMaster and James and wrote the musical The Bridge.

Schur describes Raizman as "an accomplished singer and wonderful talent whose song ideas are light years beyond kids his age."

For his part, Raizman says "it was very exciting working with Danny."

Singing is Raizman's passion, his mother, Louisa says.

He started singing when he was two years old and has been performing in musical theatre since he was five. His stage credits locally include Oliver, Ragtime, The Sound of Music, The Wizard of Oz, Anne of Green Gables and Footloose.

Earlier this year, Raizman won a gold medal for his singing in the Manitoba Dance Festival and was the recipient of the Child of the Year award and the Best TV Commercial award at a recent Model and Talent Search Canada competition.

Raizman also takes violin and piano lessons and has performed in several violin recitals.

He has also landed a role in Defending My Children, a film starring Diane Keaton being made for the Lifetime Cable Network in the United States that is filming in Winnipeg this month.

Louisa Raizman says her son's CD is currently available in Winnipeg, Toronto, Calgary and Los Angeles and more than 60 copies have already been sold.

The young singer-songwriter's goal is to one day become an internationally known singer.

Quebec MP criticized for Arafat greeting

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

Parliamentarians and Jewish community figures alike last week denounced Quebec member of Parliament Jean-Guy Carignan for sending out Christmas cards to his 2,000 constituents with a photograph of him posing with Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat.

Joyeux temps des Fêtes

The outrage was twofold: first, that a photo of Carignan with Arafat would be mailed out at public expense (the cards were printed and paid for by the House of Commons), and second, that an image of a man widely considered to be a terrorist would be used to deliver the traditional Yuletide message of peace and goodwill.

"This is outrageous for all Quebecers," Joseph Gabay, president of Canadian Jewish Congress' Quebec region (CJC-Q), said in an interview.

"This man is using your money and my money to send what he calls a peace message. But peace is not a controversial thing, and Arafat is at the centre of one of the biggest controversies in the world.

"Either this man [Carignan] has no judgment or he knew what he was doing. I suspect the latter. He even said he knew he might get a reaction."

Steven Slimovitch, national counsel for B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights, told The CJN he thought it was a joke when he first heard about the card.

"Here you have a card-carrying member of the Liberal party sending out a card like this," he said. "The average person who gets it is sure to think that this is government policy."

Slimovitch called on Prime Minister Jean Chrétien to "distance himself" from Carignan.

Others joining the chorus of condemnations included Canadian Alliance foreign affairs critic Stockwell Day and B'nai Brith Canada national president Rochelle Wilner.

Like Slimovitch, Day said the card would be construed as Liberal policy.

Carignan, 61, is a rookie MP for the federal riding of Quebec East. A member of the Liberal party, he has served as an independent since he quit the caucus following a conviction two years ago on a hit-and-run driving charge he is now appealing.

The photograph with Arafat was taken in Ramallah last May when Carignan spent a week in the Middle East with eight other MPs on a trip sponsored by Palestine House in Mississauga, Ont.

Last week, Carignan, who says he intends to rejoin the Liberal caucus when his case is resolved, acknowledged that he expected the card to arouse some controversy.

He seemed unruffled by the incident, reportedly stating that he had nothing against the "Jewish or Israeli people" and defending his decision on the basis that Arafat was a winner of the Nobel Peace Prize.

Carignan also noted that he'd recently attended a Chanukah party at the Israeli embassy and that if he went on a second junket to the Middle East paid for by the Israeli government, he would send out a card next year of a photo of him with Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon.

It was also reported that Carignan is a member of the Canada-Israel Parliamentary Association.

But Slimovitch rejected Carignan's defence of his actions.

> He even said he knew he might get a reaction

"My taxes are being used to show an MP's support for the PLO. It's completely unacceptable," he said.

Last Friday, an editorial in The Gazette referred to Carignan as "Arafat's little helper" and suggested that based on his own words, he was merely "angling" for another free trip to the Mideast.

"It's the only explanation we can come up with for the absurd picture Mr. Carignan has chosen to illustrate his Christmas cards to constituents," the editorial said.

Similarly, Gabay also thought it absurd that Carignan would send his constituents a seasonal message of peace with a picture of a man "whose credentials in terrorism are well-established."

Following the MPs' trip last May, Liberal MP Carolyn Parrish recommended in a report that "the occupation, with its brutality, destruction, humiliation and human rights violations, must end."

גידי קורן וחברים

מחנרים

חייתי בארץ למשך ארבעה ימים וחיפשתי לראות חצגה שמתאימה לטוח חמטוח שלי, או מצאתי את הצגת "מחנרים" של יחושוע סובול ששחקה ב 5 אחר חצחריים ועלתה עשרים שקל לכרטיס. העובדה שחחצגה רצה כבר ארבע מאות פעם אמרה לי שמדובר במופע שמי שיחצא ממנו ממלין לחבריו ללכת, מה עוד שלראות את מתי מושחטנו על חבמה זה פיטוץ בכל מקרה. "מחנרים" הוא סיפורו של ישיש ישראלי בן שמונים וחמש שבחיו היחידה חיח בארה"ב והטיפול בו מוטל על עובדת חוץ רומניה. חזקן חי לפעמים בחווה ולפעמים לפני ארבעים שנה. זה מקנה לחצגה, בנוסף להרבה רגעים מצחיקים, גם אפקט מאוד חזק של מישהו שחי לפני ארבעים שנה ואינו מאמין איך מתייחסים בישראל כיום לעובדים זרים. יש שם קטע של עובד זר שחור שבורח פצוע מן חמשטרה, וחישיש אינו מצליח להבין איך זה שאין לו פנקס קופת חולים. אין מה להגיד, סובול הוא חמחזאי הישראלי החשוב ביותר בדור הזה.

את חפקיד העובדת חזרה עושה סנדרה שדה, אשתו בחיים של מושחנוב שניחם, כמו גם חשחקנים האחרים עושים חפקידים מדהימים. כשחסטעו לארץ וחפשו את "מחנרים".

הפסנתרן

סרטו של רומן פולנסקי, במאי מהליגה הלאומית וניצול שואה, על הפסנתרן האנדי שפילמן, פסנתרן צעיר ומחונן לפני המלחמה, ששורד את השואה. זהו סרט מלא אכוריות מאין כמוה, דבר שכדאי שתקחו בחשבון טרם יציאתכם מן הבית. שפילמן ניצל, חוזר למעמדו הקודם בוורשה ונפטר בשיבה טובה בשנת אלפיים.

The Danish Play

קורות חייה של לוחמת חרות דניה, אנגס אוטוקן כפי שהומחזו על ידי נכדתו של אחיה, סוניה מילס. זהו מחזה שרץ בתיאטרון קאראגון עד ה 15 בדצמבר, כולל חצגות צהריים בשבת וראשון. הסיפור נוגע ללב עד דמעות ומרתק בו זמנית, וגם הנקודה היחודית מוסיפה לו רלוונטיות. הדנים, כזכור, מילטו את שבעת אלפי היהודים שלהם לשבדיה באוקטובר 1943, כשדלפה חידיעה שחגרמנים עומדים לשלוח אותם למחנות חשמדה. חמעטים שהגיעו למחנות זכו לביקורי חצלב האדום, ואף שחלק מהם מתו מחתנאים הקשים, איש לא הוצא להורג על ידי הנאצים, עקב חלחץ חדני. רוצו, רוצו, רוצו. זה יהיה אחד המחזות הטובים שתקראו.

מה יהיה

ישראל מותקפת היום על ידי חלאות אדם פלשתינאים, על ידי חלאת אל קאידה, ומצטרפים אליהם בשיר ורנה רבבות רבות של חלאות אירופאיות, שאותבות יהודים חלשים, ולא יכולות לסבול אותם מגרים על עצמם. הישראלים הם היום היהודים של העולם. ישראל נתמכת על ידי חלק מחעם היהודי. בתוך תחלק הזה התנקיד של ישראלים חייב לחיות מרכזי. אסור לנו לשבת בשקט. יכול כל אחד לבחור את חדרך שמתאימה לו ביותר לתמוך- בכסף, בפעילות, בקניית מוצרים ישראליים, בעידכון אלה שאנחנו בקשר איתם, בנסיעה לארץ- אין סוף דרכים. רק אל תשבו על הגדר. אבל שישאר בינינו.

עמוס עוז- סיפור על אחבה וחושך

אף שחוכרתי את הספר הזה עם יציאתו לאור, אני מתכוון לחזור אליו פעמים רבות, כי לדעתי תאוטוביוגרפיה חזו היא אחת היצירות הכי מדהימות שנכתבו בעברית.

עמוס עוז, ילד ירושלמי של שנות הארבעים מספר בתחילת הספר: "כמה תל אביב היתה רחוקה! במשך כל שנות ילדותי הייתי בתל אביב לא יותר מחמש שש פעמים....אצלנו בירושלים הלכו תמיד קצת כמו בחלוויה, או כמו שנכנסים באיחור לקונצרט: קודם שמים את קצה הנעל וטועמים בזהירות את השטח. אחר כך, כשכבר מניחים כף רגל, לא ממהרים להזיז אותה....מצד שני, אם כבר הגברת את כף רגלך-אל תמהר לשוב ולחניח אותה: מי ידע איזו פקעת צפענים רוחשת שם, צוררים, חורשי מזימות. חלוא במשך אלפי שנים אנחנו שילמנו מחיר דמים על פזיזותנו....

אבל בתל אביב, מה זה? כל חעיר היתה חרגול. חאנשים נהרו וחבתים נחרו וחתרבות וחכיכרות ורוח חים וחשדרות ואפילו העננים שבשמים.... בתל אביב הלכו אחרת: דילגו- ריחפו, כמו ניל ארמסטרונג על חירח....(סתר חוצאה לאור).

Media reports focus on shift in Palestinian strategy

According to Reports
By PAUL MICHAELS

In his column, "Modest glimmers of Mideast hope" (Globe and Mail, Nov. 29), Marcus Gee draws attention to two potentially positive developments in Israeli-Palestinian relations – the reconfirmation of Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon as Likud party leader, who campaigned against Benjamin Netanyahu on a platform of acceptance of some form of future Palestinian statehood; and the serious rethinking by senior Palestinian officials about the continued usefulness of terrorism against Israelis.

Gee is indeed correct when he writes, "Though most Israelis have lost faith in the Palestinian leadership after two years of suicide attacks, polls still show that most would support a Palestinian state if it brought peace." Israelis prefer the short term security that Sharon represents, while they tend to favour for the long-term the more dovish position of newly elected Labor leader Amram Mitzna.

While endorsing Mitzna's broad vision, a Nov. 22 Ha'aretz editorial called "Terror perpetuates conflict" cautions: "Until Palestinian society gives birth to a significant ideological and political movement that rejects the use of terror, it is difficult to see how Mitzna's doctrine could be accepted by the majority of Israeli voters. It is frustrating and outrageous to realize that the Palestinian public and its leaders do not understand that once again they are going to miss an opportunity for a positive change in relations between the two peoples."

This connects with the second positive development Gee describes – the growing recognition by senior Palestinian officials that terrorism has been a disaster for their own people, and has set back rather than advanced their cause for independence.

Citing the stinging criticism of the militants by senior PLO official Mahmoud Abbas (Abu Mazen), initially printed in the London-based Arabic daily Al-Hayat on Nov. 26, Gee notes that a number of important Palestinian personalities, including former Gaza security chief Mohammed Dahlan, are also calling publicly for an end to Palestinian terror.

Nabil Amr, a former Palestinian Authority minister, also wrote a now famous "Open Letter" to PA President Yasser Arafat in Al-Hayat al-Jadida (Sept. 2) in which he decried the lost opportunity for statehood the Palestinians had at Camp David in the summer of 2000:

"Didn't we jump for joy over the failure of Camp David? Didn't we throw mud at the picture of [former U.S.] president [Bill] Clinton who dared to submit a proposal for a state with some modifications? Didn't we do this? We are sincere with ourselves? No, we were not. This is because after two years of bloodshed we [now] accept what we rejected, perhaps because we know that it is impossible to achieve."

The voices of Mahmoud Abbas, Nabil Amr and several others, including prominent intellectual and PLO representative in Jerusalem Sari Nusseibeh (who urges that Palestinians reverse the "right of return" to present-day Israel if they wish to live in a true two-state arrangement) are beginning to resonate in mainstream western media outlets.

The Toronto Star's editorial, "Mideast mixed signals" (Dec. 1), reflects on the implications of such messages for Arafat: "If Arafat cannot bring himself to challenge this view [that terror is justified] publicly and forcefully, he should bow out. To be credible peace partners Palestinian leaders must make themselves heard for peace above the noise of rockets, bombs and guns. They haven't yet."

The fate of Palestinian national aspirations could well rest on Arafat's response to such internal pressure for a fundamental shift in strategy.

Hillel promises to fight CSU ban in court

The CSU Council of Representatives passed a resolution by a vote of 8-to-1 demanding that Hillel apologize and that the Concordia administration investigate whether Hillel has violated Canadian law and university anti-racism rules.

CSU councillor Adam Slater, who presented the motion, cited the Foreign Enlistment Act, which makes it an offence to recruit within Canada for the armed forces of any foreign state. The council also mentioned an earlier student decision forbidding military recruitment on campus.

Hillel was also reprimanded because the flyer states the program is for Jews only.

Hillel co-president Noah Joseph, a CSU council member and the single dissenter in the vote, acknowledges that the flyers were displayed on a Hillel information table for about two hours.

Joseph, however, believes the CSU action is unjust because Hillel was not given fair hearing before the suspension was imposed. Hillel also believes the motion was a pretext to shut down the Jewish student group, because left-wing, pro-Palestinian CSU members don't like Hillel's pro-Israel activism.

"The CSU appointed itself judge, jury and executioner, all within half an hour," Joseph said.

The motion means Hillel will not get the $3,000 the CSU has allotted to it in its current budget and the CSU will not sanction its information tables, posters or booking of space on campus.

The suspension comes just over a week after Hillel regained its right to hold activities related to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. On Nov. 25, Concordia's administration lifted the moratorium on all such activities, which it imposed after a violent protest on Sept. 9 against former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu

In defiance of the suspension, Hillel held a Chanukah celebration and protest rally against the CSU action last Thursday afternoon in the main auditorium of Concordia's Hall building, with the administration's permission. More than 400 students and community leaders attended the event, where a small group of pro-Palestinian students heckled Rabbi Reuben Poupko while he was speaking.

Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights (SPHR) activist Samer Elatrash, who is facing criminal charges related to the events of Sept. 9, was arrested outside the hall for what a police spokesperson called breach of the conditions of his bail.

In its lawyer's letter, Hillel noted that Elatrash was present and spoke at the CSU meeting where the resolution was passed, and that this may violate the restrictions placed on his activities on campus while he is out on bail.

At least a dozen police vans with helmeted officers were on standby outside Concordia during the Hillel rally.

Hillel contends the CSU contravened its own bylaws which require distribution of its meeting's agenda at least five days in advance. Joseph said Hillel was informed of the planned motion only on the afternoon before the Dec. 2 evening meeting. The motion was introduced close to midnight as "new business."

"The councillor who moved the resolution obviously put a significant amount of time into the wording of the motion and easily could have submitted the motion earlier and given us a chance to investigate the issue properly," Joseph said. "He decided specifically not to do so and council supported these ambush tactics.

Initially, the motion was ruled out of order by CSU council chair Omar Badawi because of the lack of notice. But that was overturned by a majority vote of the council.

Hillel also contends the CSU is misinterpreting the Foreign Enlistment Act.

Concordia spokesperson Chris Mota said last week the university's legal counsel is studying the matter, but had no further comment.

CSU vice-president Aaron Maté said he feels that if Hillel apologized and agreed to not do the same thing again, the CSU might rescind the resolution. "For me it would suffice, but for others it might not," he said.

The flyer, headlined Volunteer for the IDF/MAHAL 2000, appears to be a printout from Mahal's Web site.

Mahal, a Hebrew acronym for "Volunteers from outside Israel," has been around since 1948, when many Jews from abroad, including Canadians, fought in Israel's war of independence. Today, it is open to Jewish men and women aged 18 to 30. They receive basic training and Hebrew instruction before performing nine months of active service in either combat or non-combat units.

Volunteers receive Israeli temporary resident status before enlisting.

The 1985 Foreign Enlistment Act makes it illegal to recruit Canadians to join a foreign army, but it is not illegal for Canadians to volunteer to join one.

The act states that "any person who, within Canada, recruits or otherwise induces any person or body of persons to enlist or to accept any commission or engagement in the armed forces of any foreign state or other armed forces operating in that state is guilty of an offence."

An exception is made for foreign consular officers who are appealing to nationals of their country.

Anat Uzzan, director of the Israel Aliyah Centre in Montreal, said Canadians have a long history of Mahal service, but the organization does not actively recruit in Canada. "Most people know other people who did it or go to Israel and hear about it, or see it on the Internet," she said.

Hillel is also peeved with the CSU because at the same meeting it rejected a request by Hillel that it be co-sponsor of a conference on anti-Semitism the CSU plans to hold early next semester, an idea put forward by CSU president Sabine Friesinger.

"The CSU wants to have a conference on hatred against Jews and yet... it specifically does not want the Jewish student group to take part in the planning of the conference. I'm afraid we're going to have our own little Durban here at Concordia," Joseph said.

Researcher works toward gene therapy for cancer

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Dr. Varda Rotter reaches for the sugar packets on the table – not to add to her coffee, but to illustrate a point.

A genetic engineer and senior researcher at the Weizmann Institute of Science in Rehovot, Rotter, 55, has been studying the tumour-suppressing P53 gene in cancer development for the past two decades, ever since her days as a post-doctoral researcher at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, just before she returned to Israel and the Weizmann Institute.

Dr. Varda Rotter

Deftly snaking a pink paper packet of sweetener along the table and off to one side, Rotter metaphorically eliminates a P53 gene that has gone "bad," marking an "x" on it in pen for good measure.

The gene, she explained in a recent interview in a downtown Toronto hotel, is normally a "guardian" that signals cancer cells to stop proliferating, first sensing the error that has caused them to become cancerous and then correcting it.

Errors in a cell can be addressed in two ways by the body, Rotter explained.

Either a cell undergoes a DNA "repair pattern," or if damaged cells are not repairable, they are killed off and replaced by healthy new cells. "This is how we take care of ourselves, " Rotter said.

"This is the fascinating thing," she said. "If we understand what nature is doing [when P53 is working properly], maybe we can mimic it."

Almost 60 per cent of primary tumours – representing a variety of types of cancer, including lung, colon and breast cancer – are associated with mutations in the P53 gene, she said.

"Cancer is basically a disease of the genetic material," she said. "Mistakes in the gene can happen when you walk in the street, when you eat, but sometimes we are born with a defective gene."

Theoretically, she said, it is possible to fix such mistakes using cloned DNA from normal cells, although methods need to be refined.

"We have known how for about 10 years... This brings us to a whole new field: gene therapy – to fix genes and to restore genes."

In the case of P53, gene therapy is "a little complicated," Rotter said, "because two things are happening. We lose the 'good' P53 gene, but probably gain a 'bad' one. The strategy has to be in two steps. It's a complicated scenario, to get rid of the bad one and introduce a good P53."

The purpose of Rotter's recent visit here was to strengthen ties with colleagues at Mount Sinai Hospital who are involved in cancer research.

She also hopes to collaborate with doctors there on the prevention of infertility, one of three major thrusts – along with osteoporosis and cancer research – of the year-old Center for Women's Health that Rotter heads at Weizmann and that was funded to a significant extent by Murray and Marvelle Koffler of Toronto.

"We have a number of connections with institutions, but not with hospitals," Rotter said. Joining forces with doctors who treat patients will be mutually beneficial, she feels. "We are really basic [lab] research."

A proposed boycott of Israeli scientists involved with the European Molecular Biology Organization earlier this year, while troubling, has not affected Rotter's research, she said.

"In Israel we cannot live without connections to the outside world, and Europe is our prime base," she said. "We were lucky enough that German, French and English scientists decided in a very strong way to ignore this boycotting of Israel.

"It was a very tough time. We felt that science should not involve politics at all, and here comes politics and dictates science. Science has no countries. Science is freedom of the mind, with no limitations... Science cannot be isolated. We have lots of collaborations with European labs."

In addition, she noted, Weizmann has scientific collaborations in North America and Asia.

Seniors recall their youth at Club Anon reunion

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

In 1937, a handful of Jewish teenage boys came together to create Club Anon as a music appreciation group. It grew to some 55 members and later their girlfriends and spouses formed their own group called Nona – "Anon" spelled backwards.

Recently, more than 40 men and women between 75 and 85 years old, gathered for lunch at Milk and Honey Restaurant for an informal Club Anon reunion.

Willie (Bill) Rotman, 80, the organizer of the reunion along with Reuben Farberman, Sam Burke and Sid Gladstone, said the original social group met in private homes, but in 1941, they rented rooms at 572 Bloor St. W.

When they had to pay the first month's rent, they needed a club name for the receipt, so it was made out to anonymous. "So we just shortened it to Anon," says Rotman.

The club's first official party was held New Year's Day 1942. The club room had music equipment, a ping pong table and comfortable sofas.

"It was a place where we could shmooze, bring our dates and girlfriends, play music and dance." He adds that the group had some "notable" members – including artist Abba Bayefsky and pianist Harry Yolleck.

Rotman spent five years in the Royal Canadian Air Force and many other Anon members were in the armed forces during World War II.

During those years, younger members were brought into the group. When the war ended and the servicemen returned, they found they were not compatible with the younger group and this eventually led to the club's breakup.

Rotman said Rabbi David Monson was the group's honorary president. "Rabbi Monson would bring in Jewish young men to Club Anon from smaller communities who didn't know many people in Toronto."

Over the years, many of the members lost touch. In 1989, led by Rotman, Club Anon members held their first reunion at Adath Sholom Synagogue.

"When we got older," Rotman said, "it became important for us to reconnect. It was wonderful meeting people we lost touch with – many we hadn't seen for more than 50 years. We were very emotional."

At an interview in their home, Rotman's wife Goldie, who was a member of Nona, said she "felt such a warmth between the men. At first, some didn't recognize each other, but when they found out who it was, they were thrilled, they embraced."

Says Rotman: "As the years go by we feel closer and closer. And many of us now keep in touch."

The group now meets more frequently at various places. Sadly, he said, "Our members are dying off and we want to squeeze in more simchas."

At the most recent get-together, Gladstone presented Rotman with a certificate of appreciation on behalf of the members for his leadership in organizing the Anon reunions.

Israel warned of Al Qaeda threat in Prague

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — As word came Sunday of an Al Qaeda plan to target Jews and Israelis in Prague, a spokesperson for the terror network admitted in a Web posting it was behind twin attacks on Israeli targets in Kenya and in a second audiotaped message warned of more attacks.

Meanwhile, Israel's security establishment believes Al Qaeda activists in Lebanon are directing Palestinian terrorists based in Gaza. As well, the first Palestinian to be charged with undergoing training at an Al Qaeda base in Afghanistan has confessed to most of the charges against him.

In an audiotape message attributed to Al Qaeda spokesperson Soliman Abu Ghaith and broadcast on the Al Jazeera satellite channel, the group promised to pursue its enemies wherever they are.

Prior to the release Sunday of the audiotape message, a security source said, without giving details, that Israel has received intelligence information warning of plans by Al Qaeda to attack Jews and Israelis in Prague.

The capital of the Czech Republic is a popular travel destination for Israelis.

The source said Israel has received information from several foreign intelligence agencies warning of Al Qaeda plans to target Israelis overseas.

After the Nov. 28 attacks in Mombasa, Kenya, the Foreign Ministry issued travel advisories warning of potential danger to Israelis in Ethiopia, Eritrea, South Africa, Kenya and parts of Thailand.

No advisory has been issued for the Czech Republic, the ministry said.

Last week, Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Chief of Staff Moshe Ya'alon said Al Qaeda is trying to send terrorists to Israel and the territories. They apparently were referring to information about Al Qaeda operatives in Lebanon, refugees from the U.S. assault on Afghanistan who are working with Hezbollah to direct terrorists in Gaza.

Israeli military intelligence believes that despite U.S. operations in Afghanistan, Al Qaeda operatives are still active there and are involved in trying to establish terror cells in the territories. Their main route is through Lebanon. Directives to a Lebanese cell of Muslim extremists who tried to blow up the Allenby Bridge and to attack Christian pilgrims on the eve of the millennium also reached them through Lebanon, with help from Hezbollah.

But over the weekend, both Hezbollah and the Palestinian Authority's Preventive Security apparatus denied Sharon's and Ya'alon's charges and claimed there is no Al Qaeda connection to Hezbollah or to Gazans. Israel believes they were both quick to disassociate themselves from Al Qaeda, fearing a vehement U.S. reaction.

In another new statement attributed to Al Qaeda posted on a militant Web site Sunday, Al Qaeda threatens faster, harder strikes against the United States and Israel "on land, air and sea."

"The Jewish Crusader coalition will not be safe anywhere from the fighters' attacks," the statement said, using a term common among Islamic militants for what they see as a U.S.-Israeli alliance. "We will hit the most vital centres and we will strike against its strategic operations with all possible means."

The Web statement was also attributed to Abu Ghaith. The site, which has posted previous statements attributed to Al Qaeda, included what appeared to be an old newspaper photograph of Abu Ghaith with the statement.

The whereabouts of Abu Ghaith, along with Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden, have been a mystery since the network was chased out of its Afghan haven by U.S. bombing after the Sept. 11 attacks.

"We will chase the enemy with terrifying weapons," Sunday's Web statement said. "We have to widen our fighting fronts and conduct more concentrated and faster operations... so [the enemy] feels unsafe and unstable on land, air and sea."

The statement also said a recent Al Qaeda claim of responsibility for the Nov. 28 attacks in Kenya was genuine. U.S. officials have said they consider the claim of responsibility to be credible.

It has been difficult to trace and confirm postings attributed to Al Qaeda that appear periodically on several Web sites. The sites themselves often disappear and reappear, changing addresses as those who run them try to avoid being identified or after the Internet service providers shut down sites that have drawn the attention of law enforcement authorities and journalists.

Neo-Nazis marched in Berlin during Israeli president's visit

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

BERLIN — German neo-Nazis marched in Berlin Monday in protest of a visit by Israeli President Moshe Katsav, compounding awkwardness for a German government already under pressure to supply military hardware to its ally.

Berlin police approved the planned route along the central Unter den Linden avenue, where hundreds of supporters of the far-right NPD party marched with the theme "Hands off Palestine – No German Weapons for Israel."

Police said there is no law to prevent the march, although Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder's government is trying to ban the NPD, or National Democratic Party, a party it likens to the Nazis. German authorities had been trying to move the march out of sight to the outskirts of the city.

Three counter demonstrations were also planned, which police estimated would bring out an additional 900 people protesting against the neo-Nazi display and showing solidarity with Israel.

On the second day of a three-day visit to Germany, Katsav was received with military honours Monday by his German counterpart before a meeting with Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder and a visit to a former concentration camp.

Katsav was greeted at the Bellevue Palace by President Johannes Rau, who had accompanied him at the dedication of a new synagogue in the western city of Wuppertal on Sunday. The Israeli president urged Germans to fight against anti-Semitism before that ceremony, and renewed the message in an interview Monday with the mass-circulation Bild daily.

"Hostility toward Jews in Europe is increasing – synagogues are being stoned," Katsav said. "Every leading politician in the free world must recognize that democracy as a whole is attacked by such actions."

Germany, burdened by guilt over the Holocaust, has been a close ally of the Jewish state for decades, but Israel's request has put Berlin in a quandary.

It has agreed to supply Israel with U.S.-built Patriot missiles to help defend Israel if Iraq launches Scud missiles against it as during the 1991 Gulf War, but has balked at the idea of supplying troop carriers.

Germany's Greens, coalition partners to Schroeder's Social Democrats, have been particularly concerned at the idea of German vehicles being used in operations in Palestinian areas.

Delivery of military hardware not exclusively defensive in nature could also hurt Schroeder's anti-war credentials. His firm opposition to joining a U.S.-led war against Iraq helped him narrowly win re-election in September.

But Katsav told Der Spiegel magazine on Saturday he would be "very disappointed" if Berlin said 'No' to Israel.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ariel Sharon said last Thursday that he was not ruling out evacuating Israeli communities as part of a final status agreement with the Palestinians.

Speaking to a meeting of news editors in Tel Aviv, Sharon said that with the implementation of the June 24 plan proposed by U.S. President George W. Bush, Israel would create a contiguous area of territory that would allow the Palestinians to travel from Jenin to Hebron without passing any Israeli roadblocks. The prime minister said he would allow this to take place only after an end to terror and the replacement of the current Palestinian leadership.

In his most detailed acceptance yet of Bush's "vision" for peace between Israel and the Palestinians, Sharon told the Herzliya conference on national security last Wednesday that if he is re-elected, he will form a unity government based on the "Bush framework."

Sharon said, "President Bush's framework will be brought to the government I intend to form after the elections for approval, and I will work with all my strength to make it as broad a unity government as possible."

The prime minister said that in the first stage, the Palestinian Authority (PA) must go through comprehensive security and governmental reforms that would lead to a new government that is "honest and wants peace," while the current PA President Yasser Arafat would be moved out of a position of power and into a symbolic role.

In the second stage of this plan, he said, "Israel will allow the establishment of a Palestinian state with temporary borders." The prime minister said those temporary borders would include 42 per cent of the West Bank, "except for areas vital for security."

Sharon praised the close relations between his government and the United States and said the understandings with the administration "allow us the freedom of action needed for the war on terror." He said he believes that in the coming months, Israel will receive special economic aid from the United States.

He said political concessions are "not retractable," and that Israel will not return to control those areas it withdrew from as part of political agreements.

Ariel Sharon

He said the third and last stage of the Bush plan would mean negotiations for the final status of the Palestinian state and its permanent borders. But, he said, "we will not move from stage to stage until there is a proved state of quiet relations, a change in the Palestinian manner of government and growing and strengthening coexistence."

He finished his speech by saying, "These decisions are not easy for me and I will not deny that I harbour doubts and fears. But I have reached the conclusion that given the current reality, regionally and internationally, the State of Israel must act courageously to accept the political framework I described. There are risks, but the opportunities are enormous."

Both right- and left-wing leaders voiced criticism over Sharon's statements in support of Bush's framework. National Religious Party leader Effi Eitam said the establishment of a Palestinian state poses an existential threat to Israel and Labor party chairman Amram Mitzna referred to Sharon's remarks as a campaign slogan.

Gazan admits Al Qaeda links

Meanwhile, sentencing will be handed down soon in the case of Nabil Ukal, arrested 2½ years ago at the Rafah border crossing on his way to a bin Laden training base in Afghanistan. Ukal, a Jabalya refugee camp resident, is on trial at a military tribunal at the Erez junction. He admitted to most of the charges against him as part of a plea bargain.

After he was arrested, Shin Bet described Ukal as bin Laden's emissary to the territories to establish an Al Qaeda cell there. The corrected charge sheet, however, accuses Ukal of undergoing weapons and sabotage training outside the territories, contacts with a hostile organization and conspiracy to commit a crime. The indictment does not mention the kind of plotting ascribed to him when he was arrested, but does detail Ukal's activities in Pakistan and Afghanistan.

According to the charges, Ukal first went to Pakistan in October 1997, first to undergo training in a base run by Al Ansar, an extremist Islamic group in Kashmir. From there he was sent by a Palestinian clergyman to Kabul, where Ukal met with a man dubbed only Abu Hamza, described as a bin Laden assistant. They went through a month-long training course at a bin Laden camp in Jalalabad. He was in touch with activists in the United States, Britain and Pakistan who are linked to a group called World Jihad, receiving instructions from them on how to set up an independent terror network in Gaza on his return.

The Week in Israel

Dec. 2

• The Israeli army announced plans to demolish 15 Palestinian-owned properties along a route used by Jewish worshippers going to pray at the Tomb of the Patriarchs in Hebron. Protective walls will be built along the corridor. The project was set in motion after Palestinian terrorists killed 12 Israelis on Nov. 15 on their way back from praying at the tomb.

Dec. 3

• Israel will continue its anti-terror operations in the Gaza Strip, Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz said. Mofaz said that in the past two years, the army has destroyed some 50 underground tunnels used by Palestinians to smuggle weapons from Egypt.

Dec. 4

• The Israeli army closed Israeli-Palestinian liaison offices in Ramallah and Jenin because there was no longer any co-ordination between the sides. Moreover, army personnel were considered to be at risk.

• Israeli inventors won the top three prizes at the 54th International Inventions Exhibition in Nuremberg, Germany. The exhibition displayed 680 entries from 40 different countries.

Dec. 5

• UN workers in the West Bank and Gaza Strip condemned the Israeli army for allegedly impairing their relief work. A petition by dozens of UNWRA workers denounced Israel for "continuing acts of violence against UN workers."

Dec. 6

• Israeli army troops, backed by tanks and helicopter gunships, hunted a fugitive militant in a crowded refugee camp in the Gaza Strip in the early morning, setting off battles that killed 10 Palestinians, including two UN schoolworkers.

Canada splits votes on new UN resolutions

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Six resolutions, some critical of Israel, were passed by the United Nations General Assembly last week.

Canada voted for three of the resolutions while abstaining on three.

The resolutions advocate a peaceful end to the Arab-Israeli conflict, demand a speedy resumption of the peace process, espouse a two-state solution in Israel's struggle with the Palestinians, urge Israel to withdraw to the 1967 armistice lines, call on Israel to repeal its annexation of eastern Jerusalem, and denounce terrorism.

Approved by lopsided majorities, they are not legally binding, as are Security Council resolutions.

Along with 159 other countries, Canada supported a resolution advocating a peaceful settlement of the "Palestine question."

Last year, Canada abstained.

Opposed by four countries – Israel, United States, Marshall Islands and Federated States of Micronesia – the resolution broadly supports a solution in which Israel and a Palestinian state can live side by side within secure and recognized borders.

It urges Israel and the Palestinians to co-operate with all current international efforts, including those of the United States and the European Union, to settle the conflict through diplomatic means.

The resolution also describes Jewish settlements in the territories as illegal and takes note of "the deepening humanitarian crisis" facing the Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

Expressing "grave concern" about Israel's repeated raids into Palestinian autonomous areas and its reoccupation of major Palestinian towns in the area, the resolution stresses the need for a "complete cessation of all acts of violence."

In addition, the resolution calls on Israel to return to the pre-1967 borders and backs a solution to the Palestinian refugee problem based on a 1948 UN resolution.

In a Department of Foreign Affairs press release, Canada said it supported the resolution "because of our firm commitment to finding a peaceful resolution" to the Arab-Israeli dispute.

"We believe there is no military solution," the release added. "Violence must end and negotiations must resume."

During the debate, Israel's UN representative, Yehuda Lancry, defended Israeli policies and declared that any efforts toward peace would fail if they were not rooted in an unequivocable Arab rejection of terrorism and an Arab embrace of reconciliation and co-existence.

The Palestinian observer, Farouk Kaddoumi, accused Israel of "state terrorism" and of "exploiting" the Sept. 11 attacks in New York and Washington, D.C.

Canada also voted for a separate resolution, backed by 154 nations, that demanded the annulment of Israeli legislation unifying western and eastern Jerusalem.

In the early 1980s, during Menachem Begin's administration, Israel passed the law to buttress its claim to eastern Jerusalem.

Apart from Israel, five countries came out against the Jerusalem resolution – United States, Micronesia, Costa Rica and Marshall Islands.

In previous years, Washington abstained. Its vote represented a major shift in American policy, observers said.

The three resolutions on which Canada abstained concerned the Golan Heights, the inalienable rights of the Palestinians and UN programs dealing with the Palestinians.

The first resolution was in reference to Israel's occupation of the Golan Heights. Israel wrested the Golan from Syria during the 1967 Six Day War, and effectively annexed it in 1981.

The resolution, which passed by a 109-4 margin, says the annexation is "a stumbling block in the way of a just, comprehensive and lasting peace in the region."

Voting against were Israel, United States, Marshall Islands and Micronesia.

The second resolution asked the UN Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People to continue assisting the Palestinians in various ways.

Voting in favour were 109 nations. Aside from Israel, it was opposed by United States, Marshall Islands and Micronesia.

The third resolution endorsed UN efforts to organize meetings, prepare documents and disseminate information relating to the Palestinians.

One hundred and eight countries voted for the resolution, and again, the same four – Israel, United States, Marshall Islands and Miocronesia – opposed it.

Canada voted for a somewhat similar resolution urging the UN to distribute information about Palestinian issues.

Voting for it were 159 countries.

The Pacific island of Nauru joined Israel, United States, Marshall Islands and Micronesia in opposition.

World Jewish population down to 12.9 million

According to Israel's Central Bureau of Statistics, the world's Jewish population dropped from about 17 million in 1939 to 11.5 million at the time of Israel's creation in 1948. The figure reached 12.8 million by 1980, but has apparently shown little growth since.

Formed last May and funded with $1 million annually from the Jewish Agency and Jewish philanthropists, the Institute for Jewish People Policy Planning is jointly headed by former U.S. Middle East peace envoy Dennis Ross and Prof. Yehezkel Dror, a specialist in strategic government policy planning.

Its purpose is to create position papers that identify problems facing world Jewry and make recommendations to solve them.

The institute's board of directors and its partners – the Jewish Agency and the United Jewish Communities, the umbrella organization of North American Jewish federations – will then try to put any plans into effect.

Studies published at the conference, said the population decline is apparent in other major Jewish communities around the world. The French Jewish community has declined from 535,000 in 1980 to some 500,000 today, while the number of Jews in the former Soviet Union (FSU) has fallen from 1.45 million in 1989, to some 437,000 now. Most Jews from the FSU moved to Israel during the 1990s.

But according to Prof. Sergio della Pergola, an expert on demographics, "last year alone in Russia there were 8,000 deaths of elderly Jews, and only 600 births recorded to Jewish mothers. This is the end of a long process of assimilation and aging."

The only Jewish community in the world that is growing is Israel, which is home to most of the world's Jewish children under age 15.

Sallai Meridor, the Jewish Agency's Likud-appointed chair, called the population declines "appalling," saying the numbers represent "a point of no return."

He told the conference that "one of the biggest problems is the high cost of Jewish education in the West, and ways must be found to help more people pay for Jewish education for their children."

Meridor said the cost of day school is one of several issues that deter Jews from remaining active in the community. A family with three children in day schools, for example, could pay close to $60,000 (US) each year for tuition.

That can have two effects, he said: Jews who are less affiliated may decide not to pay, and affiliated Jews who want to send their children to day school may decide to have fewer children.

Yet Ross noted that Jewish day schools in America are experiencing a growth spurt that is "nothing short of phenomenal." Still, he added, "it has to be more accessible to more people."

Hinting that he may be shifting his views on the greater Land of Israel, Meridor said the demographic threat inside Israel, because of the increase of non-Jews in the population and the Israeli control over the territories, "must certainly influence our borders policy."

But, he added, "it also means that we cannot concede on the Palestinian right-of-return issue. And particularly, we must increase immigration. That is a vital need for Israel, like water in the faucet."

Meridor called for a more lenient rabbinical attitude toward the issue of converting non-Jewish immigrants.

"I hope that conversion continues to be the only gateway to the Jewish people, because I believe the people of Israel and the religion of Israel go together. But that's as long as religious values do not endanger national needs," he said.

"There will be no significant immigration in the future that does not include non-Jewish members of the family, and those who are ready to forgo those people should already give up the demographic effort."

Ross said "we have to examine which methods worked in the past and which didn't."

He noted that Jewish schooling, summer camps and organized trips to Israel are the best way to keep young Jews interested in the fate of the Jewish people. Furthermore, he said, "if Israel wants to remain the centre of the Jewish people, it must certainly remain a Jewish and democratic state."

The Dreamers depicts Jewish life in Depression-era Toronto

By CARRIE BRODI
Special to The CJN

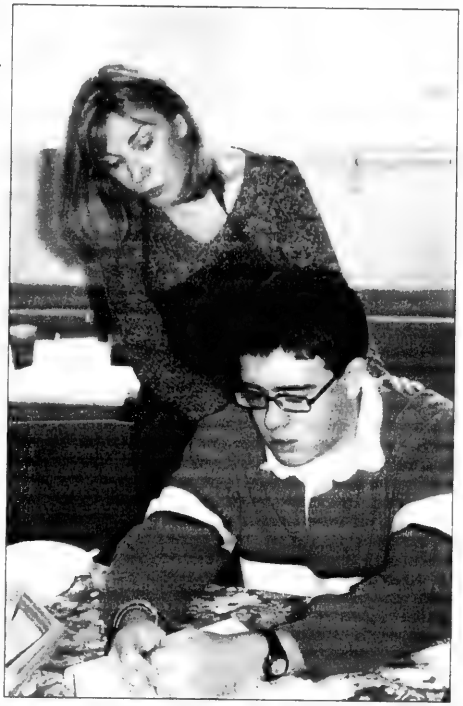
My grandmother never understood why, during my university years, I "chose" to live at Harbord and Grace streets in downtown Toronto.

For her, as a Jewish-Polish immigrant to Canada in the 1930s, that area represented three things: poverty, racial discord and alienation.

"But it's hip now, Bubbe," I would argue. She'd just shake her head, call me "crazy" and return to peeling onions in front of her favourite soap opera, The Days of Our Lives, in her Forest Hill living room.

Were she still alive, I'd take her to Holy Blossom Temple to see Irving Hoffman's bittersweet play The Dreamers, currently being produced by Stagecraft Company.

In it, a Jewish-Russian immigrant family living at Harbord and Grace struggles to fulfill their passions and pay the rent in Depression-era Toronto.



Susanne Egier and Zach Moull rehearse a scene from The Dreamers, directed by Irving Hoffman.

To survive, they must take in boarders, a collection of lonely souls and balabustas who yearn for family they left behind and their rightful place in a new land.

The father, Harry Gordon, (played by Eric Kirsh), plays viola but has just been laid off from his job with the Toronto Symphony Orchestra. Son Benny (played by Zach Moull) yearns to act but can't afford the $25 it costs to study his craft in New York City.

Daughter Emma (played by Dorothy Harach) loves to play the piano but has her sights more firmly set on marriage to the handsome boarder Michael (played by Ron Boyd).

In between passions, a dysfunctional set of grandparents, played with realistic hilarity by first-time actor John Freund and actress Ellen Karabanov, threaten divorce over the Shabbat table.

If the laughter during rehearsals was any indication, the play should bring down the house.

At one point, Harry asks granddad what he'll do about housing – the most pressing issue on everyone's mind – once he separates from his wife.

"I'll find a room," Freund responds dryly. And grandma? Harry asks. Pause. "She'll have to find a room, too," he replies.

For a retired civil servant, Freund has impeccable comedic timing.

Laughter aside, the play addresses serious issues of the day, including anti-Semitism.

The play is set against the backdrop of a riot at Christie Pits, where, during a baseball game in August 1933, a large street fight erupted between Gentile and Jewish youths.

Joel and Joanne Rose, founders of Stagecraft Company, say that they use the two plays the company produces each year year to bring Jewish material with moral and ethical content to Toronto's Jewish community.

Set against the backdrop of Christie Pits riot

For director Paul Soren, who cued actors between scenes by humming the period music of Al Jolson and the Charleston Chasers, The Dreamers has cross-generational appeal.

"This play is about dreams – everyone in it has a dream," he says. "Our dreams today may be different, but the struggles are the same."

The Dreamers runs Thursday, Dec. 12, Saturday, Dec. 14, and Sunday Dec. 15, at 7:30 p.m at Holy Blossom Temple, 1950 Bathurst Street. Tickets are $10 in advance, $12 at the door and $6 for seniors and students on Thursday and Sunday nights.

For tickets, call 416-789-3291, ext. 511.

SPIELBERG ARCHIVE OFFERS JEWISH FILMS OVER THE INTERNET

The Steven Spielberg Jewish Film Archive at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem has begun a major project to make its films accessible online.

The archive's Virtual Cinema Project has already made 112 films accessible and plans to add about 100 films annually in the next five years.

The Archive's Web site (www.spielbergfilmarchive.org.il/) offers five choices of subject matter: Jewish Communities, Holocaust, Pre-State of Israel, State of Israel and the Hebrew University.

Choosing Jewish Communities, for example, soon brings one to an extensive list of choices, such as any of five short films made in 1939 that offer a last glimpse of Jewish life in the Polish cities of Bialystok, Krakow, Lvov, Vilna and Warsaw.

A wide variety of rare and historic films is also available in other categories. With only a few mouse clicks, one may view Murray Rosenberg's First Film of Palestine: Scenes of the Holy Land, which shows early Zionists heroically building the land in 1911. Equally dramatic is the short but riveting 1948 documentary A State Is Born, produced by the Jewish National Fund in celebration of the birth of Israel.

The films are screened in a box about three inches square on the computer screen.

The archive's eventual goal is to make more than 500 films viewable over the Internet. "It is the archive's hope that this pioneering effort will be of benefit to all users, whether for purposes of study, research or production," an online message explains.

Employees and family members of Mirvish Productions, The Princess of Wales Theatre or The CJN are not eligible to enter.

Kedumim, a 625-acre nature reserve that was once so barren its founder had to cart up topsoil from the valleys to cover the rocks and make the land fertile again.

Since 1965, when the Israel government offered ecology author Nogah Hareuveni this tract near Modi'in to make his dream of a biblical nature reserve come true, he and others have built a wonderfully diverse pastoral landscape to teach visitors about the various roots, herbs, trees, plants, fruits, flowers and spices mentioned in the Bible and the Talmud.

On these rolling hills, which lie near Lod Airport almost midway between Tel Aviv and Jerusalem, one may better understand the meaning of the biblical description of "a land dripping with milk and honey."

Here, one finds all the biblical "seven species" – wheat, barley, vines, figs, pomegranates, olive oil, honey – and many more.

"Neot Kedumim is one of the amazing stories of modern Israel of someone who had a vision and made it happen against great odds," says our guide, Beth Uval.

"Among other things, this is one of the best examples anywhere of restoration agriculture – bringing the land back to what it was in ancient times. We know that there was agriculture here in ancient times."

She plucks a handful of olives from a gnarled old tree. "No one ever ate an olive off the tree in ancient Israel. It tastes awful," she says. "Olives were valued for their oil, which was used for food, medical purposes and lighting. It was also used for annointing princes. The Hebrew word Mashiach [messiah] refers to the one who was annointed."

Nearby, new growth is sprouting from the dead and withered stump of an olive tree, and a sign refers to Isaiah 11:1 and to Psalm 128: "... your children shall be like olive shoots surrounding your table."

Alongside each station in the reserve, similar signs highlight passages from the Bible and Talmud, as well as from the Christian Bible for Christian visitors.

A group of schoolchildren take turns rotating the handle of an Archimedes' screw, an ancient device by which water is brought upward from a pond. A sign carries the explanation of Rabbi Simeon ben Gamliel (Tosefa Mikvaot 4) that "water that is channelled into the mikvah by the Archimedes' screw does not invalidate the mikvah because the water is not disconnected from its source."

We walk along a series of paths and soon pass date palms, grapevines, myrtle bushes, willows and a succession of plants and trees whose branches are laden with citrons, etrogs, sycamore figs and pomegranates. Even cedars native to Lebanon are being lovingly coaxed into the sky.

We encounter the schoolchildren again at a water-powered flour mill where, amidst much levity, they grind wheat into flour that they will then bake into delicious pita bread. Soon we retire to the dining-hall for a simple biblical lunch. Neot means pastures or places of beauty and Kedumim means ancient but also suggests the forward movement of time, Beth tells us, adding that we've only seen a small part of the whole.

"There are lots of nature reserves in Israel, and thousands of places where people study the biblical texts, but this is the only place where the two come together."

She invites us to return.

An independent, nonprofit educational institution, Neot Kedumim also features a cistern, threshing floor, winepress, Torah scribe demonstration, biblical breakfasts and lunches, two large amphitheatres, herds of sheeps and goats, a shepherd's tent and a well-stocked gift shop. Displays on the various Jewish holidays are presented in season.

For more information, call 011-972-8-977-0777, visit <www.neot-kedumim.org.il> or e-mail <gen_info@neot-kedumim.org.il>.

Israel Notes

• The Simon Wiesenthal Centre has announced plans to build a Museum of Tolerance in Jerusalem to be designed by world-famous architect Frank Gehry. Its main objective is to promote understanding between Jews and Arabs and among Jews themselves. The museum is slated for a three-acre site at the foot of Mount Scopus.

• Israeli archeologists recently discovered papyrus documents, ancient coins, wooden arrows and well-preserved coloured cloth in a small hard-to-reach cave near the Dead Sea. All the items date back almost 1,900 years to the period of the Bar-Kochba revolt against Roman rule.

• Tourist traffic to Israel has been slowly climbing over the past few months, with an average of five per cent more visitors, compared to previous months this year. Israel is expected to welcome just under one million tourists in 2003.

Collection recalls duo's comedic repartee

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The late Johnny Wayne and Frank Shuster of Toronto were Canada's most famous comedy team from the 1950s to the 1980s.

Before their breakthrough appearance on the Ed Sullivan Show in New York City, an event that catapulted them to great heights in the entertainment industry, they drew laughs on their own CBC weekly radio show.

The best of these shows are now available on four one-hour audio cassettes from a Toronto company – Scenario Productions.

Wayne & Shuster: The Radio Years offers a tantalizing glimpse of their talents. Time and political correctness have dimmed some of their lustre. Nevertheless, they do tickle your funny bone.

The Jewish comedians specialized in cut-and-thrust repartee.

"I'm sorry I'm not a doctor," Johnny says.

"Look how many lives you saved," Frank quips.

Johnny Wayne and Frank Shuster.

"Let's take a trip around the world," Frank suggests in another exchange.

"There's so many other places I'd rather see," retorts Johnny in deadpan fashion.

Being university graduates, they were fond of word plays.

In two sardonic sets, they have great fun dissecting the dateline "Sault St. Marie" and the word "ballet."

And in a skit about the perils and pleasures of romance, they connect lonely hearts to a mythical institution known as "Neck Tech."

Occasionally, they engage in grim gallows humour. Extolling the bumper wipers on a late-model car, they explain that its function is to "wipe off pedestrians."

Some jokes, such as the aforementioned and the ones in a skit titled History of the Automobile, simply fall flat.

"I found it, I found it."

"What did you find?"

"A parking spot downtown."

These lapses, obviously, do not burnish their reputation. But neither do they detract from the fact that Wayne and Shuster were pretty much on the ball most of the time.

Roundup of 'Jewish' films available on video

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

The past year has seen a handful of "Jewish" films released on video and the beginning of Jewish films appearing on DVD. Here are some of the leading "Jewish" videos released in 2002.

• The Man Who Cried tells the story of a Jewish girl who is looking for her father. The father had gone to America to earn enough money to bring the whole family over, but before he could do that, a pogrom threatened the village and the daughter was sent away to safety, winding up in Britain. There she was raised in a Christian home and at the age of 18 she became a dancer in Paris in an attempt to earn enough money to continue her search for her father.

Christina Ricci, Kate Blanchette, John Turturro and Johnny Depp are featured.

•Kippur is Amos Gitai's film about the Yom Kippur War and the experiences of two young soldiers who don't arrive in time to join up with their unit. As a result they spend the war retrieving the wounded and the dead from the battlefield, until they themselves are wounded.

•Conspiracy features Kenneth Branagh and Stanley Tucci, who portray Reinhard Heydrich and Adolf Eichmann, the organizers of the infamous Wannsee Conference that set the guidelines for the Nazis' final solution.

•Focus is based on Arthur Miller's first novel, written over 50 years ago, and deals with intolerance, racism, anti-Semitism and mistaken identity.

The story revolves around an ordinary man, Lawrence Newman (played by William H. Macy), who does not want to stand out from the crowd. He has a secure but boring job and his life has settled into a safe, uncomplicated mode.

When a Jewish storekeeper in Newman's neighbourhood allows his relatives from Eastern Europe to move in with him, the bigots in the area view this as an invasion of their turf and join an anti-Semitic group in order to keep the area free of Jews.

Laura Dern and William H. Macy star in Focus.

At first Newman refuses to get involved. But when his wife (Laura Dern) is attacked because people mistakenly think that he is Jewish he decides to fight back.

William H. Macy, Laura Dern, David Paymer and Meat Loaf star.

•A relatively unknown Russian film, We Are Going To America, is based on a Sholom Aleichem short story, "Boy Motl". This "tragicomedy" tells of the trials and hardships faced by a Jewish family which leaves its Russian shtetl in order to search for a better life in America.

The voyage is shown through the eyes of 11 year old Motl and is filled with symbolism and mysticism. Produced in 1992 and directed by Efim Gribov, We Are Going To America is mainly in Russian, with English subtitles.

• Stolen Summer is a charming film set in Chicago in 1976. Eight-year-old Pete O'Malley comes from a large Catholic home and has been taught in school that the path to heaven is through faith and a belief in Jesus. And in order to ensure his own entry into paradise, he goes on a quest to convert the local rabbi's seven-year-old son to Christianity.

The result is often humorous and always enchanting. Not only is Pete's understanding of theology limited, but he must overcome the obstacles placed in his path by the adult world around him.

The film features Aidan Quinn, Bonnie Hunt, Kevin Pollak, Brian Dennehy and Adi Stein as Pete O'Malley and Mike Weinberg as Danny Jacobsen.

• Kissing Jessica Stein stars Jennifer Westfeldt as a sensitive but neurotic Jewish woman living and working in New York. Although successful in her professional life as a journalist, her personal life is a mess. Everyone around her is getting married or having babies, while she can't even find a boyfriend. And the harder she tries, and the more dates she goes out on, the worse it gets.

One day she comes across an intriguing personal ad and decides to answer it. As a result, she meets a fascinating woman (Helen Cooper, played by Heather Juergensen) and they click almost instantly.

The results are funny and very poignant and form the basis of a terrific comedy with some curves and surprises in the story line.

• Late Marriage is a social commentary on the values and mores of the Georgian community in Israel. Zaza is a 31-year-old bachelor who is studying for his doctorate degree. His parents feel it is time for him to get married and arrange for him to meet a succession of young women.

Unknown to them, Zaza is in love with a single mother and spends much of his time at her apartment. When the parents discover his secret, they attempt to break up the two lovers. Late Marriage is a unique comedy about the battle between the modern concept of love and the world of tradition.

• Time of Favor created a certain amount of controversy because of its theme – the blowing up of the Dome of the Rock on the Temple Mount in Jerusalem. The story centres around Menachem, an Israeli army officer who has established an elite all-Orthodox company and who is also studying at a Yeshiva run by a charismatic rabbi. The rabbi, played by Asi Dayan, preaches about the need for Jews to be able to return to pray on the Temple Mount.

At the same time, the rabbi is trying to make a match between his daughter, Michal, and his best Yeshiva student, Pini. Michal isn't interested. After Pini is rebuffed by Michal, he organizes a plot to blow up the Dome of the Rock.

In many ways, the film mirrors some of the tensions and forces within Israeli society today and all this makes for an intriguing film that mixes politics, religion and entertainment.

If you have trouble finding any of these in your video store, you can always ask the store to order them for you or you can go to www.videoflicks.ca, www.amazon.ca or www.facets.org and order them through the internet.

Student bracelet sales aids terror victims

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

To demonstrate solidarity with Israeli victims of terror, developer Vivienne Ziner and artist Marla Buck have started a grassroots fundraising and awareness project for Jewish day and congregational schools.

Their Blue and White Solidarity Bracelet Initiative, called L'Chaim Beads, Buck said, lets students make bracelets from attractive blue and white beads to be sold through their schools to families and friends, and to the greater community through synagogues, Jewish organizations and Judaica shops.

"The impact on families in Israel, knowing aid has come through this youth effort, and the impact on youth here, knowing they are taking an active stand to make a difference, is tangible and immeasurable," Buck said.

"All the profits are to be donated to Israeli children and families whose lives have been forever altered through the most recent attacks of terror in Israel," Ziner said.

"The Blue and White Solidarity Bracelet Initiative… serves to remind us of our solidarity with the people of Israel and our mutual vision of peace, safety and hope."

Ziner and Buck have prepared bead kits at a cost of $9 each, with a minimum purchase for schools being a dozen. Also, finished bracelets are available for $36 each.

A tax receipt will be issued to people who buy more than $36 worth of bracelets.

The bracelets make great gifts for birthdays, holidays and bar/bat mitzvahs, and they also make great loot-bag stuffers, Ziner said.

Funds collected will be directed through Beit Halochem's David Rosenzweig Memorial Fund.

Buck said that if 500 students in a school each sell two bracelets, they can raise more than $30,000 "to make a difference in the lives of Israeli families whose lives, unlike their own, have been drastically altered and forever changed."

Ziner told The CJN the consul general of Israel in Toronto is wearing a bracelet and gives the project his full support, as do many community leaders.

For more information or to order the L'Chaim Beads or bracelets, call 416-480-2001.

IFA fears report of Al Qaeda plot will hurt future of Israeli soccer

By ORI LEWIS
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Unsubstantiated reports of an alleged Al Qaeda plot to attack Israel's national team could do serious harm to Israeli soccer, the Israel Football Association (IFA) said in a statement last week.

Publication of such allegations threatens Israeli participation in international soccer events and "could cause great harm internationally [to Israeli soccer] which will be very difficult to rectify in the future," the IFA statement said.

According to a report in Israel's Yediot Achronot, an attack on the team had been planned for a European Championship qualifier in Malta on Oct. 12, but was prevented when a Tunisian national was arrested in the Mediterranean island country.

"We were surprised to hear of the publication of the apparent plot to attack the national team, but we are unaware of any proof that the story, which relies on foreign and Internet sources, is true. There has not been any confirmation from any [Israeli] security source," the IFA said.

"The IFA was informed of the arrest of a man prior to the match in Malta, but there has not been any confirmation or proof provided by any official security source that the arrest had anything to do with the national team's presence in Malta. The delegation was not aware of anything out of the ordinary and the sense of security was absolute," the IFA said.

"In view of this, and as long as there is no confirmation from the relevant security authorities, the IFA does not consider that an exceptional situation has arisen. All the IFA's delegations, including the one to Malta, travelled with the usual security arrangements in place," the organization's statement said.

Israel coach Avraham Grant said the team did not feel threatened or suspect anything unusual had taken place. "While we were in Malta we heard an Al Qaeda suspect had been arrested, but we did not consider this to be particularly significant. We hear of potential threats on almost every trip," he said.

"On every trip we receive protection from the Shin Bet and from the local security organizations. We rely on them to do their jobs while we get on with our sporting affairs," Grant added.

More worrisome, he said, was that Israel is becoming too much of a hot potato for foreign opponents.

"We are no longer sought after as opponents by other national teams [for international friendlies]. We have to scrape and scratch in order to arrange practice matches. Nobody is in any hurry to host us. I would go so far as to say they really don't want us," Grant said. "I expect that after the publication of this story, it will be even worse."

Last March, UEFA, European soccer's governing body, deemed Israel off limits to visiting teams due to the deteriorating Mideast security situation.

Since then, the IFA has sought alternative venues for internationals, and last week, Watford's stadium in Great Britain was named as Israel's home away from home for the Euro 2004 qualifiers, the first of which is March 29 against Cyprus.

Toronto's Eric Murray and Sami Kehela made up the most successful partnership in the history of Canadian bridge. For most of the 1960s and 1970s this pair was not only unrivaled in our country, but they were widely considered to be among the very finest partnerships in the world. Eric and Sami also happen to be two of my personal bridge heroes.

A study in contrasts, Eric was a "flair player" whose great table presence and fierce competitive spirit made him extremely difficult to play against. Sami was a bridge player of a different breed. He was a technical player of the highest order who almost never made a mistake as the declarer or on defence.

Together this partnership really put Canadian bridge on the map. This deal comes from one of the last major tournaments that Sami and Eric played in as a partnership – the 1982 World Championships where Canada emerged with the Bronze Medal. This deal comes from a match between Canada and Sweden.

Sami's 5♦ contract was not a thing of beauty, but the great Canadian found a way to bring home his vulnerable game (with a little help from the defence). West led a top spade and switched to the ♥J. Sami won in his hand and led the ♦Q. East allowed the declarer to win the trick and ducked his ♦A again when Sami led a second round of trump (East would have done better to win this trick and play a spade).

Deciding that trumps were probably 4-2 given the exuberant bidding by his opponents and the defence that he had received, Sami turned his attention to the club suit. He cashed his ♣A and played a club to the dummy's ♣K. The sight of East's ♣Q was good news for the declarer, but it was not quite over yet.

Sami played a heart to his ♥Q and returned to the dummy's ♥K in order to start leading winning clubs through East. It didn't matter if East discarded, ruffed low, or ruffed with the ♦A at any point. The Ace of trump would be the last trick for the defence. A brilliant effort by one of the few true legends of Canadian bridge!

Soon the future will continue

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

Israel is weeping. Terrorism is gaining in momentum and as it does, more and more people are being killed on the streets, in buses and on vacations outside of Israel.

A few years ago, many Jews felt that things were changing and peace was about to be made with our Arab neighbours. It seemed as if the Jewish agenda had finally evolved, moving away from war to items such as Jewish continuity and how Jews would survive into the future.

It was an exciting time and we had the sense that if external peace could be found, then we should be able to find internal acceptance, unity and creativity among our people.

We hoped that Jewish education would take centre stage, and that Diaspora and Israeli Jews would create wonderful literature and conceive of new ideas. We have such great minds, with important things to say. Imagine the books. Think about the words.

We believed that, like other nations, the Jewish people would finally have the chance to look inward.

In truth, although many Jewish resources have been funnelled toward the safety and security of Jews everywhere, we can still be confident and proud of the brilliant creativity that emanates from Jewish communities throughout the world.

Jewish schools are filled to capacity and Israeli-developed technology is blossoming. Immigration continues from the former Soviet Union, France, Argentina and other countries.

Social services in Israel are performing brilliantly, especially in light of the added burden of assisting an enormously increased client base. One such organization is Elem, considered to be the voice of distressed youth in Israel.

Elem has launched a number of programs assisting youth in trouble, be they residents of long standing, immigrant Israelis or Arabs. It is well known for its van program, which organizes nightly rounds in some of the tougher areas of the country. At cafes and outdoor parks, social workers and professionals set up makeshift shesh besh (backgammon) board games. As the dice roll, they attempt to gain the trust of teens who are suffering from the turmoil of their home life and the ugly ramifications of war.

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

We Jews are a strong lot, and we will survive this thorny period. We are sturdy and we are a force. Travel the streets of Sefad and study the art; read about the Jews of Argentina, who although suffering horrendously are rebuilding with painstaking hope; take a Sunday afternoon drive through Vaughan and downtown Toronto and see the growth of Jewish communities, commercially, spiritually and physically.

We have been here before and have survived. This was not by chance or exclusively as a result of our faith. We have survived and are intact because the Jewish way is to never give up, to wrestle and always maintain a sense of belief that this too will pass.

It's important as the bombs explode, and our children cry, and our families die, that those of us who are strong encourage others to pray in unison as we have done throughout history, and plan for the future, when the bombs will stop and we will once again challenge ourselves.

Israel is weeping. God-willing, soon those tears will dry up and Jews everywhere will once again forge our future – through our own merit, tenacity and sweat. God bless the souls of those who have died in these wars for our struggle, and will not be with us physically to join in our splendid Jewish future. Never give up. Never give in.

BAKED BRIE

A fabulous hors d'oeuvre ... or serve on a dessert buffet for your holiday entertaining

1 WHOLE round of brie cheese (any size)
slivered almonds
brown sugar

Slice off top layer of brie with cheese cutter or sharp knife. Place brie on large piece of foil wrap or in an ovenproof serving dish on a large piece of foil.

Toast slivered almonds until just lightly brown. Cover brie with very generous amount of brown sugar, covering completely. Sprinkle toasted almonds on top. Fold foil wrap over to loosely cover brie. Bake at 350°F for 20 mins. or until bubbly. Remove foil. Serve with crackers or cocktail bread, on the side. Brie should be very loose on the inside when poked with a knife.

After sitting out, the brie can get hard. Just pop back into oven to reheat and it will become melted again.

About Life

Dear Ella,

Before you read on, I want to make it perfectly clear how much my grandchildren mean to me. I love them more than life itself.

That said, here is my problem. I have five wonderful, happy, healthy grandchildren (pooh pooh). My son has three kids and my daughter has two. When my son's kids were growing up (they are all teenagers now), I was invited to their home all the time to enjoy the kids. I wasn't asked more than twice in their whole upbringing to babysit.

My daughter, however, is a whole other story. She thinks I'm her regular babysitter. I love those kids to pieces, but I can't manage them. They are six and four years old, spoiled and rowdy. I feel guilty saying no, as both she and her husband work very hard and need the break. My husband doesn't see why I am making a fuss. He says, "Let's go see the kids." Am I the horrible bubbie I feel like?

Bummed Out Bubbie

Dear Bummed Out Bubbie

Congratulations on being blessed with five wonderful grandchildren. I bet you and your husband worked pretty hard all your lives to get to this point. Now it's your turn to sit back and enjoy. The key phrase here is "sit back."

Your daughter loves and trusts you; therefore, she is putting her children's lives in your hands. She sees you as the young, strong woman who did a good job raising her, and she is more than comfortable putting her kids in the same situation. Although in her mind, this is the ideal way for her and her husband to have a worry-free evening, she is not being fair. You should not be put in this position.

Sit down and have a mother-daughter talk. Maybe she doesn't realize that this is too much for you. Try this for a compromise: tell your daughter to hire a sitter she has checked out. To help her be comfortable with the transition, you will be there to supervise the first few times, and you'll also drop by from time to time afterwards. This way, you can still enjoy the kids without the work and guilt.

Mount Sinai Hospital Opens One-Of-A-Kind Men's Wellness Centre!

Men need to take the same approach to their bodies as they do their cars. Most men know more about what's under the hood of their cars than they do about their bodies. Mount Sinai is hoping to change that with the opening of the Murray Koffler Urologic Wellness Centre. The Centre is the only one of its kind in North America that blends the essentials of patient care with clinical research to diagnose and treat men's health-related issues.

"We need to raise awareness about the importance of men's health," says Dr. John Trachtenberg, Director of Prostrate Services at the Centre. "For every 100 men, 12 will develop prostate cancer in their lifetime. Three or four will die from it. In addition, as many as 30 per cent suffer from some form of sexual difficulty, but only one or two will seek treatment. By the age of 80, every man will have experienced one of these afflictions."

Marvelle and Murray Koffler at the opening of the Murray Koffler Urologic Wellness Centre

The Murray Koffler Urologic Wellness Centre provides a comprehensive range of services in an environment specifically designed to be inviting and comfortable for men. Those services include:

- prostate health (the prevention, screening, and early detection for prostate cancer);
- male infertility and sexual health;
- andropause (male menopause);
- urology care; and
- research.

In addition, the Centre will offer genetic counselling, psychosocial support, nutrition counselling; and on-site diagnostic services, thereby reducing waiting times and minimizing the number of patient appointments.

Dr. Keith Jarvi says comparing a man's knowledge of his car with that of his body can be revealing and unsettling. "Show me a man whose car is 500 km overdue for an oil change, and I'll show you a truly guilty man," says Dr. Jarvi, urologist and Director of the Murray Koffler Urologic Wellness Centre. "Show me a man whose body is 500 days overdue for a regular medical checkup, and I'll show you Mr. Average. I hope this Centre will help men become as conscientious about caring for their health as women are about breast health and that by providing men with a place they feel comfortable in, they will become less reluctant to talk about their health issues with their doctor."

The Murray Koffler Urologic Wellness Centre was made possible through the generous support of Murray Koffler and family. This is the second world-class facility that the Kofflers have funded at Mount Sinai, the first being The Marvelle Koffler Breast Centre. Established in 1995, it is an outpatient facility that specializes in all aspects of breast health.

"We are profoundly grateful to Murray Koffler and his family for their generosity and support for this important centre," says Joseph Mapa, Mount Sinai's President and CEO. "Not only will it provide men with important care but the research here in prostate care and infertility will address the needs of patients today and in the future."

Ban on Hezbollah prompts threat

By RON CSILLAG
and DIANE KOVEN
CJN Reporters

Succumbing to months of pressure from the Jewish community and the Canadian Alliance, the federal Liberals last week finally banned all activities of Hezbollah in this country – which triggered a not-so-veiled threat from the group that the move would subject Canada to "increased enmity and hate."

In a statement from Beirut, Hezbollah said Ottawa banned it because of pressure from the United States and Israel.

"Canadian authorities have committed a grave mistake that will undoubtedly have a negative effect on [Canada's] relationship with the peoples and countries of our Arab and Islamic nation, and increase enmity and hate toward it," the statement said.

It added the "whole world knows Hezbollah is a resistance movement against the Israeli occupation as provided in international laws."

'A grave mistake', says terrorist group

In Canada, Ottawa's move led to hints from Arab groups that they will seek a similar crackdown on domestic aid to Jewish settlements in Israel.

Reacting angrily to Ottawa's outlawing of the political wing of Hezbollah, a major Arab group said the government should also ban fundraising for Jewish settlements.

Mazen Chouaib, executive director of the National Council on Canada-Arab Relations, said the Jewish National Fund, B'nai Brith Canada and other groups that "support" the Israeli settlements should be subject to the same kind of restrictions on activities now faced by Hezbollah.

Frank Wilson, Toronto president of JNF and a former vice-president of B'nai Brith Canada, said neither organization directly funds or raises funds for Jewish settlements.

"Hezbollah has no branches, representatives or fundraising activity in Canada," Chouaib was quoted as saying. By contrast, he said Jewish groups "openly" support Israeli settlers, who have been responsible for "destroying" Palestinian villages – a comparison dismissed as invalid by B'nai Brith Canada.

Anti-Semitism on Senate agenda

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

For Sen. Jerry Grafstein, the parallel could not be more disturbing. While visiting Germany last summer, he and his wife planned to attend synagogue services in Berlin, but to do so, they were forced to pass through heavy security screening before they could enter. Disturbing, no doubt, but perhaps not surprising considering Germany's history and the upsurge in anti-Jewish incidents throughout the continent.

Back in Canada, he had a feeling of déjà vu when he and other members of the Beth Tzedec Synagogue, one of Toronto's largest congregations, were made to enter the building through a parking lot entrance and pass through security screening not much different than what he experienced in Germany.

For Grafstein, the idea that Canadian Jews would have to be protected during High Holy Day services was galling, even "personally demeaning."

Svend Taken Down

VANCOUVER — The Jewish Community Centre of Greater Vancouver's board will address the issue of censorship at a meeting in the new year after artist Jeannie Kamins said she was asked to remove a portrait of local MP Svend Robinson, an outspoken critic of Israel, from an exhibit of her paintings at the centre following complaints from members. Kamins, a former JCC employee, said she didn't include the painting to make a political statement, but because it is one of her best works.

ISRAEL

Fence Updates

JERUSALEM — Israel's High Court of Justice last week barred the army from starting construction of a safe-passage route between Hebron and nearby Kiryat Arba. In a ruling Tuesday, the court issued a temporary injunction barring the army from destroying any Palestinian homes along the planned route. The plan was initiated after Palestinian gunmen killed 12 Israelis in a Nov. 15 attack near the Tomb of the Patriarchs. Meanwhile, leaders of several towns in northern Israel said they will start building a section of a security fence along the West Bank and have hired a private contractor to do the work because they could not wait for the government.

Beilin Bolts

JERUSALEM — Leading doves Yossi Beilin and Yael Dayan quit Israel's Labor Party last week after placing so far down its list of candidates in internal party primaries that they would likely not have been elected to Knesset in January's elections. Beilin and Dayan have reached a deal to run on the leftist Meretz Party's list, where they will hold 11th and 12th spots, respectively.

Movie Banned

JERUSALEM — Israeli censors have banned a film by an Israeli Arab on last spring's battle in Jenin that depicts alleged Israeli atrocities during the anti-terror operation there. A spokesperson for Israel's censor board said it banned Jenin, Jenin because it presents fictional events as truth and is "propaganda that represents a biased view of the group with whom Israel finds itself at war."

WORLD

Fellowships Available

NEW YORK — North American high school students in grades 10 and 11 are invited to apply by Feb. 15 for 60 fellowships to join 2,000 other teens at this year's Lauder/JDC International Jewish Summer camp in Szarvas, Hungary. For more information on the camp and the fellowships, which are administered by the Ronald S. Lauder Foundation and the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, visit www.szarvas.org. Also, North American students in Grade 12 are invited to apply by Jan. 31 for 26 Bronfman Youth Fellowships in Israel, which cover five weeks of study and travel. For details, call 518-475-7212 or visit www.bronfman.org.

Dead Jews Baptized?

NEW YORK — Jewish and Mormon officials met last week to discuss new allegations that church members are still posthumously baptizing deceased Jews, including thousands of Holocaust victims. Seven years after the church signed a deal to do all it could to stop the practice, new evidence has emerged that the church's International Genealogical Index lists as many as 20,000 Jewish Holocaust victims and perhaps many more, all evidently baptized by proxy after their deaths. Ernest Michel, a Holocaust survivor who chairs the American Gathering of Holocaust Survivors, said Mormon leaders who attended the meeting reiterated the promise to end the practice.

Catholic Lawsuit

NEW YORK — The Catholic League filed suit against New York City schools last week for allowing Jewish and Muslim holiday symbols but barring Nativity scenes, saying the policy is unconstitutional.

War Criminals in Oz

SYDNEY — Australian police have confirmed that nine of 22 alleged Nazi war criminals named last year by Lithuania are still in Australia. Lithuania has said the 22 served in local police units and were responsible for murdering thousands of Jews in Lithuania and Ukraine in World War II.

A Russian Chanukah

TORONTO — Some 1,000 members of Toronto's 40,000-strong Russian Jewish community attended the first-ever Chanukah Carnival, sponsored by the Jewish Russian Community Centre (JRCC), at Fisherville Junior High School.

The kids-oriented event included holiday-themed games, performers, a menorah-making workshop and an authentic olive press that children could use to make oil, much like the oil that burned miraculously for eight days when the ancient Temple was rededicated after the Maccabees reclaimed it from Israel's Greek oppressors.

"There were so many fun games and performers, and the kids really got to learn hands-on what Chanukah is all about in a wonderfully festive atmosphere," said Natasha Kogan, who brought her three children to the carnival. "The truth is, I also learned a lot of new things."

Earlier, a 13-foot Chanukiyah was lit in G. Ross Lord Park at the spot where Dmitri "Matti" Baranovski was beaten to death by a group of young people in November 1999. The ceremony was attended by more than 100 people and a dozen dignitaries, including Olga Baranovski, Matti's mother.

"Chanukah is the celebration of light over darkness," said Rabbi Chaim Hildeshaim, the JRCC's director of holiday programs. "It is very fitting that we light a menorah each year to add light to a place of darkness for so many people."

CSU eases sanctions against Hillel, lawsuit goes ahead

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – About 100 members of Hillel walked out en masse from a Concordia Student Union (CSU) meeting to protest what they considered a "coercive" motion requiring it and all other student clubs to sign an agreement that includes a clause banning recruitment for any military or paramilitary organization.

The motion, put forward by CSU president Sabine Friesinger, passed with 10 in favour and one abstention at an extraordinary open meeting of the CSU council of representatives last Thursday night.

The new resolution replaces one passed Dec. 2 that suspended Hillel's CSU funding and its privileges to use student space on campus.

The second motion, which came a day after Hillel said it would sue the CSU, means Hillel is again able to have information tables, put up posters or book space. But its funding – which amounts to $3,000 – will not be restored until it signs the agreement.

Like the first, the new resolution condemns Hillel for disseminating information about Mahal, a program that allows young Diaspora Jews to serve in the Israel Defence Forces, and it demands an apology from Hillel.

The CSU contends Hillel may have violated the Foreign Enlistment Act, which forbids recruiting for a foreign army in Canada. It also objects to the flyers explicitly appealing only to Jews, which the CSU feels is racist.

Councillor Naomi Sarna, a Hillel member, denounced the motion before debate on it had opened. She called it a "propaganda instrument" and said it was "patently absurd" that the CSU, which she said has "condoned violence here and abroad," should make such a rule.

Another council member, Hillel co-president Noah Joseph, accused the CSU of being more interested in advancing its political views than in respecting the rights of Jewish students.

The new resolution also specifically demands that Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights (SPHR) immediately sign the agreement, or its funding will be frozen as well. SPHR leader Laith Marouf indicated at the meeting the SPHR is in favour of it.

Under the agreement, CSU-affiliated clubs commit to principles that are similar to those worked out among the university administration, SPHR and Hillel as a condition for the lifting of the moratorium on Middle East-related events Nov. 25. It speaks of a commitment to mutual respect and non-violent, non-racist and non-discriminatory behaviour.

These principles differ from those proposed by the CSU previously in one way: the banning of the "advocacy of war" has been dropped. Hillel rejected that proposal, its lawyer Michael Bergman said, because it would have made it appear that Hillel opposed the war on terrorism or any military action against Iraq.

On Dec. 11, Youri Cormier, a CSU representative on the Concordia board of governors, was unsuccessful in having an "emergency motion" passed that would have had the university condemn Hillel for the Mahal flyers.

Last Wednesday, Bergman announced he would file a petition in Superior Court early this week against the CSU and name Concordia as co-party.

The suit would seek an injunction preventing the CSU from "further interfering" in Hillel's functioning, restitution of all funds allocated by the CSU to Hillel (to be placed in trust with an independent, impartial third party), unspecified punitive damages for impingement of the constitutional rights of Concordia's Jewish students, and the reimbursement of Hillel's legal fees.

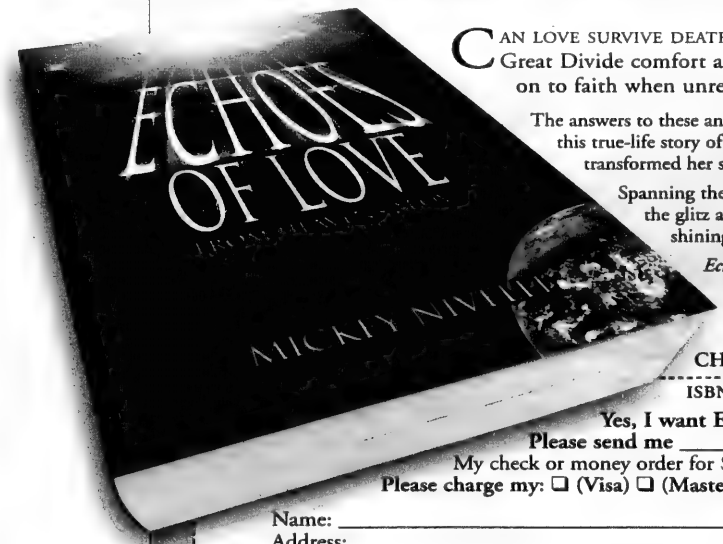
Hillel initiated the lawsuit after the CSU failed to respond to a lawyer's letter calling on it to rescind the Dec. 2 motion and apologize to Hillel. Late last week, Sarna said the suit is going ahead.

Bergman said the Dec. 2 resolution was passed in violation of "countless" CSU regulations, most notably lack of notice and due process.

Hillel also wants the university to fulfill its "duties" in overseeing the fair use of campus space. The CSU should be placed under trusteeship, "if necessary," Bergman said.

Bergman, who was joined by Hillel co-presidents Noah Sarna and Noah Joseph at a press conference last week, described the CSU action on Dec. 2 as "the first time since 1930s Austria [that] a Jewish student organization has been shut down."

AN INSPIRING TRUE STORY OF ETERNAL LOVE



CAN LOVE SURVIVE DEATH? Do the voices of those who cross the Great Divide comfort and guide the living? How does one hold on to faith when unrelenting hatred and evil assail one's life?

The answers to these and other pertinent questions are illuminated in this true-life story of Lotte, a German-born Jewish woman, who transformed her suffering into spiritual enlightenment.

Spanning the most terrifying period of human history, to the glitz and glamour of show business, this book is a shining testament to the power of love and faith.

Echoes of Love From Heavens Above is a poetic treasure and a rich resource for readers on a journey of personal and spiritual growth.

Intense and emotional

From the editor's desk

As most of our readers know by now, in the last issue of every month, we publish in this space, a review of a book written by an Israeli. It is part of The CJN's effort to counter a campaign being conducted in many quarters around the world, which is aimed at singling out and isolating Israel and Israelis.

Much like Israeli society, Husband and Wife, by Zeruya Shalev, (Grove Press, New York) bristles with sharp intensity.

From the very first paragraph on the very first page, the author captures the reader. The story, along with a great many of the stories emanating these days from the imaginations and pens of young Israeli writers, is brooding, deeply introspective and crisis-oriented, perhaps a reflection of the times and atmosphere in which they write.

The narrator, Na'ama Newman, rises one morning to discover that her husband, Udi, has suddenly, inexplicably, suffered an illness that deprives him of the use of his legs.

Udi, a tour guide, is in peak physical condition and has returned only the night before from the desert plain of the Arava. Yet, when he awakens, his legs are paralyzed. Overcoming the confusion and fear that naturally accompany so startling a discovery, Na'ama manages to get Udi to the hospital where a collegium of doctors and experts diagnose Udi's illness as psychosomatic.

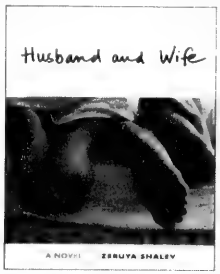
This is the beginning point of a plot that will eventually unwind like a bright thread being pulled from a densely woven, compact skein of flaming human emotion and distressing marital turmoil.

Shalev is a bold and daring writer, stylistically and substantively.

Her method of writing is quite powerful at times, intertwining short, clipped statements of far-reaching insight with broad, descriptive passages of finely nuanced detail. Dialogue between the characters is rendered in long, run-on paragraphs reminiscent, at times, of James Joyce. Yet, even in dialogue, the writing enfolds within it descriptive passages that depict vast expanses of geographical, physical, emotional and psychological terrain.

The following passage describes Na'ama's feelings after Udi has undergone his first set of examinations in the hospital. She has been running between nurses and doctors, struggling to contain her emotions and to understand Udi's problem.

"Were you crying, he asks in a hostile voice, and I mumble, of course not, it's just a cold, and the nurse swallows a smile, she doesn't miss a thing, you're going up to the ward, she informs him, and he's taken aback, but a glimmer of pride flashes in his eyes, like a pupil promoted to the next grade, and she's already filling his chart with blue lines, sending me to get the forms signed, and I hurry away, the aging messenger girl of the emergency room, and miss their farewells, because when I return his bed is already standing in the middle of the hall, him looking like some kind of birthday boy, his body covered with the papers and envelopes that have accumulated over the past few hours, like the gifts of generous relatives, and under them all his delicate face peeps out, and perhaps I'm mistaken but it seems to me that between his lips I see the tip of the tail of a secret smile of triumph."



Even in so brief a passage, Shalev deftly depicts the ambiguity of Na'ama's relationship with Udi. Na'ama's anxiety and self-doubt are the reference point for the description of the chaotic goings-on in the hospital.

Shalev confronts the myriad complexities and vulnerabilities of marital life without shrinking from the detail that some will undoubtedly consider a trespass into the core physical and emotional intimacy that defines the relationship. She is as explicit in uncovering the inner essences of her characters as she is with their physical aspects.

Shalev is uncannily insightful and perceptive about self and others, with searing sorties of unembellished observation. The reader often "witnesses" acts of tenderness and comfort between the characters, which quickly explode into hard, sharp-edged shrapnel of aggressive confrontations by the blow of a harsh, errant word, an ill-expressed jealousy or an ill-timed, intrusive, harmful memory.

Shalev was raised on a kibbutz and now lives in Jerusalem. She is a celebrated poet and novelist in Israel with a master's degree in biblical studies; she is chief literary editor in one of Israel's publishing houses.

Husband and Wife received the prestigious Corine Prize for literature in Germany. Shalev's previous novel, Love Life, also a story about the emotional and psychological entanglements of married life, has been translated into 17 languages. Somewhat controversial in Israel because of its unflinching, descriptive manner, it was awarded the Golden Book Prize and the Ashman Prize.

Boaz Nol presents plans for a different Israel

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Boaz Nol is young, energetic and driven by a vision of a different Israel.

Nol, 26, is the leader of a new political party, Yisrael Acheret, that hopes to capture at least three seats in the upcoming January elections by focusing on issues of concern to mainstream Israeli youth.

"Many of my friends have left Israel in search of better lives" abroad, while others are standing in lines outside the Canadian embassy hoping to get immigration visas, he said.

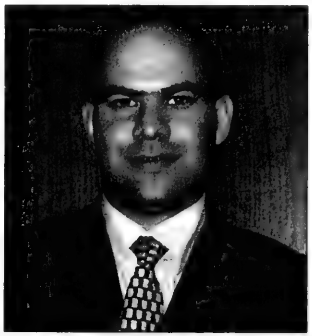
But it's not terrorism that is driving them away.

They're leaving because they feel abandoned by a country controlled by special interests, Nol told a group at Holy Blossom Temple recently.

Funds for education and pensions – issues that affect the average Israeli – are allocated to programs favoured by smaller parties in order to cobble together a majority in the Knesset, Nol said.

Over the past two years, thousands of young Israeli have left the country, he said, and it is no longer tolerable to be complacent about the leadership and politics of Israel and "do nothing about changing it."

Some Israeli critics have called Yisrael Acheret's leaders naive, while others suggest their platform is ill-conceived. In addition, Shinui, a competing political party, has been trying to prevent Yisrael Acheret from running in the upcoming elections by appealing a decision by Israel's party registrar that allowed it to register as a new party without the usual waiting period.



Boaz Nol

However, a recent rally in Tel Aviv that attracted thousands shows the party is gaining momentum among the post-army, twenty-something generation, Nol said.

Yisrael Acheret, which means "a different Israel," began as a youth movement involved in social welfare projects such as the establishment of kindergartens in Bedouin villages.

"Our movement started with 5 naive people" and has "grown to a political party with more than 10,000 [members] that now includes Bedouins, Ethiopians and Russians," Nol said.

The party will be guided by what it calls a new Zionist vision – that "Israel is the democratic state of the Jewish people, allowing all its citizens to live with dignity in accordance with their principles and faith."

The most fundamental change to Israeli politics Nol envisions is restructuring the government based on the U.S. model.

"Politicians should be elected to the Knesset to pass laws" and ministers should be appointed to manage departments because they are the best managers the country has to offer, Nol said.

According to Nol's plan, governing parties will be able to appoint their own slate of ministers drawn from the most experienced professionals in Israel.

He said the plan and the party already have the support of Ben-Gurion University president Avishay Braverman and former Shin Bet chief Ya'acov Perry.

Among its other proposals, Yisrael Acheret will demand that all Israeli citizens serve in the Israel Defence Forces – Orthodox men could serve in units without women and Israeli Arabs could be drafted into a civil service, Nol explained.

Other party goals include adopting a principle of "freedom of religion and freedom from religion" for Israeli citizens, which would allow for such things as marriages and divorces from more than one denomination. The party also favours using education as a tool to achieve social mobility and equality, and promoting investment in national projects to reduce unemployment.

As far as the Palestinian conflict is concerned, Nol would support the dissolution of smaller Jewish settlements on the West Bank, the creation of a Palestinian state and the building of a wall between the two countries.

"There will be a Palestinian state, but there will not be peace with the Palestinians" in the short term, he said.

After serving in Jenin and Nablus, Nol said, he believes Israelis understand that it will be a long time before they can achieve peace with a people who put up pictures in their classrooms of "martyrs" (suicide bombers) with a number underneath each photo representing the amount of Jews they killed.

CCCJ honours three for fighting prejudice

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

When Joseph Rotman tells his children and grandchildren about the anti-Semitism he encountered as a boy, they have difficulty imagining it happening in Canada.

"The fact they find it hard to believe is proof of what a wonderful, liberal society Canada has become," the businessman and philanthropist told hundreds at the Royal York hotel recently.

Making Canada a more equal and just society is the raison d'etre of the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews, which awarded Rotman, his wife Sandra and former federal finance minister Michael Wilson with its 2002 Human Relations Award for their efforts in combating prejudice and promoting understanding.

Several hundred were on hand for the gala dinner and awards ceremony.

Longtime contributors to various fields including health care, academia and the arts, the Rotmans are known for donating money and time to important causes.

"If either of them commit themselves to something... they're out there with tremendous enthusiasm," said Dr. Don Stuss, founding director of the Rotman Research Institute at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric care. "And their advice is always thoughtful."

A former educator at United Synagogue Day School, Sandra Rotman has established a chair in neuropsychiatry at Baycrest, as well as a chair in social work at the University of Toronto.

She is a strong supporter of the arts and has served on several committees with the Art Gallery of Ontario.

Joseph, who currently serves as director of the Bank of Montreal, Barrick Gold Corporation and other firms, is involved in furthering the advancement of life sciences. He is on the executive of several committees relating to the field, including serving as chair of Ontario BIO Council.

Both Rotmans are honorary chairs of the Canadian Friends of the Israel Museum.

Israel and the rising tide of anti-Zionism and anti-Semitism were central topics in Joseph's speech.

"When learned academics compare Israel to the Nazis, [it appears to be] a new, unique form of intolerance using Israel as a surrogate for intolerance," he said.

"The irony is that Israel has at least as much freedom and liberty as most countries, including Canada and the United States."

Another type of intolerance addressed by the CCCJ is the stigma that surrounds people with mental illnesses.

It is an issue Wilson is very familiar with. His son Cameron's struggle with mental illness resulted in tragedy when he took his own life as a young man.

"[There is a] myth that mental illness is a life sentence," Wilson said. "Yet more than 70 per cent of those who suffer can and do return to having normal lives."

First elected to the House of Commons in 1979, Wilson served in a variety of capacities, including as finance minister in Brian Mulroney's Conservative government.

Along with his current role as president and CEO of Canadian operations with UBS Global Asset Management, Wilson is heavily involved in fundraising and community projects to raise awareness and develop treatment for people with mentally illnesses.

As chair of the 1999-2000 fundraising campaign for the Centre for Addiction and Mental Health, Wilson helped raise $11.5 million.

Wilson said people with mentally illness frequently find themselves isolated, feeling as if they have to hide their problem or face serious repercussions.

"Don't tell anybody where I am because if they know, I won't get a job," is what Cameron told his parents shortly before his death.

Wilson encouraged people to be more open about mental illness. He stressed that medication is not the only cure and perhaps more important is the support from family and friends.

BUY ISRAEL: Student Council representatives from day schools across the city recently joined together to trade ideas about how to encourage students (and their parents) to buy Israeli products. In a meeting sponsored by the Board of Jewish Education, student representatives from twelve day schools were joined by their staff advisors and members of BJE staff. Many exciting and original ideas were generated which the reps will take back to their respective schools.

Yiddish speakers dwindling in Canada

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

The number of Canadians claiming Yiddish as their mother tongue continues to decline.

Figures released last week based on the 2001 census show that 19,295 Canadians listed Yiddish as their mother tongue, described by Statistics Canada as the first language learned at home and still spoken by the individual.

The 2001 numbers represent a 10 per cent decline since 1996, when the mini-census found 21,420 people with Yiddish as their mother tongue.

The numbers suggest that Yiddish as a mother tongue continues its steady decline in this country.

In 1981, for example, 32,800 Canadians, or 11 per cent of Canada's total Jewish population, had Yiddish as their mother tongue. In 1961, the figure was one third of all Jews in Canada. In 1931, 96 per cent of Canadian Jews said their mother tongue was Yiddish.

Observers say it's possible Canada's Jewish population has broken the 400,000 mark (the numbers on religion won't be released until May). If that's the case, less than five per cent of Jews in Canada now speak Yiddish as their mother tongue.

The latest numbers show Montreal has more Yiddish speakers than Toronto, a trend first noticed in the mid-1980s.

In 2001, 9,280 Montrealers listed Yiddish as their mother tongue, compared to 9,955 five years earlier.

In Toronto, 7,210 people spoke Yiddish as their mother tongue in 2001, a drop of 11 per cent from the 1996 figure of 8,175.

Prof. Jim Torczyner of McGill University's school of social work, who has been analyzing census data on Jews for years, says the decline in the number of Yiddish speakers probably reflects the fact the language is still spoken predominantly by older people, who have a higher death rate.

Torczyner said the number of Yiddish speakers in Canada will have to be parsed to see how many are immigrants. He said the figures also reflect the fact chassidic families often still use Yiddish as a mother tongue.

As for Hebrew, 12,435 Canadians listed the language as their mother tongue on the 2001 census. That's a drop from the 13,125 who said the same thing five years earlier.

The numbers were stronger in Toronto: 7,390 listed Hebrew as their mother tongue, while 2,945 did so in Montreal.

Overall, the 2001 census shows that Canada has become more multilingual. Chinese is the third most common language as a mother tongue, after English and French, followed by Italian, German, Punjabi, Spanish, Portuguese, Arabic and Polish. Language groups from Asia and the Middle East reported the largest gains over the previous five years.

Amazon.ca pulls controversial book off Web site

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Amazon.ca, the online book retailer, has agreed to remove from its Web site a best selling novel from Europe that sympathetically portrays a young Palestinian who becomes a suicide bomber.

The move to pull Rever la Palestine (Dream of Palestine), written by Randa Ghazi, a 15-year-old Egyptian living in Italy, came after protests by the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, which lobbied Amazon.ca as well as two federal ministers.

In a letter to Marven Krug, director of Amazon.ca, Wiesenthal Canada representative Leo Adler noted the book's hero calls for jihad against Jews, "while the main character is encouraged 'to kill hundreds in his suicide bombing.'"

The novel portrays Palestinian teenagers who fight "bloodthirsty Jews who assassinate children and old people, profane mosques and rape Arab women," Adler stated in his letter.

Adler also called on Justice Minister Martin Cauchon and National Revenue Minister Elinor Caplan to consider laying charges in connection with the importation and publication of the book.

"In my view, its importation breaches Tariff item #9899.00.00, while its publication in Canada (if it is published here) is in contravention of Criminal Code section 320(8) (Canada's hate law)," Adler stated in a letter to the ministers.

The centre also contacted Flammarion Ltd., the French publisher's Canadian distributor, asking that the company recall the book from retailers.

However, Jean Michel Sivry, Flammarion's Canadian general manager, said that decision would have to be taken by the head office in France. Sivry said that only 40 books were allotted to the Canadian market.

He defended the book saying, "the analysis of the contents by elements in the Jewish community has to be balanced with the fact that it's been published in many countries."

The book's message, he continued, was aimed at bringing Palestinians and Israelis closer together and its plot revolves around a love story between a Palestinian and Jew.

In France, where the book quickly sold out in major Parisian bookstores, the publisher faces several lawsuits for incitement to hatred and violence and homicide bombing.

Following the decision by Amazon.ca to pull the book from its inventory (it was also unavailable last week at the U.S-based Amazon.com), Wiesenthal Centre associate dean Rabbi Abraham Cooper urged the French publisher and the parent company that owns it, Italian media giant Rizzoli Corriere della Sera, "to remove the books from store shelves in France, Germany and Italy."

Adler rejected suggestions the Wiesenthal Centre was promoting censorship or book banning. "The issue is whether a book which has as its sole purpose the promotion of murder, hate and anti-Semitism, ought to be sold by reputable businesses with a global reach," he said.

As 2002 passes away...

As the pages of the general calendar year 2002 fall away into the irretrievable pile of possibilities we call the past, we note with disquieting unease that the campaign against Israel, Israelis and Jews continues apace, and that the anti-Semitism unleashed by that campaign, felt worldwide, has not abated. Even Canada has been a staging ground of sorts for that campaign, and in some places, a hospitable arena for that anti-Semitism.

Last week, for example, we had the bizarre spectacle of the former chief of the Federation of Saskatchewan Indian Nations and the Assembly of First Nations, David Ahenakew, telling a group at a Federation of Saskatchewan Indian Nations conference that "the Jews damn near owned all of Germany prior to the war. That's how Hitler came in. He was going to make damn sure that the Jews didn't take over Germany or Europe. That's why he fried six million of those guys, you know. Jews would have owned the goddamned world. And look what they're doing. They're killing people in Arab countries."

We are reluctant to make too much of Ahenakew's statement, for he no longer holds any public position. But it betrays both a grotesque ignorance of history and a grotesque embrace of the vilest, most sinister prejudices against Jews. At the same time, however, we cannot simply glide past the remarks as if they were not made. The fact that an individual who once occupied an important public position believed the thoughts, let alone uttered them, is a cause for grave concern. Graver still is the fact that Ahenakew must have felt the times "allowed" his ogreish thoughts to be expressed publicly.

Of equal concern last week was the fact that on the very day the federal government outlawed Hezbollah, the CBC aired what can only be described as an apology for the terrorist group. Writing in the Dec. 14 National Post, Robert Fulford summarized the report filed by Neil MacDonald. The CBC "implied that Canada made a dreadful mistake in naming Hezbollah a terrorist organization." The editorial in the National Post that same day was more hard-hitting: "Our national broadcaster manufactured controversy by suggesting the decision was unfounded and due only to a partisan campaign mounted by the pro-Israel lobby."

MacDonald ended his report with the following statement: "Is Hezbollah a national liberation movement or, as Israel and its supporters maintain, a murderous global menace? To a great many people in this part of the world, to label Hezbollah a terrorist organization is to choose sides in the defining conflict of the Middle East, an intensely political decision for any government."

Is it only "Israel and its many supporters" who maintain that Hezbollah is a terrorist organization? How clever, how mischievous, how dishonest, this type of reporting. It is nothing less than advocacy masquerading as reporting. Yet, how inexplicable and unfair that the CBC takes no remedial steps. One would think that the CBC would be mindful enough of its obligation to integrity, if not to the taxpayers, that it too would be offended by this manner of reporting.

That was the type of week it was, disquieting and uneasy, as the pages of the calendar fall away into that irretrievable pile of past tense.

Nothing on campus has changed

Concordia Student Union's censure of the university's Jewish Student Union/Hillel reminds me of the time Hillel was banned from the University of Ottawa 20 years ago. As a member of JSU on campus, we were censored for our support for the Jewish state. Those were the days of heightened anxiety over Israel's incursion into Lebanon. The student council invoked the UN's pernicious "Zionism is racism" clause to justify the ban. Their contorted logic was since JSU/Hillel supported Israel and Israel is Zionism, therefore it must be racist. And since student council must be vigilant of racism, JSU/Hillel must have its rights as an organization to meet with student union subsidies suspended. Clearly, it was a pretext by the student executive to stifle debate. The meeting of the council in which the JSU banishment was to be debated was scheduled for Erev Yom Kippur.

JSU/Hillel at the University of Ottawa took up the challenge and secured a petition of 1,000 students necessary to impeach the student executive. A tribunal was held with two prominent Ottawa lawyers representing JSU. After a heated trial, the tribunal voted in favour of impeachment – an importamt victory for freedom of speech. Incidentally, one of the lawyers representing the University of Ottawa student executive was Doug Christie, who had represented Holocaust denier Ernst Zundel on a number of occasions.

Unquestionably, the university environment was acutely uncomfortable then as it is now for Jewish students, with debasement of Jewish symbols and hyperbolic accusations thrown at the Jewish state. Nothing has changed. Student councils with leftist leanings trample on the rights of Jewish students to suppress debate and to alienate them from the body politic on campus. Our students must not waver.

In defence of Concordia's student union

You are entitled to your opinion when you speak of thuggishness on the part of the Concordia Student Union. We're tired of depictions of these student activists as thugs and extremists. Our experience with this organization differs.

In the wake of last year's events, we decided some pro-activity was needed. we offered a speaker, Edwin Black, who wrote IBM and The Holocaust, to the student union. They helped to book a room, and put up posters around the school.

We had a great deal more trouble when we took this event to the wider Jewish community. Perhaps it was due to the fact that We never see speakers in this community who address the American and corporate collaboration with the Nazi genocide of our people. That subject was right up the alley of the anti-corporate types. The Jewish community has far too much pro-capitalist rhetoric, and apologists for corporate extremism.

And let's not keep calling these people anti-democratic. We never voted for the leadership of Montreal's Jewish community. In fact, we find their unabashed support for Israel, no matter what is done there, to be an embarassment. When will our community welcome dissent, as a sign of strength and not of weakness?

Flawed Peace Now logic I

In the article "Peace Now thriving in Canada despite intifadah" (Dec. 5), Sheldon Gordon of Peace Now is quoted as saying that kibbutzim in pre-1967 Israel, such as Kibbutz Metzer, the site of a terrorist attack that killed five people, are "defenceless" because the Israeli army is "busy defending settlements." I am puzzled by Gordon's reasoning. Would he also blame the settlements for recent terrorist attacks in Tel Aviv, Netanya and Kfar Saba?

Peace Now claims that relinquishing lands captured in 1967 will solve the conflict with the Palestinians. Yet the Palestinians have consisiently vowed to "liberate" all of Israel from the Jews. Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak offered 97 per cent of the West Bank and Gaza to Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat in return for an agreement to end the conflict. The response? Terrorist attacks, suicide bombings and the killing of more than 600 Israelis. The Arab world has never made a distinction between lands settled by Israel before or after 1967. Neither should we.

Flawed Peace Now logic II

I am astounded that while Israelis are leaving the movement "in droves" following their disillusionment after the failure of the Oslo accords, Peace Now in Canada goes from strength to strength. Sheldon Gordon clearly has his finger on the pulse of what is happening in Israel today. He has much to teach us about settlements, the army and the Israeli election campaign. How fortunate we are that Israelis become "disillusioned and enthusiastic more readily" than Canadian Jews such as Gordon, who can see matters so clearly, and who so generously share their wise counsel with us.

But it's not so simple and there are no easy answers. This is what Israelis – whatever their politics – agree today and why neither the extremist left nor right speak to our reality. That is why Peace Now is becoming weaker in Israel while it thrives in Canada – far removed from an intifadah that targets all Israelis daily and indiscriminately.

What's the score? Assessing the efficacy of Jewish parliamentarians and other friends of Israel

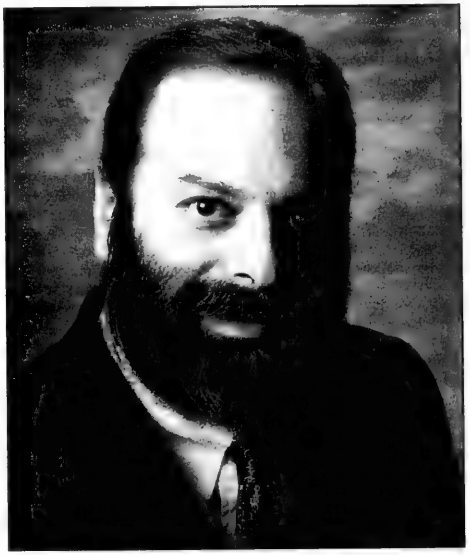
By SHIMON FOGEL

The Canadian Jewish News recently approached me with a request to provide a year-end scorecard on the performance by Jewish parliamentarians on Israel-related activities. One would think the task fairly easy for someone who earns his living interacting with the Canadian political sector on these issues. But it represents a far more difficult challenge than might be imagined at first blush.

First, one has to ask, "Why Jewish parliamentarians?" Is it reasonable for the Jewish community to have special expectations of Jewish MPs and senators regarding support for Israel? And does that imply that non-Jewish parliamentarians have less of a responsibility to express support and friendship for Canada's only sister democracy in the Middle East? More insidious, even, is the possible implication that on its merits alone, Israel does not warrant support from the Hill and that only by virtue of their ethno-religious ties can the pro-Israel community harbour certain expectations of specific politicians. And, finally, who hasn't heard – or made – the argument that declarations of support for Israel or criticism of anti-Israel forces is far more effective when articulated by non-Jewish parliamentarians? So exactly what is being asked of Jewish politicians?

Even after we consider these questions, there are more. On what basis can one evaluate the performance of a Canadian politician? There is not much room for personal expression in the parliamentary system. Rarely is Parliament asked to consider legislation that touches on the Middle East, so there are no votes to track. Party discipline mostly obliges caucus members to toe a party line, so there isn't much room for independent thinking there, either. Caucus meetings themselves are conducted in secrecy, so it's difficult for a politician to publicize his or her interventions concerning a specific issue. Thus, visible support for a cause is pretty much limited to statements, participation in rallies, speeches (generally in a riding) and public letters. Frankly, that's not much to go on!

Assuming these problems are also overcome, there is one last matter to resolve. Who is doing the assessment? As one who works daily on these issues, I have the benefit of some insight into the contributions made by various politicians. However, the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) does not comment publicly on the performance of parliamentarians, Jewish or otherwise, though perhaps that ought to change. Nor have these comments been vetted by the CIC board or executive. Even the national chair has not seen a draft of this essay! I belabour this point only to caution that the following comments do not reflect the CIC's official position. If anything, they are a collection of my observations that may help the reader get a sense of the level of engagement of various politicians in the pro-Israel advocacy effort.



Shimon Fogel

Having posed the questions and rendered the caveats, it's time to turn to the answers.

No Jew has ever been elected to Parliament simply because she or he is Jewish. More importantly, members of the Jewish community do not typically cast a ballot based solely on a candidate's position on the "Jewish agenda." Yet, there is an expectation that when elected – or, in the case of the Senate, appointed – Jews will, or at least should, champion the issues central to the community's concerns. While one could debate whether such expectations are fair, it should be noted that this expectation extends beyond the Jewish community. Colleagues in a caucus take for granted that Jewish parliamentarians will serve as a conduit both to and fro, communicating sensitivities, views and concerns, and advocating for adoption of community positions. Indeed, Canadian political culture assumes this role for parliamentarians of all ethnic backgrounds. To be sure, it is not always a comfortable place to be, but it is a reality that cuts across all partisan lines.

Moreover, the question that is so often just beneath the surface – no, not that one – is: "If support for Israel is not most evident among Jewish politicians, from where should that support flow?" Friends of Israel on the Hill generally, though not always, look to their Jewish colleagues for insight and direction on emerging developments and situations that require policy statements, and take their cue from their reactions, or, they look to their Jewish mates for leadership.

Well, one cannot find a stronger leader than Mount Royal Liberal MP Irwin Cotler. In the course of my 15 years interacting with the political sector, no one – Jewish or otherwise – approaches Cotler's level of passion, determination and efficacy in making the case for Israel. He does it publicly through statements inside the House and outside in any forum, Jewish or otherwise, in Canada. He spends countless hours in serious conversation with other parliamentarians about the issues of the day and more hours sharing his compelling observations with the media. He carries the message to conferences, bi- and multilateral meetings, and governmental organizations throughout the world. And, by virtue of his other accomplishments as a legal scholar and defender of human rights, Cotler brings an unparalleled credibility to the debate.

> When Jews are elected, they are expected to champion issues central to the Jewish community's concerns

But style and talents are as unique as fingerprints. Few parliamentarians have the depth of Cotler's knowledge of the issues and others have various constraints on their ability to visibly demonstrate their support for Israel. Cabinet ministers are particularly handicapped in this regard.

I recall an incident a few years back, when I was trying to get a handle on a rookie MP. She had spent some time at Queen's Park, so I spoke with a valued friend who was working at that time for then-Ontario premier David Peterson. He shared the following story that has forever defined her in my eyes. When the news of Refusenik Natan Sharansky's imminent release broke, she was in the legislature. After my friend shared the news with her, she quietly stole off into a far corner. When he drew near to her, my friend found her sobbing – tears of joy for Sharansky, tears of despair for the other refusniks still imprisoned, tears of raw emotion that flow for one's own. Thornhill Liberal MP Elinor Caplan has never disappointed me since.

I cannot provide you with any information on what interventions Caplan has undertaken within Cabinet. I would never suggest that she ever acted inappropriately in her capacity as a minister by giving preferential treatment to Israel-related causes. I do, however, submit that Caplan is a cherished friend of the CIC and the pro-Israel community, despite having taken some tough lumps from elements within the Jewish community.

Other Jewish MPs, individuals such as Jacques Saada and Raymonde Folco from Quebec, and Anita Neville from Manitoba, have not enjoyed the same profile as Caplan or Cotler. But all three Liberals have shown strong support for Israel. They have always provided the CIC with ready access; have always been willing to carry our concerns to caucus and Cabinet; regularly support the efforts and activities of the Canada-Israel Parliamentary Association; eagerly seek to become fluent with the issues and developments related to the ongoing crisis; and, in the case of Neville and Saada, joined with the CIC on an unprecedented parliamentary solidarity mission to Israel earlier this year. (Folco could not attend since she was a parliamentary secretary at the time). In my experience, each of them has provided invaluable assistance during their parliamentary careers and more importantly, each has been comfortable and proud to be recognized as a Jew and a steadfast supporter of Israel.

Likewise, Jewish members of the Senate have made significant contributions to the pro-Israel advocacy effort. From Jack Austen in British Columbia to Mira Spivak in Manitoba and Jerry Grafstein in Ontario, all have been sources of support and advice. They have also been the source of occasional criticism, too – but only as individuals who share the community's concerns and want to see as effective and meaningful an effort as possible on Israel's behalf.

Before leaving the Senate, and since this is a bit of a personal commentary, I must confess a special regard for the two other Jewish senators. Leo Kolber can be a tough nut and his years of high finance and the rough texture of the political backrooms are evident. But his love for Israel and burning desire to see the strongest possible relationship between Canada and Israel is nothing short of inspirational. He was the first parliamentarian with whom I met after joining the CIC and he has been a ready font of advice, insight and encouragement ever since. Similarly, Richard Kroft has become a singular and sage resource since his appointment to the Senate in 1998. Truth be told, he was a generous friend in all the years prior to his appointment and the value of his wisdom and council are immeasurable.

So there you have it. My experience points to a desire on the part of all Jewish parliamentarians – past and present – to stand with Israel and in support of Israel. There is, however, one small codicil… They don't stand alone.

Within every party represented in the House of Commons and the Senate, there are to be found friends of Israel, great friends of Israel. Only limitations of space prevent me from naming them. But I suggest that the Jewish community be made aware of the wonderful efforts that have been undertaken by so many parliamentarians – not because they are Jews or because they have large Jewish constituencies, but because they believe in Israel and want to see that belief reflected in the nature and quality of the Canada-Israel relationship. They merit our support and appreciation and our challenge is to find ways to express that appreciation.

The complexity of identity

Jews living in the Diaspora who try to integrate into the majority population have usually struggled with their identity.

They would ask: "Can we be loyal citizens of our country and still remain loyal Jews?"

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

For Canadian or American Jews in the year 2002, that has long ceased to be a problem, but for an earlier generation it posed a bothersome question.

I still remember vividly my early days in the rabbinate when this issue turned up regularly and Jewish identity was vigorously debated.

I am reminded of this because recently, while in Washington, D.C., I went to the theatre in the beautiful John F. Kennedy Center and saw a play called Blood Knot, written by South African playwright Athol Fugard.

The title is a metaphor for the apartheid era in South Africa and depicts a time I still remember all too clearly from my visits to that beautiful country.

Fugard's drama features two brothers, one light skinned and one dark skinned, both of them trying to explore their identity during that time.

What both brothers really want from life is to be white, an impossible wish that exposes the complexity of racial identity.

For me, the most memorable moment came when one brother, disturbed by the fallout of a racial debate, called his brother "nigger."

It reminded me that the term has not yet vanished from our vocabulary, and while fewer and fewer people are stupid enough to use it, its sound still disturbs a fragile communal psyche, even when it is integrated into a make-believe play on stage.

There was no specific Jewish aspect to Fugard's fascinating drama, but sitting in the audience, I could not help but think of the struggles our own community experienced in years gone by, struggles that resembled the problems depicted in the play.

Fortunately, those days, when Canadian as well as American Jews tried to find their proper place, are a distant memory and rarely more.

But, as the play brought out forcefully, others in our society are still facing a tough struggle to accept who they are.

It is something we should understand with a sense of gratitude that the problem no longer threatens us as once it did.

Payback time for the churches

The movie Rabbit-Proof Fence tells the story of three aboriginal children in Australia who were kidnapped from their home village and sent to live with white settlers. As children of white fathers and aboriginal mothers, they were part of the Australian government's plan to destroy aboriginal culture.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Canada wasn't far behind with its plan to eradicate the "Indians." Let me tell you a Canadian story. Some years ago, I was sitting in a band office with a nurse. Earlier that week, the nurse said, a woman had come in, obviously distraught. A drug addict, she was desperately seeking help. Could the nurse find her a detox centre?

The nurse began phoning around. As an "urban native" the desperate woman did not qualify for certain treatment centres. I don't remember the details, but the bottom line was this: while the nurse frantically tried to find help, the woman disappeared into the washroom, fixed, and left – returning to the nightmare that is life for so many native women. I fear she is still on the street, if she did not become a murder victim.

"Do you know why so many natives have no teeth?" the nurse asked me later. "It is because in the residential schools it was easier to pull all the teeth than to fix them – so the children of those residential kids have no idea about how to care for teeth."

I am talking about one of our local First Nations reserves. I was there to strengthen the band's case for a full-fledged health centre funded by our local health board, as other community health centres were being set up around the city. To skip to the end of the story, the band didn't get its centre.

Why am I telling you this? Because Ottawa has recently agreed to pay 70 per cent of the cost of settling thousands of lawsuits alleging sexual and physical abuse of native children years ago at residential schools run by the Anglican Church, which would pay the remaining 30 per cent. I have no doubt this precedent will translate into 70 per cent for all the denominations that stand guilty of egregious cultural genocide and outright physical and sexual abuse of native children.

I realize our federal government, as titular guardians of natives under the despicable Indian Act, was totally derelict in its responsibility to protect these children, and so it should bear some of the burden of the damage done to generations of native Canadians. The government consciously tried to destroy native culture.

But 70 per cent? Oh no, not for the same church whose primate, Archbishop Michael G. Peers, lectures the Jews of Canada and the Israelis on their moral responsibilities to Palestinians.

No, not for the church whose clergy should – as should those of all other guilty churches – walk on their knees before the descendants of those children torn from their homes, deprived of parents, language and heritage, and often beaten and raped as well.

As a Canadian, I accept responsibility for what my government did. I would never have agreed to its policies, which outlawed the potlatch, sold off indigenous artifacts, stole native children and forced natives onto humiliating reserves.

We must now, all of us, make restitution. But I strongly object to allowing the actual guardians of those children, the churches and Christians who allowed this abuse, to walk away so unscathed.

Think of Jews in Czarist Russia whose children were snatched and forced into the Czar's brutal army, where most were lost to their people. How would we feel if, in the early years of Jewish settlement in Canada, our Torah scrolls had been seized and sold to museums as remnants of a dead or dying culture (as the Nazis indeed planned to do)? What if we had been denied the right to build synagogues, or open day schools and teach our children Hebrew? What if we were forced to live in ghettos in isolated spots where no economic development could take place?

Yes, we all must pay, but let the churches who stood on the front lines stop whining and pay up as well. And if that means passing the hat, selling their properties, enduring some financial hardship, so be it.

My solution: let government pay 30 per cent of the cost of settling the lawsuits and let the churches pay 70 per cent.

It will be a cheap way to rid themselves of guilt.

Don't wish me season's greetings

On Chanukah this year, I made a point of bringing in enough jambusters – or, as non-Winnipegers call them, jelly doughnuts – for all my colleagues at work. I sent around an e-mail announcing that it was Chanukah and invited all to partake in the sweet, greasy treat.

Stuart Slayen in Winnipeg

They made short work of the diet-defying dainties and were gracious while they littered the office with powdered sugar and jam blotches.

I am proud to talk about Chanukah and other Jewish holidays, and I expect my non-Jewish friends, neighbours and colleagues to be equally proud of their traditions, rites and rituals. I'm happy to hear about Ramadan, Divali, Kwanzaa and Christmas. (I do, however, draw the line at eating Christmas fruit cake. The last time I ate a piece, I thought it tasted like chewy, expired Children's Tylenol. I'd be happy to put a fruit cake in my trunk to help the car retain its grip on icy roads, but I can't imagine actually consuming it ever again.)

I don't take offence at people wishing me "Merry Christmas." I'm more bothered by the lack of parking in front of the mall at this time of year than by the Christmas music playing in it. I like the fact people seem friendlier at this time of year. I like when people talk about peace. And Santa, well, old Saint Nick makes me feel thin.

Frankly, I'm not bothered by all the yuletide chatter. I think it's healthy and I'm proud to live in a Canadian society that permits the open recognition and celebration of religion. The culture that permits shopping mall Christmas trees and Santa Claus parades is the same one that encourages newspaper articles about Ramadan and menorahs at city hall.

What does trouble me is some of the political correctness that rears its careful head at this time of year. I don't want non-Jews trying so hard not to offend me that they mask or hide their own holiday spirit and celebrations. I don't need the word "holiday" substituted for "Christmas" in every conversation about this time of year.

I don't know what "Season's greetings" means, let alone feel touched by its utterance. I'm not bothered when the store clerk wishes me Merry Christmas. Jews make up about two per cent of the population in Winnipeg. I don't expect the clerk to say "Thank you for shopping at Safeway. Chag sameach."

The more people feel free to utter the words and share the symbols of their own holidays, the prouder I am to be Canadian. I'd rather that schools and public institutions saw this time of year as an annual opportunity to respectfully share facts, knowledge and insights about the celebrations of all religions as opposed to a burdensome time of year when new methods to obscure cultures and religions must be found. After all, Canada is a multicultural society, not a non-cultural one.

The key to preserving Jewish and other minority identities in Canada is not to hide or diminish the majority culture in the hopes of compensating for a population imbalance. The key is for our people to celebrate our holidays proudly, with colour, vigour and creativity.

As my kids get older, I'm sure my wife and I will face the same challenges so many couples do when their kids see the lights and magic of Christmas all around them. They'll want to know why they can't have the same. I hope our solution will neither be to diminish Christmas nor to surrender to it. I hope the solution will be to celebrate Chanukah and other Jewish holidays with increasing, contagious excitement – the type of excitement that has the potential to generate pride and increased curiosity.

I want my kids to feel Jewishly confident, proud and literate. It is through that Jewish lens that I want them to participate in Canadian, multicultural life and it is through that lens that I want them to view the "holiday season." And I hope they will also learn about other religions and cultures through that lens – while rejecting fruit cake.

They died recently, leaving footprints in time...

Israel Amir was the first commander of Israel's air force, holding the job for just 10 weeks. He transformed a fledgling arm of the Haganah, with only eight second-hand aircraft and no functioning airstrip, into the forerunner of a formidable strike force. Binyamin Peled was the eighth commander of the Israeli Air Force, rebuilding it after the unexpected losses of the 1973 Yom Kippur War.

Uzi Gal, an Israeli armaments expert, invented the widely-used Uzi submachine gun, the cheap, accurate and efficient weapon of choice in armies and secret service organizations around the world. Zorach Warhaftig, a rabbi and a lawyer, was one of the signers of Israel's Declaration of Independence and a founder of the National Religious Party.

Per Anger, a Swedish diplomat, and his colleague, Raoul Wallenberg, saved tens of thousands of Hungarian Jews in Nazi-occupied Budapest by giving them temporary Swedish passports and identity cards. He was later Sweden's ambassador to Canada.

Paul Wellstone was one of the most liberal voices in the U.S. Senate, a Democrat who represented the state of Minnesota from 1992 until about two months ago. Eugene Rostow, dean of Yale's law school from 1955 to 1965, was under U.S. secretary of state for political affairs during president Lyndon Johnson's administration. Charles Lichenstein was deputy U.S. ambassador to the United Nations from 1981 to 1984, serving under Jeane Kirkpatrick. Sidney Spivak led Manitoba's Progressive Conservative party from 1973 to 1977, and was a cabinet minister in several Tory governments.

Lionel Bernstein, a white South African revolutionary, played a pivotal role in drafting the African National Congress' 1954 freedom charter. Percy Yutar, his polar opposite, was the South African government prosecutor in the 1964 Rivonia trial, at which African National Congress leaders, including Nelson Mandela, were given life sentences.

William Phillips (Litvinsky) was the co-founder and editor of Partisan Review, one of the most influential literary and political journals in the United States immediately before and after World War II. Chaim Potok, the American Jewish novelist, wrote The Chosen, The Promise and My Name Is Asher Lev, best-selling books in the 1960s and 1970s. Phoebe Gilman, a Canadian children's writer and illustrator, wrote the Jillian Jiggs series after writing her first book, The Balloon Tree. Joseph Nathan Kane, a master of minutiae, produced exhaustive reference books ranging from Famous First Facts to 1,000 Facts Worth Knowing. Robert Friedman, an investigative journalist, wrote The False Prophet, a biography of Meir Kahane, the founder of the Jewish Defence League; Zealots for Zion, a study of the Jewish settlement movement in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, and Red Mafiya, an examination of the Russian crime mob in the United States. Otto Orban was one of Hungary's leading poets. Among his books were The Blood of Walsungs and The Journey of Barbarus.

Zvi Kolitz wrote Yosl Rakover Talks to God, a classic of Holocaust literature, and co-produced Hill 24 Doesn't Answer, Israel's first full-length motion picture (1954). Joseph Bau, one of the last surviving Jews on Oskar Schindler's list, was Israel's first animator of films, and known as the Israeli Walt Disney.

John Frankenheimer, a Hollywood film legend, directed The Manchurian Candidate, Birdman of Alcatraz and Seven Days in May. Karl Reisz, a Kindertransport child, rose to prominence directing movies such as Saturday Night and Sunday Morning and The French Lieutenant's Woman. Sidney Pink, a pioneer of 3-D feature-length films, was the producer of Bwana Devil and The Angry Red Planet. Bruce Paltrow, the father of Academy Award winning actress Gwyneth Paltrow, directed the television series St. Elsewhere and The White Shadow. Charles Guggenheim won four Oscars as a documentary filmmaker. His finest movies were Nine From Little Rock, Robert Kennedy Remembered, The Johnstown Flood and A Time for Justice. Doris Wishman directed 30 "B" films, from nudist camp romps to the cult classic Bad Girls Go To Hell.

Ted Ashley, an ex-Hollywood talent scout, was chief executive of the Warner Brothers studio from 1969 to 1980, when it released such landmark films as A Clockwork Orange, Chariots of Fire, Deliverance, The Goodbye Girl and All the President's Men. Marvin Mirisch, an independent film producer, made The Apartment, Fiddler on the Roof, The Pink Panther and In The Heat of the Night. Rod Steiger, an actor who starred in the latter, also appeared in The Pawnbroker and On the Waterfront. Seymour Rexite (Rechzeit) was a matinee idol of the Yiddish theatre and starred in a number of Yiddish films, one of them being Mayne Yiddishe Mame. Dean Riesner, a scriptwriter, dreamed up Clint Eastwood's most famous tough-guy line: "Go ahead, make my day."

Larry Rivers (Yitzroch Loiza Grossberg), a proto-Pop Art painter and a sculptor, was instrumental in changing the course of American art in the 1950s and 1960s. His works included History of Matzo, Washington Crossing the Delaware and Dutch Masters and Cigars II.

Richard Bernstein was an illustrator whose portraits of celebrities, from Andy Warhol to Cher, graced the covers of Interview magazine. Emily Genauer, a Pulitzer Prize art critic and a champion of 20th century painting and sculpture, wrote for the New York World Telegram and the New York Herald Tribune. Carole Kismaric was a book packager and editor who helped start Time-Life's photography series and was the editorial director of the Aperture Foundation, a non-profit publisher of fine art photography books. Morris Berman, a newspaper photographer, snapped one of the most memorable images in sports – the 1964 photo of professional football player Y.A. Tittle kneeling dejectedly in the end zone. Sid Avery was a Hollywood photographer whose glamorous photos of stars – Rock Hudson, Elizabeth Taylor, James Dean – were published in Life, Look, Colliers and The Saturday Evening Post.

Earl Warren (Segal) was the host of Toronto's highly rated CFRB radio show House of Warren from the 1960s to in the 1980s. Jerry Goodis, a founding member of The Travellers, a folk music group, and co-author of the Canadian version of This Land is Your Land, established a successful advertising agency whose catchy jingles included "Harvey's Makes Your Hamburger a Beautiful Thing" and "At Speedy You're a Somebody."

Adolph Green, a playwright/lyricist, was co-author of Broadway musicals such as Bells are Ringing and On the Town and screenwriter of Singin' in the Rain. He composed the words for Make Someone Happy and The Party's Over. Buddy Kaye, a songwriter, wrote Till the End of Time and A – You're Adorable (The Alphabet Song).

Seymour Solomon co-founded Vanguard Records, the home of Joan Baez, Buffy Sainte-Marie and Ian & Sylvia. Vlado Perlemuter, the French pianist, was an interpreter of the works of Ravel and Faure.

Ronald Malt, a Boston surgeon and Harvard professor, was the first doctor to successfully reattach a human limb to a body. The operation took place in 1962. Monroe Wall, a chemist, helped discover Taxol, an important anti-cancer drug. Martin Kamen, a scientist born in Toronto, was one of the discoverers of the carbon-14 atom, which enables archeologists to date artifacts and bones and biologists and botanists to decipher chemical processes in plants and animals. Erwin Chargaff, a biochemist, laid the foundation for research into the chemical composition of DNA. Sanford Palay, a neuroscientist, helped uncover the detailed anatomy of the nerve cell. Martin Deutsch discovered the positronium, a kind of atom whose existence had previously only been theorized. Peter Bergmann wrote the first textbook about Albert Einstein's general theory of relativity. Clifford Frondel was one of the first American mineralogists to examine moon rocks. Julius Kane, a Holocaust survivor, headed the medical mycology laboratory in Ontario's ministry of health.

John Weitz, a major fashion designer, was one of the first to enter into licensing deals. George Barrie created Brut, the men's fragrance. William Rosenberg founded Dunkin' Donuts, one of the world's largest coffee and baked goods chains. Arnold Weinstock was president of General Electric Company, Britain's biggest industrial conglomerate. Harry Walker was the founder of a speakers' agency that represented heads of state and celebrities. Harold Oshry founded one of the first car leasing companies in the United States.

John Wallach founded Seeds for Peace, which promotes understanding between Israeli and Arab children. Ehud Sprinzak, a Hebrew University professor, was an expert on Israel's far right. Gerald Gunther, a Stanford University legal scholar, wrote Constitutional Law, the standard text on the subject. Walter Weiss was the legendary maitre d'hotel at Manhattan's 21 Club. William Pierce, founder of the National Alliance, a major American neo-Nazi organization, wrote The Turner Diaries, the incendiary novel that promoted race war and supposedly inspired Timothy McVeigh to perpetrate the 1995 Oklahoma City bombing.

Do Preteens Care About Chessed?

Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto

When students reach Middle School, their focus often shifts to academics and extracurricular activities. At our Middle School, students continue to engage in acts of chessed (kindness) with a passion. Several campaigns are always in progress, from Chanuka gifts for less fortunate children, to food drives for the needy, to socks for the homeless. With a specific Zionist perspective, our students raised money for victims of terror through the sale of Israeli flag pins, and fundraised to send Israeli children victims of terror to Camp Koby. Chessed is our way of life at all ages.

We need some light to get our kids' attention

By RABBI E. AVRAHAM PLOTKIN

A story is told of a simple man, a railway guard, whose job was to stand at the railway crossing and look out for oncoming trains. When a train would approach, he would wave his lantern to the local traffic, warning them to stop for the train.

Rabbinic Reflections

One evening, upon noticing the usual 10 p.m. train, he routinely grabbed his lantern and waved it at an oncoming car to stop. To his great horror, the car ignored his signal and proceeded as if he were not there. Helplessly, he waved his lantern and shouted out at the top of his lungs, but to no avail. The car collided with the train and was totally demolished, killing all the passengers in the car instantly.

Subsequently, the family of the deceased passengers filed a major lawsuit against the railway company. At the court hearing, the simple railway guard was called to the stand as the star witness. After a gruelling cross-examination, the case was dismissed without any cost to the railway company.

On the way out of the courtroom, the president of the multi-million dollar railway company walked over to the simple guard, congratulated him for a job well done and thanked him for his testimony, which literally saved the company millions.

The proud, simple man turned to the president of the railway company whom he truly respected and said: "In all honesty, sir, I wonder what would have happened if the judge had asked me if the lantern was lit?"

In many ways, we are all like the simple railway guard in the story. We too, have been entrusted with the special duty of protecting our children and communities from the oncoming trains that present a grave danger and threaten the future of our people. These are the trains of ignorance, assimilation and intermarriage. We must do everything within our power to protect our families from these ominous trains.

Of course, like the simple guard, we are inclined to react by yelling, shouting and waving our lantern at them. "Don't you dare assimilate," we tell our children. "If you intermarry, you will hurt me very deeply," or "I will jump off the nearest roof," we say. These are scare tactics — desperate attempts to deal with the train heading right for us. But alas, the lantern is not lit. Without any light in the lantern, no one will pay attention to the message.

As a rabbi, over the years I have had many parents consult me on what to do with their uninterested children or how to stop their children from marrying out of the faith.

The answer I give them is not to wave their hands in desperation, but rather to present to their children a warm and glowing light, the light of Torah and mitzvot. The positive approach has proven to be the only effective one.

Let's give our children a positive and enthusiastic Jewish experience throughout their childhood years. Only through a wholesome positive Jewish experience based on education and love of Hashem and the Jewish people will we succeed in receiving the nachas we all truly crave.

Let's light our lanterns today. Our future depends on it.

Rabbi Plotkin is spiritual leader and director of Chabad Lubavitch of Markham, Thornhill.

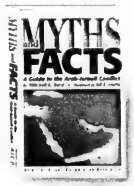
Loan guarantees are not grants

MYTH:

U.S. loan guarantees provided Israel with billions of dollars from American taxpayers that was used to build settlements in the West Bank and Gaza to house Soviet Jews.

FACT:

Since 1989, approximately one million Jews have immigrated to Israel. The majority, roughly 80 per cent, have come from the former Soviet Union. Israel must provide these immigrants with food, shelter, employment and training.



To meet these challenges, Israel has invested billions of dollars, and the Diaspora Jewish community has contributed hundreds of millions of dollars through various campaigns.

Still, the task has been so daunting that Israel asked the United States for help. To put the challenge in perspective, consider that the United States – a country of nearly 300 million people and with a multi-trillion dollar GNP – admits roughly 125,000 refugees a year. In 1990 alone, nearly 200,000 Jews immigrated to Israel.

The United States was a leader in the fight to free Soviet Jews. In 1972, the U.S. Congress began helping to fund their resettlement in Israel. Since 1992, $80 million (US) has been earmarked for this purpose.

After the Soviet Union opened its gates, the number of immigrants grew from fewer than 13,000 people in 1989 to more than 185,000 in 1990.

Israel then requested a different kind of help, and in 1990, the United States approved $400 million (US) in loan guarantees to help.

Guarantees are not grants. The United States simply cosigns loans for Israel that give bankers confidence to lend Israel money at more favourable terms: lower interest rates and longer repayment periods — as long as 30 years instead of only five to seven.

These loan guarantees have no impact on U.S. taxpayers, unless Israel were to default on its loans, something it has never done. In addition, much of the money Israel borrows is spent in the United States to purchase U.S. goods.

When the flood of refugees became even greater than anticipated, and tens of thousands continued to arrive every month, Israel realized it needed more help and asked the United States for $10 billion (US) more in guarantees.

In 1992, Congress authorized the president to provide these guarantees in annual increments of $2 billion over five years. While the cost to the U.S. government was zero, Israel paid the United States annual fees totalling several hundred million dollars to cover administrative and other costs.

Under existing guidelines, no U.S. assistance to Israel can be used beyond Israel's pre-1967 borders. Moreover, to underline U.S. dissatisfaction with Israel's settlement policies, the president was authorized to reduce the annual loan guarantees by the amount equal to the value of Israeli activities in the West Bank and Gaza the previous year.

The U.S. State Department determined Israel spent just under $1.4 billion for settlement activity from 1993 to 1996. The president was authorized, however, to rescind deductions when making funds available to Israel was deemed to be in the security interests of the United States. Former president Bill Clinton used this authority in the last three years of the program, so the actual reduction in the amount of guarantees available to Israel was $774 million.

The money related to settlements had nothing to do with the new immigrants, none of whom were forced to live in the territories. In fact, only a tiny percentage voluntarily chose to do so.

By all measures, the loan guarantee program was a success. Israel used the borrowed funds mainly to increase the foreign currency available to the its business sector and to support infrastructure projects, such as roads, bridges and electrical plants. The guarantees also helped Israel find housing and jobs for virtually all new immigrants.

Besides helping Israel absorb immigrants, the program also sent a strong message to international capital markets about U.S. confidence in Israel's ability to bear this economic burden. As a result, Israel's credit rating was upgraded.

Tzedakah & kids – part 3

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Today, we continue our look at tzedakah and the Web. Tzedakah, of course, is a habit best developed when young, and there are many sites on the Internet geared to developing a sense of community and commitment in young people.

In Tzedakah and Community: Living Jewish Day to Day, you'll find this advice from Rabbi Eliyahu Dressler: "Parents are obligated to help their children convert their self-centered orientation into an altruistic one – that is, to learn to love their fellow as themselves... The first step... is acquired naturally in the family, when parents accustom their children to do things for them and for each other." [http://shlk.com/248]

Jewish Parenting Today has several suggestions for getting your kids thinking about tzedakah. How about "cleaning out your kids' closet for clothes to give away before the new school year starts? Let your children know about the mitzvah of Halbashat Arumim, providing clothes for those who are in need of them. Make sure your kids are aware that this Jewish tradition stretches back many centuries." [http://shlk.com/250]

I also recommend Virtual Jerusalem's Tzedakah: Why Should we Give? As the site explains, "Did you know that the root of the Hebrew word 'to give' is 'Natan' – 'Nun, Taf, Nun'? Notice that you can read it backwards and forwards. What does that tell us? That through giving, you get back." [http://207.168.91.4/vjholidays/rosh/whygive.htm]

How do you teach kids to give regularly? B'nai Brith Interactive recommends colouring in a Jewish calendar with plenty of tzedakah reminders. For example, "Write 'Pocket Change' on every Friday on the calendar. On Erev Shabbat, put your remaining change in a pushke, (tzedakah box) just before lighting candles." [http://shlk.com/251] And here's a simple way to get kids in the habit of giving tzedakah – at no cost to them. By registering at GiveDaily.org, the Web site will donate on your behalf a penny a day for a year to various charities. The only catch (if you can call it that) is that you'll receive regular e-mails telling you where the donation is going. You can choose whether your donation goes to such causes as Israel, Jewish education or medical research. [http://www.givedaily.org/]

As adults know, sometimes you have to make tough decisions when choosing which charities to support. Some schools are challenging their students to learn more about various organizations and to learn how to decide where their money will go. When the kids at Greenburgh Hebrew Center Religious School in Dobbs Ferry, N.Y., ran a Tzedakah Fair, they invited representatives of Friends of the Israel Defence Forces, Mazon, the Jewish National Fund and the Israel Guide Dog Center. The students were given play money and challenged to decide how they would distribute their money. [http://uscj.org/ metny/dobbsghc/rlschool/tf.html]

Meanwhile, students at Congregation Shir Hadash in Los Gatos, Calif., established their own "tzedakah council" and studied several worthwhile projects around the world. They decided to support "Jewish solidarity, the Cuban Jewish Relief Fund, and AIDS research" and at a later point decide on the next tzedakah projects. [http://www.uahc.org/congs/ca/ca006/notes9706/educ01.html]

If you are a teacher or a youth group leader, you may be interested in a program offered by the Jewish Fund for Justice Web site. The three-part Tzedakah Partnership Program consists of a course about the causes and consequences of poverty; a hands-on project that students carry out in partnership with local community-based groups; and the giving of tzedakah. [http://www.jfjustice.org/tzedakah_partnership.htm]

Finally, all children – and adults – should learn the famous commentary on tzedakah by Moses Maimonides, the great 12th century rabbi/philosopher. Maimonides maintains all giving is not equal and says there are actually eight levels of giving – from the lowest level, giving reluctantly, to the fourth level, giving before one is asked, to the highest, which is helping another by enabling that person to become self-sufficient through a gift or loan, or helping the person gain a skill or find employment. [http://www.jopp.org/mc_kits/tikun_olam.htm]

So, whether you've just helped someone find a job or donated a few pennies from your allowance, yishar koach!

Communal dialogue ultimately fails

Books
Bernard Baskin

One People, Two Worlds*, by Ammiel Hirsch and Yosef Reinman, Random House, $40.00.

This stimulating book is based on an e-mail dialogue between Rabbi Ammiel Hirsch, executive director of the Reform Zionists of America, and Rabbi Yosef Reinman, an Orthodox expert on talmudic law, that took place from January 2000, to October 2001, in an attempt to explain to each other their beliefs about Judaism.

In their exchange, they discussed many issues, including the nature of truth and religious authority, God and revelation, biblical history, the role of women in Judaism, the Law of Return, the Jewishness of Russian immigrants, the authorship of the Talmud, the Holocaust and Zionism.

Unfortunately, yet perhaps understandably, there is ultimately little agreement; their views on almost every subject are divergent. They are polite to each other, and both are extremely knowledgeable, persuasive and provocative in presenting their points of view, but, essentially, they remain in two different worlds.

A fundamental difference in opinion between them is on the authorship and authenticity of the Torah. Rabbi Reinman believes in the absolute truth of the Torah and its origin as revelation at Mount Sinai.

Rabbi Hirsch responds that even if a Jew believes with perfect faith in the literal transmission of the Torah from God to Moses and ultimately to today's generation, the Judaism practised today is not at all the Judaism practised in biblical times.

"Rather," Rabbi Hirsch says, "it is the Judaism of successive generations of Jews who interpreted the Bible, who pronounced verdicts, expounded upon and expanded points of law, custom, tradition and theology throughout our history."

In defending the rights of women to worship on an equal basis with men, Rabbi Hirsch wonders why, if men are distracted by women, they – rather than women – are not placed behind the mechitzah?

Rabbi Reinman states that exposure of the woman's body is inflammatory, not the man's.

"In a casual conversation between an attractive man and an attractive woman, the man's thoughts will easily turn in a libidinous direction, but the woman's will not. Therefore, putting men on the other side of the mekhitzah and having women conduct services accomplishes nothing. As for your female rabbis and cantors, what can I say? If you're striving for holiness, this is not the way."

At one point in their correspondence, Rabbi Reinman proclaims that "Orthodoxy will never recognize Reform as a legitimate stream of Judaism, because it is not."

Though the book ends on a positive note – Rabbi Hirsch writes, "The publication of this book conveys in symbolic and tangible ways that it is possible for Jews to reason together" – unfortunately, a scheduled 17-city book tour by both rabbis was cancelled when Rabbi Reinman, under pressure from The Council of Torah Sages, a haredi advisory group, withdrew.

Garry Rosenblatt, editor of the New York Jewish Week, was outraged. "One wonders if the sages are mindful of, or care, that the perception many non-Orthodox Jews have is that their Orthodox brethren look down on and fear any social contact between the two groups. Misunderstanding, resentment and anger would seem to be a natural byproduct. It is more than a shame that this noble effort to close the denominational gap between Jews has only resulted in its growing wider."

Rabbi Goldstein's sabbatical will be a lesson in life

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, executive director of Kolel: The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning, is planning to have an extended Shabbat.

Rabbi Goldstein

Sabbatical comes from the word Shabbat, she says, and she wants to return from her upcoming six-month sabbatical as renewed and refreshed as if she had experienced an extended Shabbat.

She is planning her first ever sabbatical after 12 years in her current position, and just prior to the 20th anniversary of her ordination as a rabbi.

Together with her husband Baruch Sienna and their three sons ages 13,11 and nine, they are "travelling the long way to Israel"

Starting Jan. 1, they are visiting New Zealand, Australia, China and Thailand. They then plan on a two-month stay in Israel, after which they will return home via Greece and Italy.

She said she plans to do no "teaching, no speaking, no preaching," but while in Israel she plans to study with Haviva Ner-David, an Orthodox feminist studying privately to become the world's first female Orthodox rabbi, and with her former professor, Rabbi Ben Hollander.

"It's important for me to study with partners who will challenge me. I need to bring that back to our own community."

At a recent tribute dinner in her honour chaired by Helen Zukerman and Dorothy Shoichet, Rabbi Goldstein said she was brought up in a very insulated neighbourhood of New York City.

"My life was a fairly straight path to the rabbinate – youth groups, Jewish summer camps, Israel in high school, then on to Judaic studies at Brandeis University.

"That is why this sabbatical is so special. I need to expand my horizons, to open my mind to other cultures, and to come home to Judaism refreshed and renewed."

She wants to learn what it is about Judaism that speaks so deeply to her by understanding what speaks deeply to other people.

For six months, she says, her children, all students at the Toronto Heschel School, will be part of "the school of life."

The family plans on keeping a sabbatical Web site where students can drop in and ask questions, she says.

"It will be an on-line schooling experience for everyone involved. My children will connect with their friends at school while they are learning their own lessons, and the other kids will know what we are up to."

Thinking back to the beginnings of Kolel, Rabbi Goldstein said that 12 years ago, she could not have dreamed where it would be today.

"It is very humbling to build an institution. It is like raising a child. One minute they're a baby; the next minute they're a bar mitzvah. Going into our 12th year, I'm a bat mitzvah again in a sense."

In the fall of 1991, Rabbi Goldstein taught all of Kolel's four courses.

"We started our advanced Torah class with the first word of Genesis, and [just this month] we celebrated studying the end of Exodus. Half the students who began that class are still there."

The tide turned somehow, she said, "and somehow, Kolel has become a big place.

"We have this gorgeous building, a building which not only houses our classes, but also houses our values: hachnassat orchim, welcoming the stranger; tikkun olam, Torah study that leads to action [that makes] a better world; and shalom bayit, a spiritual place with a peaceful feeling."

She is leaving Kolel in good hands, she said, and when she returns she wants it to emerge as an institution that serves the needs of the whole community.

"I would like to see the programming expand, and I would like more leadership courses as well as more long-term courses.

At the tribute, Zukerman and Shoichet announced the establishment of a rabbinic endowment fund in Rabbi Goldstein's honour.

Hundreds enjoy annual NCSY concert

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

More than 1,700 people of all ages sang along, cheered and waved glo-sticks at last week's 22nd annual National Conference of Synagogue Youth (NCSY) concert, held at the newly renovated Roy Thomson Hall.

NCSY is the synagogue youth arm of the Union of Orthodox Hebrew Congregations (OU).

Popular international Jewish music stars Dedi and Yehuda were joined by Toronto's Avanim and Kol Chaverim choirs, DoviDovid and the Nafshenu Orchestra.

Dennis Klein, founding president, chair and CEO of Denninghouse Inc., was presented with the first annual OU/NCSY National Business Leadership Award. Klein, his wife Gabrielle, a physician, and their six children recently made aliyah, and live in Efrat.

Also honoured were Sara and Andrew Novak, who received the NCSY alumni award for distinguished community service.

The hit of the evening was the new singing group, Avanim, conducted by accountant David Young. Its members are dentist John Gasner, businessmen Robert Gasner and Mordie Shields, and Randy Spiegel, executive director of Zareinu Educational Centre, as well as four of their sons, Zev Gasner, Ariel Shields, Koby Speigel and Jakie Young.

The group came out in identical black turtleneck sweaters, which the younger members soon changed to Maple Leaf hockey sweaters to the appreciative hollers of the audience.

Besides giving a solo performance, they accompanied singer Yehuda and later appeared in the finale.

Yehuda, who received enthusiastic applause for tossing glo-sticks and frisbees into the crowd, sang some of his most popular songs, including Shir Hadas and Tikvah. In a moving performance, he also sang along to tapes of his musical mentor, Shlomo Carlebach.

The Kol Chaverim choir, a group of men who originally came together simply because they liked to sing, has gained in popularity and now serves as backup for several Jewish music stars. Dressed in their trademark paisley vests and wing-tip shirts, they were particularly effective with their renditions of Ata Shoalti and a haunting Oseh Shalom.

Headliner Dedi interspersed his set with jokes, often about his weight. His sweet voice was perfect for the anthem of the Six Day War, Yerushalayim Shel Zahav, the melancholy strains fitting the scenes of today's troubled Jerusalem that were shown on an onstage screen.

Also performing were DoviDovid, a musical duo consisting of David Kerzner and David Ifrah, who often work with the Nafshenu Orchestra, and who have recently released their second CD.

Throughout the evening, the screen showed pictures of recent NCSY trips and programs, and interviews with young people studying in Israel with the organization's help.

York profs take a multi-faceted look at Jewish Toronto

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Toronto's Jewish community must try to acknowledge the distinctiveness of local Russian and Israeli Jews and not expect them to "walk into the synagogues and join community-based organizations as 'Jews, period' because they consider themselves to be [culturally] distinctive."

That admonition by York University sociology professor Rina Cohen was part of a 2½ hour panel discussion on the Multi-Faceted Judaism of Toronto at the American Academy of Religion conference held recently in Toronto.

Speaking on the panel with Cohen were fellow York professors Irving Abella, Stuart Schoenfeld and Alex Pomson, each offering a window on a specific part of the community.

Abella, a historian, discussed When Toronto Jews Became White; Schoenfeld, a sociologist, addressed the phenomenon of the burgeoning downtown Jewish community, and Pomson, who heads York's Jewish teacher education program, talked about changing day school demographics. Martin Lockshin, director of York's Centre for Jewish Studies, moderated the program at the Sheraton Centre Hotel.

Cohen classified today's immigrants from Israel and the former Soviet Union (FSU) as "transnational" ethnic communities that are simultaneously part of, and distinct from, the larger Jewish community.

Unlike their predecessors who immigrated before the technological advances of the late 20th century, they don't experience the same need to integrate and their immigration is not viewed as irreversible. Many, she said, have extensive networks of family and friends in the United States, Israel, Europe and Russia and 15 to 20 per cent return to their countries of origin almost every year.

Toronto's ex-Soviet Jewish community is estimated at between 25,000 and 30,000 people, with 40 per cent over age 65.

"The challenge for the larger community," Cohen said, "is to try to acknowledge the distinctiveness of these two sub-communities [from Israel and the FSU] and to understand that in today's technological and transnational atmosphere, the absorption of ethnic subgroups cannot happen the way it used to."

The non-Jewish community in Toronto has also changed. "Toronto is a very diverse city," said Abella. "A generation or two ago, it was a far different place: parochial, narrow-minded and intolerant."

By 1948, attitudes reflected in employment and housing discrimination were beginning to change, and by the early 1950s, pervasive anti-Semitism had receded, said Abella.

The 1960s, he noted, were watershed years when all the barriers, restrictions and quotas against Jews were removed.

Changes for which Jewish activists lobbied over the years have helped other minority groups as well, said Abella. While racism, homophobia and xenophobia have not been eradicated, Canada is undeniably a better place, he pointed out.

The increasing legitimacy of multiculturalism in America is one of the primary causes of an increase in Jewish day school enrolment over the past 20 years, Pomson said.

He said figures from UJA Federation Board of Jewish education indicate that about 34 per cent of Jewish children in Toronto between Grades one and eight are educated in all-day Jewish schools.

Other significant causes for enrolment increases are a decline in funding and quality of education at public schools; greater disposable income enabling Jewish parents to afford private school fees; and recent fears regarding Jewish continuity in the wake of a 1991 survey in the United States indicating that Jewish intermarriage rates exceed 50 per cent, said Pomson.

Although Jewish day school attendance in general has risen in Toronto – with 11 new schools opening in the last seven years – attendance at the city's three largest schools, which cater to a broader base of students, has fallen by 8 to 16 per cent, said Pomson.

Many of the new schools might be classified as "boutique" or even catering to "marginal" tastes, he added.

Schoenfeld, who chairs the Downtown Jewish Community Council, also spoke about Jews who are bucking trends, or who were perceived to be 20 years ago when they moved to downtown Toronto, an area he defined as south of St. Clair Avenue.

"Many Toronto Jews thought 20 years ago, 'Why would Jews want to move back to the neighbourhoods we worked so hard to get out of?' "

Today Jewish life in downtown Toronto is seen as "fully legitimate," said Schoenfeld. There has been significant institutional growth, he noted, including five new congregations, a third Jewish supplementary school and a day school. In addition, the Bloor JCC is one of the three focal points of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Jewish Toronto Tomorrow program, which is developing or re-developing that site, the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre/Lipa Green Building site, and a new site to be built further north along Bathurst Street in Richmond Hill.

The downtown phenomenon is not unique to Toronto, Schoenfeld said. Among the implications, he noted that "it's probably a good bet that intermarriage rates are higher" than in Jewish neighbourhoods in the suburbs.

It's not necessarily a downtown phenomenon, however, he noted. He compared downtown Jewish living to Jewish life in a small town, or in suburban areas with a similar Jewish density (usually less than 10 per cent Jewish residents per block).

The Pianist leaves audience breathless

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

The credits rolled and the audience sat silently, barely moving, except for the odd sniffle and long exhale. They had just finished watching a special screening of Roman Polanski's two-and-a-half hour Holocaust-era drama, The Pianist.

Playing one night only at Varsity Cinema in Toronto last week, the Polanski film attracted 220 people to an event hosted by the Polish Jewish Heritage Foundation (PJHF) and Feniks Polish Film Promotion.

According to Peter Jassem, the president of PJHF's Toronto chapter, the tickets sold out in three days. The film made its return to Toronto, three months after it debuted in North America at the Toronto International Film Festival.

The Pianist, to be released across Canada on Dec. 25, recounts the true-life horrors of pianist Wladyslaw Szpilman (Adrien Brody), a Polish Jew in Warsaw who escapes Nazi persecution. The film details his struggle to survive in a ruined city and the kindness he receives from the most unlikely of strangers.

"This shows the human condition is such a tragic circumstance," said Jassem, noting that The Pianist's representation of war-era Warsaw is bound to become a fundamental piece of Holocaust filmography.

The crucial factor in the film's overseas success, European film critics say, is Polanski's own wartime experiences – he survived the Krakow ghetto and the bombing of Warsaw – and what he has said is his desire to direct a meaningful Holocaust picture that would recreate his childhood memories.

After reading Szpilman's 1946 memoirs, Death of a City, the Polish director knew instantly the renowned pianist would be the subject of his next film.

His efforts haven't passed unnoticed. The Pianist won the prestigious Palme d'Or at the Cannes Film Festival this year, and also took the 2002 European Film Academy Award for Best European Cinematographer (Pawel Edelman).

After the screening, viewers praised more than the film's cinematic style.

Margaret Steawicki, close to tears, said it didn't simply show one side of the problem, which she said occurs in other Holocaust films. Steawicki was only a child when Warsaw was ravaged by the fleeing German army, but she never forgot the crumbling houses framed by the smoky sky.

"[The movie] truly captured the black nothing of the city," she said.

Josef Meshorer, 70, who spent years in the Warsaw ghetto, commended the director's eye for detail. From the corpses strewn on the street to the drenching despair hovering over every Polish-Jewish family, The Pianist's documentary-style specifics, he said, made this "the best Holocaust film I've ever seen."

Jassem, who admitted Szpilman's Holocaust account made him cry, urged the public to see the film despite its graphic violence.

"It shows the full cross-section of cultural attitudes," he said. "It shows bad Poles, good Poles, bad Nazis and good Nazis."

Canadian Jewish Congress president Keith Landy, who was invited to the screening, stressed the film's importance – and not only for Canadian Jewry.

"Every Jewish person seeing the film should bring 10 non-Jews with him," Landy said.

The screening was the final event in PJHF's 2002 program. The organization aims to preserve Polish Jewish heritage and encourage greater knowledge of the culture's history.

Associated announces scholarships

Associated Hebrew Schools is currently accepting applications for scholarships for students to study at institutions of post-secondary Jewish learning in Israel for the 2003/4 academic year. Scholarships are granted annually to qualifying candidates through the school's scholarship and endowment fund.

For the 2002/3 academic year, more than $11,000 has been allocated to: Sara Greenwood at Midreshet Lindenbaum; Maytal Helfand and Mark Jesin at Hebrew University; Benjamin Noy at Yeshivat Torat Moshe; Jory Scherer at Yeshivat Darchei Noam and Daniela Steinman and Eiran Warner at Bar Ilan University.

Qualifying candidates must have graduated from Associated as well as from a recognized Jewish day high school or yeshiva. Special scholarship awards are made to students preparing for a career in Jewish education.

Awards are granted for a single year of study but students may apply for additional years. Payment is conditional upon the successful completion of the approved program.

Application forms are now available and may be requested from: Associated Hebrew Schools scholarship committee, 6100 Leslie Street, Willowdale, Ontario, M2H 3J1, or by telephone: 416-494-7666, ext. 334. The deadline for application submissions is March 31, 2003.

Judaica exhibit depicts 'Jewish life of the past'

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Jewish ritual objects and "simple treasures of everyday life" are on display at a recently opened exhibit of Judaica at the Silverman Heritage Museum at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

The diverse items are grouped under the title Through the Eyes of a Woman: The Judaica Collection of Sandra Temes.

"I am interested in collecting anything and everything that is Jewish," Temes says.

'Simple treasures of everyday life'

In the early 1970s, she and her husband, Marvin, a pharmacist, went to Spain and brought back a piece of Judaica. When she returned home, she took a course on antiques.

"Some of the women in my class were from the British Isles. They spoke of their family's heirlooms that they brought to Canada with them. I decided that I would collect my heritage."

Over the years, Temes has been an active member of the Baycrest museum's steering committee and the Beth Tzedec Reuben and Helene Dennis Museum. She has accumulated several hundred items, including religious objects, jewelry and textiles.

Her collection includes more than 60 dreidels from around the world by artists such as Dimitry Shteynberg, Shula Baron, Jody Fine, Brenda Orenstein, Herman Braginsky, Anat Brigg and Shari Klein. Of exceptional interest is a wood, hand-painted Refusenik Dreidel with portraits of Lenin, Brezhnev, Gorbachev and Stalin by Gregory Yossinsky.

"The Sandra Temes Collection of Judaica is an assemblage not only of fine artist-made ritual objects from around the world, but of many simple, beloved treasures of daily life," says Dorion Liebgott, curator of the Beth Tzedec museum.

"This wonderful collection is a gift for present and future generations to learn about Jewish life and workmanship of the past."

She says she has received many items from friends and acquaintances downsizing to smaller homes.

"Their help extended my scope immeasurably," she says. "I was able to collect things I could never have found on my own."

Of the exhibit, she says she was "fortunate to have Judaic textile artist Elaine Glassman and Shirley Grossman and Pat Dickinson, the co-ordinator of the Silverman Heritage Museum, display the items in a beautiful and exciting way. And I am grateful to the members of the Baycrest museum committee who were enthusiastic about displaying my collection."

She says her father and mother, who came from Lenitz, Russia, and Warsaw, Poland, respectively, and her maternal grandparents, who lived with her family, celebrated the holidays together and told many folklore stories.

Her interest in collecting started early. "Even as a child I loved collecting things such as signed movie star photographs," she says.

Among the items in Temes's exhibition, which will be on display until the summer, are: a hand-embroidered matzah cover, a Passover pillow from Poland, pins from Hadassah-WIZO, ORT and Israel Bonds, a brass pierced 19th century menorah from India, Coalport China Passover dishes, challah covers and Purim masks.

Also included is a Polychroom Delft bar mitzvah plate from Holland with a photo of the bar mitzvah boy and details about his big day – including date, location and menu – as well as his interests and other information. Temes bought the plate in a local thrift shop in 1999.

The exhibit also contains the first plate of a limited edition produced in Denmark to commemorate the 120th anniversary of the Danish Jewish Almanac, which has been published in Copenhagen since 1861.

"We believe that the clients and visitors to Baycrest will relate to what is on display because they are items from their own history and family life," Dickinson says, adding that Baycrest's museum is the only one in Canada in a geriatric centre with a permanent collection and temporary exhibits.

For more information or to arrange a group visit, call Pat Dickinson, 416-785-2500, ext. 2802, or e-mail pdickinson@baycrest.org.

CJ Food

A feast for the senses

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

Last month, I spent two days at Kosherfest 2002. What an amazing experience! So much food, so little time to see and sample everything, as more than 13,000 exhibitors and visitors from 29 countries crowded into the Meadowlands Exposition Center in Secaucus, N.J.

I tasted several wonderful cheeses from Two Tribes, of Northbrook, Ill. Would you believe names like Bis'l Swiss'l, Muenster Mench and Mazel Rella? Oy, my cholesterol levels – but worth every bite.

The variety of smoked fish was also amazing. I nibbled a slice or two of smoked butterfish from Haifa Smoked Fish of Jamaica, N.Y. Addictive – better than smoked salmon, in my opinion.

I lunched at Levitt's, happily enjoying a Montreal-style hot dog plus an assortment of their new line of hors d'oeuvres. Yummy! I loved their Moroccan cigars and borekas. It was like being at a Montreal simchah. Murray Brookman told me that in the new year they will be available in consumer-sized packages. They're a winner.

I nibbled and noshed on chocolates and scrumptious apricot candies from Gold Finales Chocolatiers, located in Orlando, Fla. They make diamond-shaped apricot candies with a crunchy coating of coarse sugar and an almond centre. They were absolutely addictive – sweet but tangy at the same time. Golde and Enrique Finkler, formerly of Mexico, promised me they could ship a supply by UPS to Canada anytime. They will definitely be hearing from me!

The winner of the award for the most innovative product of the year went to Euro-Cut Inc., a New Jersey-based company, for La Briute, the meal that heats itself. What an amazing product!

Abe Halberstam explained that the patented heating process is hydro-thermic. It's complicated to explain but easy to do if you follow the directions on the package. In 14 minutes you have a delicious meal, including the cutlery, salt and pepper, with no dishes to wash. What a boon for the kosher traveller, kids away at college, campers, skiers, hikers and bikers.

There are three varieties available – chicken primavera with noodles, beef stew with vegetables and a pareve vegetable stew. Everything is glatt kosher.

The company plans to offer several new products in the near future, including pancakes with maple syrup, ravioli in tomato sauce and turkey with mashed potatoes and gravy. They are working on setting up Canadian distribution. For further information, check out their Web site at www.labriutemeals.com or call 1-800-959-1555. Oh, the possibilities!

There was an excellent seminar geared to the challenges of kosher food service, chaired by culinary consultant Ethel Hofman, author of Everyday Cooking for the Jewish Home. Members of the panel included Levana Kirschenbaum of Levana's Restaurant, Rabbi Abraham Juravel of the Orthodox Union and Jacob Lieberman of Yeshiva University.

An appeal for more uniform standards came from several agencies. Lieberman and Kirschenbaum cited examples of "mixed signals" on the kosher status of some ingredient items.

Rabbi Juravel stated that answers on standards "should be obtained from senior kashrut officials at headquarters and not from the mashgiach (on-site kosher supervisor)." Rabbi Juravel noted that many items that appear to be benign on the surface "actually have very serious kashrut issues."

Any food that is processed in any way requires supervision. An example was given of how salt that was produced for Passover in Israel had been run on a line that had been used previously for flour. Therefore the salt could not be used for Passover.

Mashgiachs agreed that supervision of a restaurant or catering company is far more complicated and challenging than supervision of a company that produces packaged products on an assembly line.

I left the seminar with an elevated respect for the "shomrim" or guardians of our kosher food supply and the challenges they face to preserve proper standards for the kosher consumer.

I flew home carrying a big "peckel" of products, including a box of Manischewitz Mediterranean Matzos (sun-dried tomatoes, garlic, basil and olive oil). The airlines attendant looked at my haul and said, "I'm Jewish too. Maybe you have a good recipe for potato latkes?"

Kosherfest 2003 will take place Oct. 28-29 at the Jacob Javits Center in New York City.

There are many banquet halls.

There's only one Kehila Centre.

Tory leadership hopeful discusses Mideast peace

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

It was billed as an opportunity to exchange views and Tory leadership hopeful Peter MacKay quickly learned that among supporters of the Simon Wiesenthal Center, Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat's role in future peace talks is problematic, to say the least.

MacKay, Progressive Conservative Party House leader and justice critic, was fielding questions at a breakfast meeting of the Canadian Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, when he was asked about the Palestinian/Israeli conflict.

MacKay drew a skeptical reaction and mild interjections from his audience when he followed up a statement saying it is improper to negotiate with terrorists with another view that acknowledged Arafat should have a role in talks.

Trying to square that circle, MacKay asked, "What do you do? How do you speak to them?" quickly adding he was not expert on the topic and he was at the meeting to hear the perspective of others.

In a freewheeling address, the Tory house leader and justice critic touched on a number of controversial topics. He discussed his experience as a prosecutor in his home province of Nova Scotia, he critiqued the nearly $1-billion cost overrun in the government's gun registry program, he urged Canada to be more respectful of American sensibilities, and he called for the continued prosecution of war criminals.

It is time for Canada to reassert its leadership role in world affairs, as in the days of Brian Mulroney's administration when the country pressed for the abolition of apartheid in South Africa, MacKay said.

"I don't want to see our country slip. I don't want to see our country lose its place in the world."

Turning to the domestic scene, MacKay said the cost overrun in the gun registry program "reflects the government's priorities." He also questioned the utility of the program in which "criminals are not going to participate in gun registry."

Referring to his experience as a Crown prosecutor, MacKay said enforcement of the law sends a clear message that there are "consequences" for criminal behaviour – a message, he said, that seems to be lost on young people who should be held to account for their actions.

He suggested the same "message of deterrence" is at play when war criminals are prosecuted vigilantly.

During a question-and-answer session, MacKay said Canadians should "not be disrespectful" of U.S. power or we may find our American neighbours looking increasingly to Mexico for counsel.

"We can play a more significant role by being respectful, asserting the values we see as important... We have been tentative and sometimes stupid in the way we approach things," he said.

Asked whether the nation's conservative parties might ever present a common front, MacKay said the political disarray on the right resembles a family fight, with a long history and injured pride.

There is no easy path back to governing for the Tories, he continued. "There are no shortcuts. You simply have to build it up from the ground."

In his address, which took place before last week's announcement that Ottawa is banning all activities of Hezbollah in this country, not just those of its so-called military wing, MacKay said a Tory government would have "immediately" moved to add it to the list of terrorist groups banned in Canada.

MacKay's address was part of an irregular series of breakfast meeting at the Windsor Arms Hotel, said Leo Adler, director of national affairs for the centre.

Axworthy praises Mitzna

As Israel approaches elections on Jan. 28, former Canadian foreign minister Lloyd Axworthy has commended Amram Mitzna, newly elected leader of Israel's Labor Party, for his peace platform, which includes negotiations with the Palestinians and the withdrawal of settlements from the Gaza Strip ("A gleam at the end of the tunnel?" Globe and Mail, Dec. 9).

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

In the article, Axworthy also praised the growing debate between Labor and Likud as a testament to the vibrancy of Israeli democracy – a phenomenon, he noted, sorely lacking elsewhere in the Middle East.

"Mr. Mitzna's stand is also an act of political courage in the face of public feelings of fear, frustration and insecurity," Axworthy writes. "It is never easy to advocate non-military responses when nerves are made raw by continuing acts of violence."

Israeli prime minister and Likud party leader Ariel Sharon also advocates negotiations with the Palestinians, but only once there is a cessation of bloodshed, and with a Palestinian partner who, unlike Palestinian Authority (PA) President Yasser Arafat, truly renounces violence. Axworthy needs to ask how any Israel leader can be expected to negotiate with someone who showed at Camp David in the summer of 2000 and in the following period that he preferred violence to diplomacy.

As long as Arafat remains in charge – and it appears he will – most Israelis will remain deeply skeptical of further talks. They have, quite simply, lost faith in Arafat.

At the same time Axworthy's article appeared, the highly respected Tami Steinmetz Center for Peace Research released its Peace Index for early December. The index showed that while a large majority of Israeli Jews supports political negotiations with the PA, the eventual establishment of a Palestinian state and the evacuation of some settlements, they generally favour Sharon's positions over Mitzna's.

Prof. Ephraim Yaar and Tamar Hermann, authors of the Peace Index, explain that "a large majority [of Israelis] believe Ariel Sharon can do better at advancing the peace process with the Palestinians while safeguarding Israel's vital interests, whereas only a small minority believes that in regard to the Labor candidate, Amram Mitzna."

The choice for Israeli voters, who have been traumatized and disillusioned by Palestinian violence and terrorism, is not between a "peacenik" and a "warmonger," but rather between two leaders dedicated to peace, albeit with different visions. In today's climate, Mitzna's approach is seen by them as less realistic.

Against the realism of most Israelis who, though desparate for peace, are willing to accept major territorial compromises provided their security is assured, Axworthy's assertion that a Mitzna victory "could dramatically change the dynamics of the region's political discussion and provide an environment more conducive to resolving the Iraqi problem" seems incredibly quixotic. While some have tried to forge linkages between the cases of Isarel and Iraq, no one until now has attempted it in quite this way, tying Israeli democracy to the avoidance of conflict with Iraq. If only such a formula held such a promise.

Son works for the release of his kidnapped father

Abducted by Hezbollah in Europe two years ago

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Ori Tenenboim (Tannenbaum) is well aware of the political calculations that motivated the kidnappers of his father, Elchanan.

He knows it was a Hezbollah cell that abducted his father in Europe during a business trip just before Yom Kippur two years ago.

He knows his father is most likely being held by Hezbollah terrorists in Lebanon, with the collusion of the governments of Lebanon, Syria and Iran. He knows Hezbollah is making cynical calculations as to how best to make use of their Israeli captive.

He knows his best hope of freeing his father is to travel the world from capital to capital to press his case that all influence be brought to bear on the governments of Lebanon, Syria and Iran to force the release of his father.

He knows all that, yet despite the encouragement of friends around the world, the ordeal he and his family are experiencing remains a lonely one. At night he is left with his thoughts, wondering how his father is doing and missing him terribly.

"It's most difficult when you lay in bed at night," he said. "You can't control your thoughts and feelings. During the day you can keep busy. The nights are the hardest."

Tenenboim was in Toronto and Ottawa last week in a bid to enlist Canada's vaunted "soft power" and favourable reputation in the Arab world to try to bring his father home to Israel. His visit coincided with the federal government's decision to add the political wing of Hezbollah to a list of banned terrorist groups.

Prior to travelling to Ottawa for a Parliament Hill news conference, Tannenbaum described to The CJN the blow he and his family experienced on Oct. 15, 2000, when Hezbollah leader Sheikh Hassan Nasrallah announced the organization was holding his father.

Elchanan, a 56-year-old former colonel in the Israeli army, had been a regular traveller to Europe where he worked as a representative of the German telecommunications corporation Siemens.

Since the Hezbollah announcement, Ori, his mother Esther, and sister Keren, have not received direct information about his father, although Israeli intelligence believes he is still being held in Lebanon.

Naturally, that worries him.

"We have every reason to believe his life is in danger, because of a lack of medical treatment and because of Hezbollah's record of brutality, as Western hostages [held in the 1980s] have told in terrible detail," Ori said. "Every day that goes by is another day he's away from us. Every day that goes by is another day he has to suffer."

Adding to his concern is the fact his father requires medication for asthma and he had been operated on in May 2000 for a malignant melanoma. The International committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) transferred some medication to Hezbollah shortly after the kidnapping, but the terror group spurned subsequent requests to meet with ICRC representatives about Elchanan.

It just adds to Ori's anxiety and gloom.

"I get up in the morning, I look out the window and I ask myself if he knows what day it is," Oris said.

"I fix myself a cup of coffee and imagine him sitting with the rest of us. He's there every minute, but you can't touch him, hear him or see him."

Ori, 21, would like to believe the Israeli government is doing all it can to secure his father's release. (Elchanan was abducted shortly after Hezbollah crossed the Lebanon-Israel border and seized three Israeli soldiers at their posts.) Negotiating through a third party, Israel has offered to make a prisoner exchange, but the offer was rebuffed.

"The only problem is that we're dealing with a cruel and ruthless enemy that hasn't put a concrete offer on the table," Ori said.

Daniel Eisen, chair of the International Coalition for Missing Israeli Soldiers (ICMIS), an organization that is helping Ori publicize his message, believes Hezbollah is playing a ruthless game based on a very ambitious agenda.

Elchanan's abduction, along with that of the three soldiers, is part of a "prolonged psychological warfare with Israel. They know this hurts us," Eisen said.

Hezbollah believes the kidnappings enhance their prestige in Lebanon and paints them as the "great protectors of the Arab people and the Palestinians." What's more, "it sets themselves up as the liberating alternative to the Palestinians. Hezbollah is looking to be the dominant force in the whole world of Arab resistance," Eisen said.

If the situation is not resolved, the international implications could be ominous, Ori and Eisen agree. "Hezbollah will export its methods everywhere it can." Eventually, Eisen said, even a Canadian might be abducted.

Meanwhile, the Tenenboim family is persevering. His mother "is holding up," Ori said, though "it's not easy. We have no intention of backing down or falling apart, because we know we have to bring him back home. We're not willing to give up on him."

Ban on Hezbollah prompts threat

The Canadian Arab Federation criticized the government for "censuring one form of violence while remaining silent on another."

The Liberals appeared to reverse course in their ban on fundraising and all other material support for Hezbollah under national and international anti-terrorism laws, which also permit federal officials to freeze and seize Hezbollah's assets in this country.

The placement of Hezbollah on Ottawa's list of 16 banned "terrorist entities" means anyone assisting the organization in any way faces up to 10 years in prison.

Until last week, the government permitted aid only to Hezbollah's so-called political-humanitarian wing, which Ottawa said ran several legitimate charities, schools and clinics. Some said the Liberals were hamstrung by the fact Hezbollah has 12 elected members in the parliament of Lebanon, a fellow member of the Francophonie.

Solicitor-General Wayne Easter said Hezbollah has been raising large sums in Canada, not all of which has gone to charitable work. Previously, Ottawa maintained there was no proof that funds from the group's social arm had made its way to military operations.

Criticism of the Liberal position on Hezbollah intensified earlier this month when Hezbollah leader Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, reportedly called on Palestinians "to take suicide bombings worldwide."

(Last week, after reports questioned whether Nasrallah actually made the remarks, a writer for The Washington Times, which had initially published the comments, reportedly said they came from a Florida university professor).

Foreign Affairs Minister Bill Graham said that before the comments were reported, Ottawa had been "under the impression that there was a distinction between the social wing and the military wing" of Hezbollah.

"But it was clear from the leader's comments the other day that in fact it was not distinguishing itself from terrorist activities. It was only recently... that it became absolutely clear, that the activities of the social arm of that entity were also terrorist-related. We did not find that acceptable in Canada."

But Easter said the decision had nothing to do with Nasrallah's comments, but was made after months of investigation by the Canadian Security Intelligence Service.

Stockwell Day

In any event, the move was welcomed by Jewish groups.

"This is an important step for this country's efforts in the war on terror," stated Keith Landy, president of Canadian Jewish Congress. "All Canadians are safer as a result of this action."

The Canada-Israel Committee said it was pleased Ottawa responded to the "overwhelming and incontrovertible" evidence of Hezbollah's role in international terrorism, and called on the government to add the Al-Aqsa Martyr's Brigades and Tanzim arms of Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat's Fatah movement to its list.

At a press conference in Ottawa last Wednesday hosted by Opposition foreign affairs critic Stockwell Day, B'nai Brith Canada said it would withdraw its legal action against the government, which sought to force the inclusion of Hezbollah on the list of outlawed groups.

Frank Dimant, executive vice-president of BBC, called the government's move "the first step. This is only the beginning. This is not the end of the process."

Although pleased the government finally banned all of Hezbollah, Day condemned the delay in doing so.

"Anything the government might have learned last night, they could have learned a year ago. CSIS warned the government of the risks a decade ago," Day said.

Day said the $200 million Canada has given to Lebanon in foreign aid should be used to express this country's concern over its sheltering of Hezbollah. That was echoed by Danny Eisen of the International Coalition for Missing Israeli Soldiers.

"If Canada is to give aid and to expand trade relations with countries such as Iran, Syria and Lebanon, it must use its influence. It is time to close down the hostage industry," he said.

Retired Canadian Lt.-Col. Bob Chamberlain recounted being detained and threatened at gun point by Hezbollah during his service in Lebanon in 1985. "Eventually they let me go," he said, "because I spoke Arabic and because they liked Canada, I guess because Canada sits on the fence."

As for Canada's previous distinction between the arms of Hezbollah, Chamberlain said, "it was the political wing that took me down, and one of them was a cleric."

Ori Tenenboim (Tannenbaum), the son of Israeli civilian Elchanan Tenenboim, who was kidnapped in 2000 by Hezbollah while on a private business trip in Belgium, made a plea to Canada to help his father.

He said his father's plight should be a warning to Canadians.

"There are large numbers of Canadians who, just like my father, have travelled abroad and they, just like my father, could find themselves in the hands of terrorists, in the hands of Hezbollah."

Interfaith panel at McMaster University talks peace

By MICHAEL PUKIN
Special to The CJN

Religion's contentious role in fostering peace was the theme of a recent interfaith discussion panel at McMaster University in Hamilton.

Dubbed a "peace panel," the event was the initiative of McMaster Interfaith Unity, a campus organization that attempts to facilitate dialogue between religious groups in the McMaster community. Representatives from four different faiths, including Judaism, Islam, Christianity and Baha'i were brought together to consider the question of whether or not religion can play a positive role in conflict resolution between states or ethnic, cultural or religious groups.

The group is primarily student run, though the university's ecumenical chaplain, Carol Wood, also serves as a volunteer co-ordinator.

As to be expected at an occasion that aims for "dialogue" rather than "debate," the four panelists appeared to agree with each other more often than not. The speakers agreed that religion can and has been appropriated for destructive purposes and often serves as an irritant in global conflicts.

Respect, tolerance common to religions

In tandem with nationalism, religion has "played an unhappy role" in wars and conflicts, said Rabbi Bernard Baskin of Temple Anshe Sholom in Hamilton. He referred to the religious strife present in a litany of historical conflicts, including Christians versus Muslims in the former Yugoslavia, the Kashmir dispute between a largely Hindu India and majority Muslim Pakistan, and the Jewish-Muslim tension in the Middle East.

"Religion, which I love so deeply...how can it be distorted by other powerful forces?" said John Robertson, a Christian and a professor of religious studies at McMaster, in a rhetorical lament.

Hussein Hamdani, a Burlington, Ont. lawyer and graduate of McMaster who was representing an Islamic point of view, took special note of the terrorist attacks on New York and Washington D.C. on September 11, 2001, which were carried out by al Qaeda operatives claiming to be motivated by Islamic theology. Hamdani said that it was wrong to attribute these tragedies to Islam itself or to what he called "true" Muslims.

"Islam is divorced from the violence on 9/11," Hamdani said. "The very word Islam means 'peace.'"

Respect and tolerance for each other's faiths was likewise a common strain of thought running through the panel. The Qu'ran, the holy book of Islam, for example, instructs the Muslim to "respect the religion of other faiths," said Hamdani. Rabbi Baskin decried the potential for "triumphalism" in religion, and recommended humility as a counterweight to it.

Robertson appeared to address a key criticism of the interfaith movement as a futile, or perhaps insidious, attempt at developing a single religious doctrine. "The success of dialogue is not in absolute agreement between religion in terms of theology," said Robertson, rather the goal being "the harmony of contrasts."

While the panel seemed to reject theological unification as a goal of such interfaith initiatives, at least one of the participants argued for a different kind of unification.

"The unity of humankind is a prerequisite for peace," said Anne Pearson, also a McMaster religious studies professor and a member of the Baha'i faith. According to Pearson, the Baha'i faith predicts a "transformation into one world," which may manifest itself in such events as the adoption of a universal global language.

The sizeable audience present at the panel discussion reflected a growing interest in interfaith events such as this one on the McMaster campus. The president of the McMaster Interfaith Unity, Bilal Sabra, attributed the recent increase to a public that has become more curious about exploring religious issues in the shadow of 9/11.

Michael Pukin is the former op-ed editor and a columnist for McMaster's official student newspaper, the Silhouette.

Israel bars Arafat from Bethlehem; girds for outcry

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israeli officials are preparing a public relations campaign to defend their decision to keep soldiers in Bethlehem over Christmas.

The campaign will also deal with their decision to bar Yasser Arafat, for the second year running, from attending midnight mass in the West Bank city.

The issue surfaced as Israel scored a diplomatic victory at the UN Security Council, which voted to condemn the Nov. 28 terror attacks on Israeli targets in Kenya.

Last week, President Moshe Katsav came under pressure from the Pope and other Vatican officials, who pressed him to have Israeli soldiers out of Bethlehem by Christmas. During his meeting with the Pope, Katsav said Israel would make every effort to do so.

But on Sunday, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and the army chief of staff, Lt.-Gen. Moshe Ya'alon, told cabinet members that because of continued terror warnings the army does not plan to withdraw from the city.

At the same meeting, cabinet ministers decided that Arafat will not be allowed to attend Christmas mass in Bethlehem.

Israeli troops withdrew from Bethlehem in August as part of an initiative to gradually transfer security control in portions of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip back to the Palestinian Authority.

But the army returned following a November terrorist bombing in Jerusalem that was carried out by a Palestinian from Bethlehem.

The Palestinian Authority condemned the cabinet's decision. Arafat aide Nabil Abu Irdeineh called it a provocation and a violation of promises made to the Vatican and the United States.

Last year, Israel came under a barrage of international criticism for barring Arafat from making the trip to Bethlehem, after Arafat refused to hand over the assassins of tourism minister Rehavam Ze'evi.

Before that, Arafat, a Muslim, had attended every Christmas mass in Bethlehem since 1995, a year after the creation of the Palestinian Authority.

It is not clear whether Israel's latest travel ban on Arafat would prompt a renewed international outcry.

Dov Weisglass, the director of the Prime Minister's Office, was slated to meet Monday with Foreign Ministry officials to discuss how Israel will mount its PR campaign.

Meanwhile, Israeli officials were applauding after the UN Security Council condemned last month's terror attacks in Kenya.

"The Security Council has never before adopted a resolution that so clearly condemns the terrorist killing of Israelis or Jews," Israel's deputy ambassador to the United Nations, Aaron Jacob, told the New York Times.

The executive director of the American Jewish Committee, David Harris, called the resolution "a diplomatic and psychological breakthrough." He was quoted as telling the Times, "After 54 years of Israel's existence, the UN Security Council, with American leadership, has finally acknowledged that the loss of Jewish lives in terrorist attacks warrants condemnation."

The resolution passed last Friday by a 14-1 vote. Syria cast the sole dissenting vote.

Three Israelis and 10 Kenyans were killed in the Nov. 28 suicide bombing at the Paradise Hotel north of Mombasa.

Minutes earlier, two shoulder-launched missiles narrowly missed an Israeli charter plane taking off from Mombasa airport for Tel Aviv.

Last month, a spokesperson for Al-Qaeda claimed responsibility for the Kenya attacks and vowed more terror to retaliate for Israel's treatment of the Palestinians.

But over the weekend, Arafat sought to distance the Palestinian Authority from Al-Qaeda.

In an interview with the London Sunday Times, Arafat said Osama bin Laden is exploiting Palestinian suffering to garner support in the Arab world.

"Why is bin Laden talking about Palestine now? Bin Laden never, not ever, stressed this issue, he never helped us, he was working in another completely different area and against our interests," Arafat was quoted as saying.

Israeli officials, including Sharon, have recently charged that Al-Qaeda operatives have set up bases in Palestinian-controlled areas, a claim denied by the Palestinian Authority.

In a related development over the weekend, Jordanian authorities arrested two alleged members of Al-Qaeda in connection with the recent assassination of a U.S. diplomat.

The two allegedly killed Laurence Foley, who was gunned down in front of his house in Amman on Oct. 28.

The Jordanian government said in a statement Saturday that the two suspects, a Jordanian and a Libyan, were arrested after a nationwide hunt.

A day later, the government backed off earlier denials and acknowledged that Al-Qaeda has set up small cells in the kingdom.

Remembering Herb Weinstein

Herb Weinstein was born in Jersey City, New Jersey, on January 29, 1927 and died on December 23, 1987. After serving in the United States Navy in World War II, Herb graduated from Denver University in history and political science. He spent some time in Israel on a kibbutz with his wife Adina and then settled in Montreal where he graduated from McGill University with a Master's Degree in Social Work. Herb Weinstein was a dedicated and creative professional force in the Montreal Jewish Community. He served as a social worker at the Jewish Immigrant Aid Services; Program Director at the YMHA, at which time he was involved with the establishment of the Saidye Bronfman Centre; supervisor at the Maimonides Hospital, and as Executive Director of the B'nai Brith Hillel Foundation from 1968 until his untimely death. It was during his tenure at Hillel that the student loan fund was established, the CEGEP expansion was accomplished, Centre Hillel became a reality, and the Golem Coffee House flourished. He provided student counselling on a wide range of concerns. He encouraged students to stand up for oppressed Jewry and took particular pride in the Student Struggle for Soviet Jewry, as well as aid for Ethiopian Jews. Herb recognized and encouraged intellectual honesty, talent, leadership potential, creativity, commitment to Jewish life and saw involvement as the key to a democratic society. Many young adults that sat around his informal office are making significant contributions to public life. In 1980, Herb was the first recipient of the Synagogue Council of Montreal Award for outstanding and innovative work in the Jewish community. He also served for many years as a field supervisor at the McGill School of Social Work, and was a president of the Quebec Association of Professional Social Workers. Herb Weinstein possessed a gentleness and generosity of spirit as well as a sense of humour. He is missed by all whose lives he touched. He is survived by his wife Adina, Shana and Gideon, Neil and Carol, Judith and Aviram, and grandchildren, David, Jonathan, Adam, Eran, Hadas, Orr, and Nadav.

Humourist Sam Orbaum was Israel's Everyman

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Sam Orbaum had guts, whether it was fending off cancer for as long as he could, or whether it was standing up to toughs at our high school in Quebec, one of whom once knocked the kippah right off his head. To both, Sam stood firm, and I admired that.

While the fight that ensued with the high school bully ended in a stalemate (to everyone's amazement), Sam lost his valiant battle with cancer. At age 46, he succumbed to the disease on Dec. 9 in Jerusalem.

In Israel, or at least among readers of the Jerusalem Post, Sam's was a household name. He was known for two long-running columns, the humorous But Seriously, and another about extraordinary people in Israel, Not Page One. Both were required reading for anyone who sought commiseration about daily living in a country where humour is a powerful tool for coping.

From tzuris with plumbers, electricians and perennial bank overdraft, to explaining a Canadian winter to his British-born wife, to recounting the every move of his three daughters (quite possibly, the most famous triplets in Israel), Sam emerged as his country's Dave Barry, a long-suffering Everyman who pays his bills and endures every bureaucratic slight, but manages to find pearls of humor in any situation, whether real or the product of an imagination that never quit.

Sam Orbaum

Sam was able to capture the sheer zaniness of life in Israel better than anyone since Ephraim Kishon. He found Jewish Eskimos, mystics, misfits and quiet heroes, and wrote about them in a way that made one want to pack up and move to Israel that afternoon.

He even found humour in his disease.

For me, Sam touched a nerve when it came to our common history. His beloved Chomedey, the Montreal suburb where we both grew up, "looked like Anatevka with bungalows," while the most inviolable street hockey rule as a kid was "The Two Foot Guvmint Proppity Law," under which the first two-foot strips of everyone's lawn belonged to the government, and was thus a kind of sanctuary.

Above all else, Sam was a gifted writer. Few scribes could pen new lyrics to old tunes better. He once pulled off an amazing feat: a fable, all in rhyme, telling the saga of the Jewish people and their Zionist aspirations. We both wrote for our school paper. He was better.

He was such a talented wordsmith that he inaugurated the Jerusalem Scrabble Club, said to be the largest Scrabble club in the world. Sam won the club title many times, and the National Scrabble Championships in 1995, going on to represent Israel in the world championships that year in London.

Feeling himself to be a failed poet back home in Canada, Sam made aliyah in 1981 and soon began his career at the Post as an in-house advertising copywriter. Five years and 2,000 ads later, he joined the editorial department.

Just a few weeks ago, Sam e-mailed me to say that despite being a techno-Luddite, he'd launched his own Web site (samorbaum.com). It's worth visiting.

Sam leaves his parents, his ex-wife and his triplets, Odelia, Nomi and Donna – and a quiet smile for anyone who recalls his words.

Jerusalem's Old City: a model for co-existence?

By HASKELL NUSSBAUM
Special to The CJN

Comment

From the window of the "Rabbi of the Old City's" apartment, we could see the fireworks exploding over the Arab village of Silwan, only a few yards away. The bright red and green fireworks, shot off in celebration of the Muslim month of Ramadan, sounded at first like gunfire – sharp, loud pops, followed by the echoes of the reports through the mountains.

The sounds reminded me of how precariously the Jews in the Jewish Quarter of the Old City of Jerusalem live their ordinary lives.

Surrounded on three sides by a potentially hostile Arab population, the 600 or so Jewish families, and countless students and visitors to the Jewish Quarter, ought to feel nervous. But, generally, they do not.

"I feel safe," insists longtime resident Jeff Seidel. "And I walk from Damascus Gate [through the Muslim Quarter] to the Western Wall often."

That feeling of safety, however, may prove ephemeral, considering the level of underlying tension in the city. On my last trip to the Old City, I passed no fewer than six roving teams of police – including military border patrols, mounted police and regular patrolmen – all within a few hundred yards of Jaffa Gate. Having received alerts of possible terrorist attacks, the police were stopping young men and asking for identification. One, an Arab who I saw clutching a green Palestinian Authority-issued identity card, was being closely guarded by two cops as I entered the Old City – and was still there, an hour later, as I exited.

One result of all this tension is that the Jews and Arabs of the Old City are virtually strangers to each other. They are two planets, locked in orbit around each other, influencing each other's course through invisible gravitational force – but never actually touching.

Take Lulu Hassan. Hassan, a young Arab shopkeeper, runs a tourist store only about 200 yards away from Jaffa Gate, where most Jews enter the Old City. His shop, near the entrance of the souk that still offers the shortest route to the Kotel, is lucky, he claims, to make more than one sale a day. The rest of the souk, now lined with stores whose green iron doors are locked shut even at rush hour, underscore his claim. Those Arabs who rely on local Jews and tourists face hardship.

When asked, Hassan says he has no Jewish contacts at all. Not even business suppliers. This, I reflected, seemed dubious, as he sells many items of Judaica. But I refrained from pressing him, as his central thesis is undoubtedly correct. The Jews may live nearby, they may come within a few feet of his establishment as they head to the Kotel by a route that they deem safer, and some may even buy an item; but social or other real interaction is nonexistent.

Seidel agrees. Despite living in the Jewish Quarter for 21 years, and leading tours of the Old City including the Muslim Quarter, Seidel has no real connection to any Arabs. There is no sense of neighbourliness, he claims, and the Old City should not be taken as a model of co-existence.

"21 years ago, Jews would buy more from the Arabs," he explained, "but I think that people realized who the Arabs sided with during the first intifadah. People had thought that the Arabs wanted to co-exist and then they realized that there's, in general terms, a difference between us and them.

"An older [Jewish] gentlemen came up to me once," Seidel continued, "and said to me, "Do you see their eyes? How they look at us?' And he's right. There are Arabs who I've seen, while giving tours, for years and years. I know that they rejoice whenever there's an Israeli casualty."

With mutual suspicions, forced proximity and the backdrop of violence in the West Bank, it is, on the surface, remarkable that the Old City of Jerusalem has not exploded like the city of Hebron – another city that is holy to both communities and where Jews and Arabs share a holy site. But while fundamental differences remain between the cities – among them Israeli citizenship available to the Arabs of Jerusalem and a strong Israeli police presence without any Palestinian police – the similarities between the cities remain disquieting and peace in the Old City of Jerusalem cannot be taken for granted.

Noting the potential for violence, many Jewish schools that cater to overseas students have all but prohibited their charges from going to the Old City. The central square of the Jewish Quarter, once a thriving teenage hangout, stands disturbingly desolate most nights. Only when a solidarity-for-Israel rally comes to town is it filled.

And yet. Even as Ramadan fireworks light the sky, it's possible to see thousands of Jews streaming in to the plaza in front of the Kotel for Friday night's prayers. The Arabs, along the al-Aqsa Mosque above, remain quiet. The evening passes without incident, as most evenings here do.

For the moment, at least, both the Jews and the Arabs seem content to maintain the polite fiction of co-existence. Both are willing, it seems, to live in one city with two solitudes. Proximate but apart. The Jewish Quarter remains safe.

And I remain with a simple hope: that the uneasy and undeclared peace in the city will continue.

Dec. 9

• The outcome of the Likud Party primary was seen as a victory for Benjamin Netanyahu. Results showed that 10 of Netanyahu's supporters placed in the first 31 slots of the party's list of Knesset candidates for the Jan. 28 elections.

• Security officials arrested a Palestinian who admitted to killing 10-month-old Shalhevet Pass in Hebron in March 2001.

Dec. 10

• Political doves and hawks shared top spots in the Labor Party primary for the final election Knesset lists. Matan Vilna'i, a backer of leader Amram Mitzna, placed first. The first three spots on the list are reserved for Mitzna, Benjamin Ben-Eliezer and Shimon Peres.

Dec. 11

• In a state visit to Italy, President Moshe Katsav was told by Italian Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi that Italy had cut its ties with the Palestinian Authority after 29 Israelis were killed in Netanya on Passover in March 2001. Berlusconi also pledged to Katsav "Italy's unconditional support of the right of the Israeli people to live in peace on their land."

Dec. 12

• The Israeli army killed five armed Palestinians who tried to infiltrate a Jewish community near the Gaza Strip. The Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine claimed responsibility for the attempted attack as a commemoration of the 35th anniversary of its founding.

Dec. 13

• Keren Ya'akobi, 19, from Hadera, and Sergeant Maor Kalfon, 19, from Kiryat Yam, two soldiers killed Thursday night near the Tomb of the Patriarchs in Hebron, were laid to rest. The Israeli army destroyed five houses in the area, including the home from which the gunmen shot and killed the soldiers.

Anti-Semitism now placed on the Senate's agenda

What's more, unlike in Germany, where security costs are subsidized by the government, congregants at Beth Tzedec and other synagogues themselves pay a special security fee for the added measures.

That is outrageous, Grafstein said, as have been the half dozen arson attacks on Jewish houses of worship and memorial chapels in the last two years and the upsurge of anti-Semitic incidents that now number in the hundreds.

As a senator in Parliament's Upper House, Grafstein has been in a position to do something about it. Late last month, he introduced a "resolution on anti-Semitic violence in the OSCE (Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe) region including Canada."

The resolution is closely modelled on another resolution adopted unanimously this past summer in Germany by the 55-member OSCE, where Grafstein serves as treasurer, though it has been "Canadianized" and updated in its preamble recitations. It reaffirms Canada's obligation to "unequivocally condemn" anti-Semitism and take effective measure to protect individuals from anti-Semitic violence. It also calls on the government to schedule follow-up seminars to study the issue and to "make public a statement recognizing violence against Jews and Jewish cultural properties as anti-Semitic, as well as issue strong public declarations condemning the depredations."

The resolution will be referred to a Senate committee for further discussion and last week, Montreal MP Irwin Cotler said he planned to introduce a similar resolution in the House of Commons some time in the new year.

The U.S. Congress and the German Bundestag have already adopted the OSCE resolution and the German parliament held a one-day seminar to study the issue. Only last week, Grafstein was in Washington to participate in a meeting of the U.S. Helsinki Commission, an agency consisting of American lawmakers. A visiting delegation of German parliamentarians, who also participated, heard from a number of American Jewish groups on the question of anti-Semitism.

"They're way ahead of the game," Grafstein said of the American and German governments.

Grafstein, a Liberal, believes the government of Canada has fallen short of its international and moral obligations to speak out strongly against the current manifestation of anti-Semitism in Canada. He's also critical of political and religious leaders, and of the media for not giving the issue the attention he believes it deserves.

In introducing the resolution, Grafstein told his fellow senators that "in Canada… all I have heard is silence… Honourable senators, silence is acquiescence. Acquiescence breeds license. License breeds legitimacy. Legitimacy leads to fear, scorn, loathing and then violence."

Grafstein said the initial response of his Senate colleagues was one of surprise and shock at the extent of the problem. "They were surprised by the fact there were those anti-Semitic incidents," he said.

Peter MacKay, Progressive Conservative House leader and justice critic, told The CJN he was unaware of the extent of the problem and he believed few other MPs were familiar with it. He agreed federal leaders hadn't done enough to speak out against anti-Semitism and pledged he would do so in the future.

Sen. Jack Austin agreed that most of his colleagues were unaware of the level of anti-Semitism in Canada. "It's not part of their reality," he said. "People are pre-occupied with their own concerns."

Although the record of public statements by political and religious leaders on the two-year spate of anti-Semitism is sparse, it is not a complete wasteland.

A news release issued by Prime Minister Jean Chrétien last July when Toronto accountant David Rosenzweig was murdered read "that such acts of hatred directed against Canadians for reasons of race, faith or for belonging to any identifiable group are totally unacceptable. We will not allow anti-Semitism or religious and ethnic intolerance in Canada."

About one year ago, Cotler said he briefed the Prime Minister on "the new anti-Jewishness" and asked him to speak out about it. The Prime Minister addressed the issue at a Liberal fundraising dinner, but "in my view, it was not enough and not in the right forum," Cotler stated.

In March, the Islamic Society of North America condemned the arson at Toronto's Anshei Minsk Synagogue, as did other religious groups, while a month later the Islamic Shia Ithna-Asheri Jamaat of Toronto called vandalism attacks against Jewish facilities the "cowardly" acts of "irrational and desperate individuals."

In May, Canadian Ethno-cultural Council president Art Hagopian "expressed concern" over the rise of hate crimes and attacks on cultural and religious communities while around the same time, the United Church responded to the upsurge in attacks against Jews in Canada and around the world with an "absolute condemnation of all acts of anti-Semitism." The Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops, on the other hand, has remained silent on the issue.

Manuel Prutschi, national director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress, said some faith groups and other organizations have responded to specific attacks on Jews – he cited the outrage over a synagogue fire in Saskatoon – he felt "there hasn't been a consistent ongoing response to what is a pattern. Our responsibility is to make people aware that this is a pattern, that these are not isolated events in Canada and that it is a reflection of the global pattern.

"This is a work in progress. Certainly we've been disappointed by the level of response to date," he said.

Prutschi said the Jewish community had not witnessed the same level of solidarity "quite rightly" expressed by the wider community to Muslims after 9/11. "The federal government issued several statements and the prime minister visited a mosque in Ottawa. There wasn't that level of response when the police issued a general threat alert in June regarding an Ottawa synagogue being targeted," he said.

"I think a heartening gesture would have been if members of the government would have attended during services, as a statement."

BIG BAND FROM TEL AVIV TO PERFORM IN TORONTO

The Canada-Israel Cultural Foundation and the Consulate-General of Israel have arranged a one-time only Toronto concert for a top-notch band from an Israeli arts school whose members were invited to the 30th annual conference of the International Association for Jazz Education (IAJE) in Toronto next month.

The Big Band of the Thelma Yellin School for the Performing Arts of Tel Aviv is an ensemble of 22 students who are scheduled to be in Toronto from Jan. 7 thru 12, along with 7,000 educators, musicians and enthusiasts from 35 countries, and more than 150 top jazz artists. Most of the band members are recipients of the Moshe Sharett Scholarship, an important project of the Canada-Israel Cultural Foundation.

According to the CICF, the Big Band and two vocalists will perform a wide repertoire of swing, bebop, Latin, funk and fusion numbers in a programme called "Jazz – Crossing All Borders."

Royal Conservatory of Music, Ettore Mazzoleni Concert Hall, 273 Bloor St. W. Tickets $20; tax-deductible donations to the scholarship fund welcomed. Sunday Jan. 12, 3 p.m. 416-932-2260.

Family Musical: Free To Be . . . You and Me began as a children's book by Marlo Thomas that, instead of telling boys and girls who they should be, would open them to the possibilities of who they could be. Thomas invited many of her supremely talented friends, including Carl Reiner, Mel Brooks, Alan Alda, Judy Blume and Shel Silverstein to be contributors.

The result was regarded as a modern classic of children's literature that has subsequently been performed as a heartwarming musical, most recently off-Broadway this past June.

"It is a show to be enjoyed by parents, teachers, and other grown-up friends with the children in their lives," says Toronto producer Michael Rubinoff.

It Pays to Clean Your Desk: Just two weeks after American conductor Charles Bornstein immigrated to Israel, he made a musical discovery of spectacular proportions. While shuffling through some papers on his desk, he found a rare original manuscript by his favourite composer, the Viennese born Gustav Mahler, who died in 1911.

The director of the Gustav Mahler library in Paris confirmed that Bornstein had found an early version, with detailed notations, of Mahler's first symphony.

Out of Town: Lvov, Ukraine (formerly Poland) was the scene of a three-day Jewish theatre festival last month that attracted theatrical troupes from all across the former Soviet Union, the Jewish Telegraphic Agency reported.

For some attendees, the festival brought back the days of more than 60 years ago, when Lvov nurtured many homegrown Yiddish theatre companies and also received many famous troupes on tour from Warsaw, Vilna and other East European Jewish centres. The festival's 16 productions – 15 in Russian and one in Yiddish – revived many recognizable Jewish characters ranging from King Solomon to Tevye.

The festival was not an attempt to revive the past so much as an attempt to awaken a new Jewish artistic sensibility, according to amateur director Alexander Chevan of Chernigov.

"We are trying to build Jewish culture here and now, using modern artistic means," he said.

A Timeless Journey Through Jewish Song: Calgary-based Mezzo-soprano Tsepora (Hebrew for songbird), will perform an evening of spiritual songs, featuring Yiddish and Hebrew classics in Toronto on Dec.22.

Tsepora

Inspired by the courage of her grandmother who survived the Holocaust singing for the commanding officers in Auschwitz, Tsepora reconnects with her own roots as she performs timeless classics such as Tum Balalaika, Erev Shel Shoshanim and Avinu Malkeinu.

"These songs allow people to remember the songs their grandparents sang to them, and it also exposes others to new music," she told The CJN in an interview to promote her CD Timeless Journey Through Jewish Song two summers ago.

"I wanted to help create a resurgence of this beautiful music," she said.

The concert is at the Vaughan City Playhouse, 1000 New Westminster Drive, Vaughan on Dec. 22 at 7 p.m. For tickets call 905-709-4057 or Ticketmaster at 416-872-1111.

Adrien Brody is brilliant in The Pianist, which opens on Dec. 25.

The Pianist, Roman Polanski's first film on the Holocaust, leaves an indelible impression.

Polanski, a survivor himself, pours his heart and soul, as well as his formidable technical knowledge, into this tour de force, which opens at the Cineplex Odeon chain on Dec. 25.

Taking place over a six-year period in Nazi-occupied Warsaw, The Pianist is based on the incredible experiences of Jewish pianist Wladyslaw Szpilman. Through his eyes, the horror of the Holocaust in Poland, which devoured three million Jews, unfolds inexorably.

Szpilman – who is brilliantly portrayed by Adrien Brody – has a special feel for Chopin, the composer laureate of Poland. As he plays Chopin's haunting Nocturne in C sharp Minor in a Radio Warsaw studio, sudden explosions shatter windows and send up clouds of choking dust.

It is September 1939. Germany has invaded Poland, and the strife has reached Warsaw. Life will never be the same again, for either Szpilman and his family, or Poland.

The Pianist, Polanski's first movie in eight years, opens with nostalgic file footage of an elegant Warsaw on the eve of World War II. The footage magically gives way to Szpilman's haunting rendition at the studio.

After the building has been engulfed by smoke, he hurries home. His cultured, middle-class parents take solace from the fact that Britain and France have declared war on Germany. Perhaps, they think, the Germans can be defeated.

But for now, German soldiers march triumphantly through the streets of Warsaw, intimidating residents, and newspapers announce anti-Semitic decrees.

With deft, economical strokes, Polanski creates an air of menace and forboding.

As Szpilman soon discovers, Jews have been reduced to second-class citizenship. They are no longer welcome in cafes, restaurants or parks. He cannot even buy a Polish friend, Dorota (Emilia Fox), a cup of coffee.

Subsequently, Jews are ordered to wear blue and white armbands emblazoned with the Star of David. Readily identifiable as a Jew, Szpilman's courtly father (Frank Finlay), a violinist, is assaulted on the street by a German policeman. It is a preview of things to come.

In semi-documentary style, Polanski sets the stage for the next humiliating measure: the walling off of a ghetto in 1940. The camera pans on a group of bedraggled Jews trudging toward the ghetto, which is shortly to be crammed with 500,000 Jews from all over Poland.

Spying Dorota, who grimly watches the forlorn procession, Szpilman offers bland, dishonest words of comfort. Brightening up, Dorota adds, "It's too absurd."

Then, in two effective back-to-back scenes, Polanski further evokes the arbitrary temper of the times.

Running short of funds to buy food, the Szpilmans are compelled to sell their prized piano to a Pole for a mere pittance. It is a crushing defeat.

Outside, in the crowded ghetto littered with fresh corpses, the Germans heap ridicule on Jews by forcing them to dance.

Having lost his job in Warsaw's Aryan quarter, Szpilman earns a hand-to-mouth living as a pianist in a cafe frequented by the ghetto's sleazy elite, consisting mainly of smugglers and Jewish policemen.

Szpilman's sanctimonious brother, Henryk (Ed Stoppard), who contemptuously refers to this class as parasites, is none too pleased that he works there.

The sheer, random horror of the German occupation is chillingly evoked again when a squad of SS men raids a flat in the ghetto. After the Germans order the occupants to rise, they unceremoniously throw a disabled man in a wheelchair out the window.

Thanks to his connection to a commander of the compromised Jewish police force, Szpilman saves his family from deportation. But it is a fleeting respite. The Szpilmans, along with hundreds of other Jews, are trucked to a crowded railway platform.

A train, bound for Treblinka, waits on the tracks, the locomotive rhythmically pumping out white smoke. As Szpilman stoically approaches an open wagon, a sympathetic policeman pushes him aside. Meanwhile, his father fends off an attempt by another policeman to grab his violin. It is a futile struggle.

Then, in yet another extraordinary scene, Szpilman, crushed by the bloodless inhumanity he has just witnessed, walks dejectedly down a deserted cobblestone street strewn with the abandoned suitcases of the deportees. The deeply wounded expression on his face is heart rending.

Szpilman saves himself by taking refuge in safe houses provided by a succession of Poles, all of whom risk their lives to shelter him. The Polish Christians, with the exception of a hysterical woman who madly curses Szpilman, are depicted rather sympathetically.

Poles, to be sure, helped Jews, as Yad Vashem has duly noted. But it is debatable whether Poles were as consistently well disposed toward their fellow citizens as Polanski seems to suggest.

Mexican inspires local artist

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

The work of muralist Diego Rivera had the greatest the greatest influence on her work, says Toronto artist Claire Weissman Wilks.

Early in her career, she worked primarily in black and white using conte crayon. Later, after having success in painting and sculpture, she began to look for new inspiration. On a trip to Mexico, she studied the work of Diego, who was artist Frida Kahlo's husband.

"It was one of those magical things that happens," Weissman Wilks says. "An artist looks for inspiration and I found it there. It led to my work in monotyping in colour."

Prince Arthur Fine Arts last month presented Ghosts, an exhibition of selected monotypes by Weissman Wilks, whose works have been hailed in Mexico, Italy, Sweden, Central Europe, Yugoslavia and throughout North America.

The monotype process is a print on paper taken from a painting on glass or metal. Weissman Wilks says she paints on glass and usually makes two paper impressions, selecting the one she prefers.

She also works in drawing, brush painting and lithography, and sculptures in bronze, clay and glass.

At a reception at the gallery, Weissman Wilks said she has no preconceived idea when she paints on glass "and what comes out is a surprise."

Born in Toronto, Weissman Wilks, 69, attended Northern Vocational school and Central Technical School, which she says "was the greatest art school in the country."

At 17, she entered the Weston Sanitarium with tuberculosis and remained there for almost three years. She says that this painful period influences her subject matter.

"That's what you see in my work – the feeling of isolation and caring."

She adds that she also has a deep and abiding interest in the concentration camps. The tension caught in her characters' faces reflects a mixture of pain and awe, pleasure and disbelief.

She exhibited in her first group show at the Pollack Gallery in 1968, and her first solo exhibition was held in 1982 at the IGA Gallery in Toronto. She has had numerous commissions and appears in many publications and books.

Claire Weissman Wilks at the Prince Arthur Fine Arts Gallery.

After a failed marriage, the mother of four met her partner of 34 years, Barry Callaghan, a writer and publisher of Exile: A Literary Quarterly.

Mexico has embraced her paintings. In 2001, a 40-foot banner hanging from the outside wall of the Monterrey State Gallery announced that 36 of Weissman Wilks' monotypes were on exhibition in a show titled Out of the Cave.

The governor of the state declared that they were "opening the gallery but opening the eyes of Mexico to the world."

The following year, the Museum Universitario del Chopo in Mexico City gave over its masters exhibition area for two months to exhibit 39 of her monotypes.

In 2002, the exhibition was moved to the House of Congress in Mexico City. She was the first Canadian and the first woman to be given a solo show in Mexico's parliamentary gallery.

Recently, at the opening of her show in the Debel Gallery in Jerusalem, an Israeli poet said her work depicts "aloneness, aloneness, in which there is always a glimpse of joy, joy."

In 2003, Weissman Wilks will present a major exhibition of her monotypes in Guadalajara, Mexico.

Selected monotype paintings by Weissman Wilks will remain in the Prince Arthur Fine Arts gallery.

For more information on the monotypes still at the gallery, call 416-944-2671.

The Pianist is shattering

As The Pianist heads toward its denouement, Szpilman witnesses the 1943 ghetto uprising and the 1944 general revolt. Polanski dwells briefly but effectively on these historic events.

Toward the close of the film, in an utterly gripping and astonishing vignette, a dignified German army officer (Thomas Kretschmann) stumbles upon Szpilman as he desperately tries to open a tin of pickles to salve his savage hunger. The officer, having discovered he is a pianist, asks him to play.

An aficionado of classical music and the only humane German in the entire movie, the officer is so moved by his impromptu performance of Chopin's Ballad No. 1 in G Minor that he gives him food, a warm coat and a bit of heartening information.

It is a shared, profound moment of humanity that sweeps away old and newly-instilled hatreds.

In short, The Pianist – which summons up several incredible performances from a talented cast, most notably from Brody and Kretschmann – is a shattering film of immense power.

To say that Polanski has made a movie for the ages would be to state the obvious.

Young violinist brims with enthusiasm

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rebecca Brenner was only four years old when she walked past a Suzuki music class at the Bloor Jewish Community Centre on her way home from a swimming lesson. "That's what I want to do!" she said to her mother, Deena, when she heard the violins.

It turned out Rebecca's eagerness was matched by her aptitude. Now 12, she still brims with enthusiasm about her music – her comments on the subject are punctuated with smiles, giggles and the word "fun."

But Rebecca has built up a serious resume as she progressed from a small (1/16) violin to a full-size instrument, with appearances as a guest soloist with the Toronto Symphony Orchestra (TSO), with the McGill Chamber Orchestra in Montreal, at a Kitchener-Waterloo Symphony Pops concert, and as the Canadian representative at the International Children for Peace Concert in Czechoslovakia. Her first solo performance was at age seven with the National Academy Orchestra in Hamilton under the direction of Boris Brott.

Last month, on her 12th birthday Nov. 13, Rebecca took part in Beth Sholom Synagogue's Stars of Tomorrow concert, performing Corelli's La Folia, Moussorgsky's Hopak, Prokofieff's The March and Debussy's La Fille aux Cheveux de Lin.

In a recent interview at her home, Rebecca smiled as she recalled one of her early performances.

"It was really funny," she said. A TSO musician saw her playing at a Loblaws grocery story opening and told her, 'I think you should meet Boris Brott,'" she said.

"I thought it sounded fun."

No one ever forces her to practise, said Rebecca, whose repertoire is mostly classical, although she also plays chamber, contemporary and klezmer music with two teens as part of a trio called Ricochet. She says she enjoys every kind of music.

"If I don't want to practise, I don't. But I usually do – or I force myself. Then I enjoy it once I start. Sometimes I skip a day." She devotes about six hours a week to violin lessons with teacher Marta Hidy, but is not at a particular grade level. "I might do Grade 6 and [a higher level] at the same time; you never know," she said.

What is the most challenging piece she's ever attempted?

"Everything is challenging," she said. "Even if it's Grade 6, you can play it as a Grade 6 student, or you can play it as a professional, which is hard. I try to play as a professional."

The difference, she said, involves "knowing where the phrasing is, or how to feel it, or making it interesting."

To create sophisticated, emotive music, Rebecca sometimes draws on her interest in theatre and dance (she is the voice of Prissy Uppity in the animated series Dumb Bunnies and Polie Pi in Rolie Polie Olie; and takes eight hours a week of ballet lessons).

Or she might think about her cat, "which is quite often what my teacher uses to get me to do something well – [for example], if I'm playing a nice part in a Bruch concerto."

Rebecca's love of music, and sense of fun with it, may have something to do with her early exposure to classical music. Deena and her mathematician husband David – both non-musicians – "played all kinds of symphonic music day and night" from the day Rebecca was born, said Deena, a civil engineer by training.

They recall taking her to see Mozart's Requiem when she was just two years old.

Rebecca Brenner

"We worried," said Deena. "But she sat right through, and very joyfully watched the performance."

An intimate evening with Vancouver pianist

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Vancouver concert pianist Robert Silverman says he loves performing for small audiences.

"I suspect that there will be more and more salon concerts [in the future] and I love doing them," Silverman says. "There is an intimacy. I think the audience gets to know the artist better than they ever can in a hall.

"They get a little more familiar with his actual artistry and they also get to know the artist as a human being – and from my perspective, I love relating."

The internationally acclaimed musician was in Toronto recently to perform at the home of Toby and Saul Feldberg, where he played a selection of pieces by Brahms, Schumann, Gershwin, Mendelssohn and Chopin.

The concert was sponsored by The Koffler Centre of the Arts School of Music, which presents a series of Salon Concerts each year. A portion of the proceeds went to Beit Halochem, Aid to Disabled Veterans of Israel.

Silverman, who has been a faculty member at the University of British Columbia since 1973, lived up to his reputation as one of Canada's finest pianists.

He opened with two 19th-century sets of variations, the first called Variations on a Theme by Clara Wieck, Op. 14. Composed by Robert Schumann, the piece is part of a larger sonata that he wrote on a theme that his wife, Clara, herself a concert pianist, had written.

Silverman's second piece was Brahms' Variations and Fugue on a Theme of Handel. Brahms, a protégé of Schumann's and a good friend of his and Clara's, wrote this composition in 1861 and presented it to Clara for her birthday.

Both selections were performed with technical excellence and memorable phrasing.

Demonstrating his wide-ranging repertoire, Silverman also performed two shorter pieces by Mendelssohn, Spring Song and Spinning Song, and concluded his program, to the delight of the 90 patrons, with Rhapsody in Blue by George Gershwin.

Silverman, who made his debut with the Montreal Symphony Orchestra when he was 14, has performed to acclaim throughout North America, Europe, the Far East and Australia.

In 1998, he was named the first winner of the Paul de Hueck and Norman Walford Career Achievement Award for Keyboard Artistry, which is administered by the Ontario Arts Council.

He has made 25 CDs and is the recipient of the Grand Prix du Disque from the Liszt Society in Budapest for his first recorded Liszt recital. He also won a Juno Award in 1991 for his CBC recording of Michael Baker's piano concerto.

The next BJCC Koffler concert will feature Israeli guitarist, singer and composer David Broza Monday, Dec. 23, at 8 p.m. at the Leah Posluns Theatre. For more information, call Adrienne Cohen, 416-636-1880, ext. 228.

Netanya hospital expands role in response to terror

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Netanya's Laniado Hospital is a community hospital – the kind that delivers babies, performs dialysis and diagnostic imaging, and administers chemotherapy to those with cancer. It has a cardiology department, four internal medicine departments, an in-vitro fertilization program and surgical suites.

But for the past two years, it has had to be more than a community hospital.

Since the start of the current intifadah, Laniado's already overtaxed facilities have had to deal with victims of suicide bombings and other terror attacks. Not only is the hospital the only one in the area, but Netanya itself has been a major target for terrorist activity, second only to Jerusalem.

Belgian-born and U.S.-trained nurse Lydia Lanxner is Laniado's disaster response specialist, and she has helped develop protocols to deal with such emergencies, protocols that have been adopted in other countries.

She spoke recently at Beth Avraham Yoseph Congregation in Thornhill, at a program sponsored by the synagogue's Israel Action Committee and Canadian Friends of Laniado Hospital.

She also spoke at the Hospital for Sick Children and Etobicoke General Hospital.

Laniado received nearly half of the victims of last Pesach's Park Hotel suicide bombing, just as it treated many of those injured in a similar attack at Netanya's Jeremy Hotel two weeks earlier.

When Israel is at war, she said, such as when Iraq launched Scud missiles at it during the Gulf War, "there is a six minute warning. The population is ready, and knows to go to a sealed room, and to always carry their masks with them."

During what is supposedly peacetime, however, there is no warning before attacks, she said.

The hospital holds regular drills and education in trauma procedure, Lanxner said, noting that many of the drills she holds are unannounced.

The disaster unit of Israel's Ministry of Health keeps a close eye on each hospital's capability, she said, and there is a triage system to makes sure the injured are transported to the most appropriate place for treatment.

When word comes of an attack, she said, immediately the emergency room is emptied, off-duty staff are recalled through a computerized call system that contacts 100 people a minute and records exactly who can come in, and all elective procedures are stopped.

Since Laniado Hospital is not normally a trauma centre, victims who are brought there are resuscitated and stabilized while staff wait for more specific instructions from the ministry as to where to transport them.

Lanxner said she has set up the emergency room to function as efficiently as possible. It has trauma kits with treatments for chemical and biological agents, a blood bank, and radiology and ultrasound equipment.

All Israeli hospitals "are built for war," she said, with oxygen equipment in every room and in all the halls, so that they can easily and quickly expand their role if necessary.

Many terrorist victims come in as "John Does," Lanxner said, with no identification of any kind. Photographs are taken of anything that might be helpful for identification, such as a person's face, if possible, or jewelry, scars, clothes and body parts.

The photos are then displayed in a private room, which is helpful when several members of a family are hurt and sent to different hospitals, Lanxner said. Rather than running around in the emergency room, people can find their loved ones through pictures.

People can also use a toll free number to get information. The number is the same throughout Israel, except for the last two digits that identify each hospital.

Recently, digital cameras have enabled pictures to be sent over the Internet.

"We keep everything that might help to identify people," Lanxner said, including "dentures, shoes, jewelry, canes."

Chemical and biological warfare is not just a theory, she said. For instance, the suicide bomber who blew up the Tel Aviv's Dolphinarium nightclub in June 2001 had hepatitis B. His bone fragments and body fluids were thrown through the air onto the victims, and many of them have subsequently tested positive for the disease.

"It could have been AIDS just as easily," she said. "We never thought of such a possibility."

Now, all terror victims are routinely vaccinated, as are staff.

Special masks have been developed for doctors that allow wide angle vision and have an efficient and comfortable oxygen supply.

Immediately after an attack, there is a staff debriefing to discuss how things were handled and to let the workers talk about their overall state of mind.

Hospitals have been warned that the next terror target will be ambulances, she said. Vehicles will be stolen, packed with explosives and driven as close as possible to the hospital. As a result, ambulances are now met at a considerable distance from the building, Lanxner said, and nearby parking lots have been closed.

More than half the victims of terror are children, Lanxner said, so Laniado is now planning to set up a children's trauma and emergency unit to treat them.

1111 Women raises funds for MDA

By STACEY STEIN
Special to The CJN

After raising $4,500 at a recent meeting, 1111 Women is nearing its goal of purchasing a mobile intensive care unit ambulance for Magen David Adom in Israel.

The group has raised $82,000 since its inception in the fall – $111,000 is needed to purchase an ambulance.

Founded by Sandy Galet in Toronto, 1111 Women is more of an idea rather than an organization. It started with a parlour meeting attended by 11 women who each brought a donation of at least $100 for Magen David Adom.

These women then held their own meetings, inviting new people to attend.

Each woman at subsequent parlour meetings is encouraged to hold her own meeting, inviting at least 10 women who will donate a minimum of $100 towards the purchase of the ambulance.

Since the first meeting of the group, over 40 events have been held in Toronto and donations have poured in from cities such as Montreal and Winnipeg.

Galet said she felt Magen David Adom is an important cause because "the first step in saving lives is an ambulance." After raising enough money to purchase an ambulance, Galet hopes to organize a group trip to Israel.

Rachelle Bronfman, who hosted a recent 1111 Women meeting with her mother and sister, said she hopes people who normally wouldn't get involved will be inspired to take action.

"This is empowering women who have always wanted to do something for Israel," she said. "The reason why people are doing it is because it's very simple – it's easy for women to host an evening. I'm hoping that people who aren't active will get involved with this."

Held at the home of Bronfman's mother, over 20 women attended the Dec. 10 gathering, including one woman who had been to two previous parlour meetings. The largest donation was $2,500. The event featured guest speaker Sarah Kronis, who has worked as a volunteer with Magen David Adom for the past five years.

Kronis, 24, described her experiences helping patients, and assisting medical staff aboard the ambulances. She also noted the changes that have taken place since the latest intifidah began in September 2000.

For example, ambulance staff are now clad in bullet-proof vests and a staff member always stays behind to guard the ambulance at the scene of an incident. Over the past two years, almost 100 of the 550 Magen David Adom ambulances have been destroyed, stolen or repainted as Red Crescent ambulances (which may be used to carry terrorists and explosives).

"They're at a point where they really need ambulances," said Kronis. During her discussion, she noted that her friend's ambulance had been set on fire.

While the event held by Bronfman featured a guest speaker, Bronfman emphasized that 1111 Women meetings can be very simple.

"It doesn't have to be fancy and you don't need to have a speaker," she said. "It doesn't matter how old or young you are. A person who is 20 or 70 can do this and do a mitzvah."

For more information, contact Sandy Galet through the Toronto office of Magen David Adom at (416) 780-0034 or at sgalet@rogers.com.

Yiddish diva Theresa Tova releases live CD

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Theresa Tova, Yiddish diva, cabaret singer, actor and writer, has just released her second CD.

Titled Theresa Tova: Live at the Top O' the Senator, the CD contains 12 songs that combine English and Yiddish in Tova's own distinctive style.

Included on the recording are familiar jazz tunes such as My Buddy and My Funny Valentine, some old favourites with new Yiddish interpretations such as Night and Day (Tog und Nacht), some well-known Yiddish songs, including Shaynvi di Leone (As Nice as the Moon) and Los is Shnayin (Let it Snow, Let it Snow) and a new jazzy number, Der Saksafon Shpiler. She also sings one song in French: Vous m'èblouissez (You Go to My Head).

The CD was recorded live this past July at the popular Toronto club Top O' the Senator, where Tova is a regular performer.

"I don't like to ghettoize my work," she said in an interview. "I think our Jewish music is as good as anything out there and I take pride in bringing my Jewish world to a universal audience."

Some Jews who go regularly to Italian operas, she said, "come to tears when they hear me sing in Yiddish – some because they haven't heard Yiddish for years.

"Jewish composers such as George Gershwin, Irving Berlin and Rogers and Hart reflect their Jewish roots. What these boys were doing is borrowing from eastern Europe."

Tova said she is pleased that mixed audiences and the regular press "are embracing a girl who sings Jewish songs."

As the daughter of Polish-born Holocaust survivors, she thinks it is "amazing" that she is well-received when she performs concerts in Yiddish in Switzerland and Germany.

"Contrary to what we think, even the French in Montreal ask me to sing in Yiddish."

Now in her 40s and having appeared in numerous films, television shows, concerts, musicals and plays, Tova remains excited about her wide-ranging career. Throughout the interview, she demonstrates a point by breaking into song.

The graduate of the University of Alberta's acting program has performed at The Stratford Festival in productions of Patience and Fiddler on the Roof, toured for 16 months with Ragtime, and her show From Belz to Broadway played to sold-out audiences in Canada and the United States.

Her production of the musical Still the Night won four Dora Awards, and in 1999, it was nominated for a Governor General's Award for excellency in literature.

Tova believes that by making contemporary recordings of historical Yiddish tunes, she will bring new listeners to Yiddish music and keep Yiddish alive.

"I think I am creating a bridge from the past to the future for mixed audiences – for bubbies and the younger generation. Yiddish music is technically brilliant and Yiddish culture is magical.

Her main goal, she said, is "to take my Yiddish music to large halls and to jazz clubs throughout North America and Europe."

Tova, who has been married for 22 years to Bob Pearson and has two teenage children, said she has had a great year.

"I have sung in concerts from Switzerland to San Francisco, where I was invited to sing Yiddish music with conductor Michael Tilson Thomas. Ashkenaz was a blast, too. And now I have released the new CD.

"I am thrilled that I will be singing my mixed repertoire throughout Canada and the United States."

CD celebrates a magical night in February

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

The audience listened in hushed silence when The MRC Trio performed and recorded a set of improvised music one evening last winter in a packed jazz club in downtown Toronto.

The MRC Trio, whose members include violinist Hugh Marsh, drummer Barry Romberg and cellist Rufus Cappadocia, "plays without any pre-conceived notions," Romberg says. "It's totally off the cuff. That's probably one of the hardest things to do, to make something out of nothing."

Everything clicked on that magical night in February at the Rex and the audience was with the band all the way, he says. An independent recording of that session, Tribal Dance, is available through www.barryromberg.com.

With only a few live performances behind them, The MRC Trio, using unusual jazz-improvising instrumentation, have made an impact on the Canadian jazz scene and recently received a nomination as Best Electric Group in the January 2003 National Jazz Awards.

Coming on the heels of The MRC Trio's recording is Romberg's Random Access/Part 1, which is "a lot of Barry Romberg," he says. It's a mostly home-recorded CD on which he plays drums and keyboards and is joined by special guests.

Romberg's music treads familiar musical ground and explores new terrain, and Random Access/Part 1, another independent recording, is no exception.

"There's a lot of different flavours on it," he says, "from funky groove-oriented stuff to totally avant-garde."

Original projects, such as playing in The MRC Trio and making recordings like Random Access/Part 1, are a chance for him to stretch out musically, but to survive as a freelance musician Romberg wears many hats.

He sits in the drummers' chairs of a number of Toronto jazz bands, among them NOJO, a contemporary big band. He's also been playing rhythm and blues with the band Deacon Blues three nights a week at Toronto's Centro Grill & Wine Bar for the past four years.

Romberg, 43, went on the road at 18, quitting high school to tour with a rhythm and blues band, and he played in Jewish wedding bands for 10 years, from 1985 to '95.

Over the years, he has accompanied many international and Canadian artists, including a five-year stint as Moe Koffman's last drummer. He's played with pianist Gil Evans, saxophonists Jane Bunnett and Joe Henderson, trombonist/band leader Rob McConnell and singers Holly Cole and Molly Johnson, among others.

Romberg's drumming can be heard on some 40 recordings and he's received three Juno nominations with other musicians. He has toured Canada more than a dozen times, and this March, he goes on the road again with The MRC Trio. Even Toronto, which is rich in jazz clubs compared to other Canadian cities, can't provide enough work for a musician.

"There's not anywhere in the city you can play on a regular basis," he says, adding that with the vast distances musicians have to travel in Canada it's "a lot of schlepping for what we make."

Romberg's musical journey began in the 1960s, when he was a kid walking around the house carrying a radio wherever he went. At 10, knowing he wanted to become a musician, he started taking drum lessons. Working at Sam The Record Man's downtown jazz department later was a huge turning point.

"I realized that to master the drum kit I needed to explore all the jazz greats. My job at Sam's allowed me to listen to all the music I could get my hands on for a year, a monumental listening experience."

Since then, except for a return to school at 30, when he completed two-thirds of a degree in the humanities at York University for the enjoyment of learning, Romberg hasn't strayed from his musical path.

On his first recording, 2nd Floor Please, with the Barry Romberg Group, he recorded a track of improvised Jewish jazz, The Day Of Atonement. Released on vinyl in 1989, 2nd Floor Please, soon to be re-issued in CD format, was named one of Coda magazine's top 10 jazz albums for that year.

"It was my take on what it's like to be in the synagogue on Yom Kippur," he says. "The saxophone player would be simulating the cantor and the rest of the band would be the congregation, so there's a dialogue happening."

Someone once told Romberg that whatever happens he'll always have music, but at the time, Romberg says, it somehow felt like a curse.

"I replied, 'You want it, take it. I couldn't get rid of it if I wanted to.' I thought, I didn't choose music, music chose me."

Jewish prospects hope for shot at NHL

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

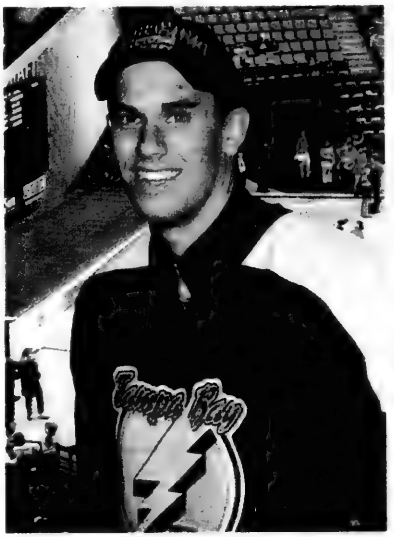
Eric Himelfarb has something to prove to the Montreal Canadiens brass over the next few months that he wasn't able to during the club's rookie camp.

The Habs' 2001 sixth-round draft choice had a disappointing two-week tournament and was returned to junior before the team's main training camp had even opened.

He has until June 1, 2003 to sign with Montreal, otherwise the Thornhill native will re-enter the draft.

"If things don't work out, there are 29 other teams in the league," said Himelfarb, in a telephone interview prior to a practice with the Ontario Hockey League (OHL) Barrie Colts.

"I just didn't perform as well as I could (in Montreal). I don't know what it was. They sent me back and told me to have a big year."



Adam Henrich

While at rookie camp, he heard from his agent that Sarnia was trying to move him, so Himelfarb called Sting GM Terry Doran and waived his no-trade clause. The trade – a five-player blockbuster deal – to Barrie after three years in Sarnia has done wonders for the five-foot-10, 185-lb. centre.

Himelfarb started the season on a 12-game point streak, notching eight goals and 10 assists over that stretch. He was the Colts' leading scorer through 29 games with 43 points (17 goals, 26 assists) and represented the OHL's Eastern Conference in the Hershey Cup All-Star Series game against the Western Hockey League's Western Conference.

"I was happy to have a fresh start in Barrie," said Himelfarb, who admittedly struggled last season as Sarnia's captain despite putting up 83 points in 67 games.

"It's not always points that determine how you play. Sometimes you feel too comfortable in the same place for a long time and get stuck in a rut."

The trade also proved beneficial to Sarnia as they acquired two overage defencemen in the deal, solidifying their blueline corps.

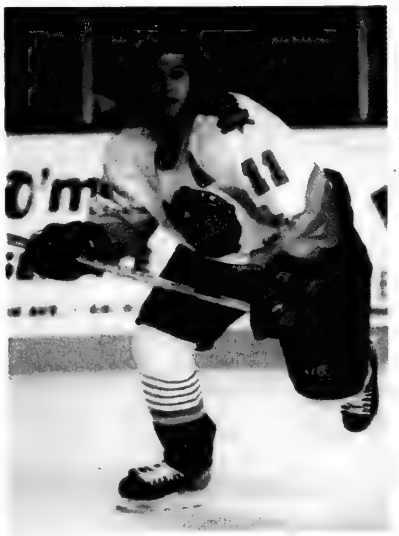
That can only help Sting netminder Robert Gherson, who says he worked out harder than ever over the summer. His improved strength and puckhandling skills are paying dividends early in the season. Washington's fifth-round pick in June's NHL Entry Draft got off to a solid start, tying for the league lead in wins with 14, while posting a 2.76 goals against average and .904 save percentage in games through Dec. 12.

He played a period-and-a-half of shutout hockey late last month while representing the OHL's Western Conference in the Hershey Cup All-Star Series game against the Quebec Major Junior Hockey League's Dilio Conference. That came five days after his first shutout of the season, a 1-0 overtime victory on the road against the defending OHL champion Erie Otters.

The six-foot, 152-lb. goalie got a big confidence boost after backstopping Washington to a first-place finish (3-0-1) at the Traverse City, Mich. NHL Prospects Tournament in September against Atlanta, Minnesota, Detroit, and St. Louis.

Gherson spent a few days at the Capitals training camp following the event, before being returned to Sarnia.

"It was a great learning experience and a good gauge of where I was, but it also showed how far I have to go," he said. "I talked to (Caps' goalie) Olaf Kolzig and he helped me out a lot. He said not to get complacent, just keep working hard and good things will happen."



Cory Pecker

Sarnia's much-improved defence and Gherson's solid goaltending through two months of action saw the club sitting tied atop the OHL's West Division with a record of 16-5-2-1 and ranked fourth in the Canadian Hockey League.

Another Jewish youngster on the rise is Tampa Bay prospect Adam Henrich.

The first draft pick of the Lightning in the second round last June did not receive a training camp invitation, but got off to the fastest start in Brampton Battalion franchise history when he scored seven goals in the season's first six games.

It's been a struggle since for the 18-year-old power forward. In the club's next game, Henrich was assessed a gross misconduct penalty after a two-on-one break was whistled down offside and he inadvertently flipped the puck into the stands.

The act carries an automatic two-game suspension, but the league tacked on three more in an effort to clamp down on such infractions.

"You don't want to do that because it could have hurt a fan," said Henrich, who was attempting to flip the puck off the boards and at the time thought it hit the glass. "Obviously, I wasn't happy with it and I didn't really mean to do it. I thought five games was a little harsh."

Brampton was 1-4 with last year's leading scorer out of the lineup and since returning to the Battalion on Oct. 20, Henrich has struggled, notching 10 goals and 12 assists in 26 games.

Cory Pecker, the 2001-02 overage player of the year, was off to a bit of a slow start adjusting to the professional ranks with the American Hockey League's Cincinnati Mighty Ducks.

The three-time OHL all-star, who potted 82 goals in 81 games (playoffs and Memorial Cup included) last season in leading Erie to a league championship, had four goals and four assists in 25 games with the Ducks.

Pecker, 21, signed a three-year contract with Anaheim in July after being recommended to Ducks' General Manager Bryan Murray by Erie Otters owner and GM Sherry Bassin, who knows him very well.

"He's going to get a shot to prove himself," said Bassin.

Finding the middle ground

20 something

By JODI KOVITZ

After my last column, many readers wrote to me saying they could relate to my career dilemma.

"I surely relate with your contrasting the lengthy corporate day to a more leisurely way to pay the bills," one reader wrote. "It's certainly an issue which I have personally struggled to resolve."

Many readers shared outstanding insights on prioritizing values, remembering to dream, taking advantage of our freedom to access opportunities and pursuing our passions.

One reader pointed out that experience enables us to prioritize our values. A young professional, he works 12-hour days and weekends in a field largely driven by financial reward. People who don't know their children or spouses who "got sucked in by the money" surround him. Although he put in years of training to get to where he is professionally, he is considering changing his path. He said being a spouse and father who is present is more important to him than succumbing to the cultural pressure to provide every opportunity. "Life is too short to waste years at a job you don't love."

Another reader reminded me of the importance of figuring out what we want, and then going after it. He pointed out our tendency of falling into the norms within our various industries rather than utilizing our skills and creativity to carve out our own niches. He wrote, "I think we need to keep dreaming. Compromises along the way are inevitable, but we don't have to surrender to them at the expense of pursuing what we really want. The key is figuring out what we want, and never is Rabbi Hillel's maxim of 'know thyself' more applicable. (I know this is easier said than done…)."

Another reader pursuing a professional path said we are lucky to have the freedom to pursue specialized paths. Her bubbie, she said, was denied that opportunity both during and after the Holocaust. While the reader conceded that opening a flower shop might be more enticing than practising law, she said the cost of private Hebrew day school these days is close to $10,000 a year. She said she feels it is her responsibility as a Jew and granddaughter of a survivor to provide these opportunities because she can.

Last, but certainly not least, another reader reminded me of the old saying, "Do what you love and the money will come." He said although it was not easy, he followed this axiom and became a cantor rather than a lawyer. Today, he said, he is both spiritually and financially fulfilled.

Resolving the "career dilemma" is an ongoing process for each of us. We face conflicting pressures and desires. In an excellent line from the film Good Will Hunting, a psychiatrist tells his brilliant patient who is struggling to choose a direction in his life, "You can do anything your heart desires, but what do you want?"

As trite as that may sound, it's a question we need to continue to ask ourselves as we move through the various stages of our lives. I believe the answers come more naturally if we give ourselves permission to make decisions in stages rather one final decision. Our Jewish values will change over time and we should allow ourselves to adapt. If you are struggling, try taking some of the pressure off by just picking a direction for the next few years. Then, when your needs change and when you've gained more valuable life experience, re-evaluate.

Thank you for your contributions this month! I continue to welcome your feedback at jlkovitz@hotmail.com.

Epi on Education

Seymour Epstein

I am often asked how I feel about supplementary schools. Are they worthwhile? Are they not so inferior to day schools that we should abandon the concept? Can they be improved?

First, the term. While these schools have been classified for some time as "supplementary," they were once called Talmudei Torah or Sunday schools. Now, many in our community and elsewhere believe that term is not appropriate to describe what they really are. Some have suggested "Jewish heritage schools" as an alternative.

Next, some history. At mid-century, there were such schools that met five days a week and gave students a comprehensive background in Hebrew, Jewish classical literature, history, and Halachah. The hours diminished over the years, and now the latest threat is to the three-day school. There are even one-day schools that offer a bare minimum of Judaic instruction. Critics maintain the limited time and the separation of general and Jewish studies lead to a curriculum that lacks both critical mass and valid context.

Anyone seeking maximum exposure to Jewish life, both in curriculum and social setting, should choose a day school. But parents who feel strongly about public education and want some level of Jewish education for their children should have schools available to meet their needs.

Toronto is unlike most North American cities in that most of our children who attend Jewish schools are in day schools. But we're similar in that a large percentage of our children receive no Jewish education at all.

Viable outreach to families who have not yet opted for an active Jewish life will primarily be in the form of supplementary schools. I see, therefore, a moral imperative based on concern for all Jews to support and enhance these schools.

At the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education, we see one-day schools as a challenge, but schools with two-day or three-day programs that are either synagogue-based or independent can do much to improve their curriculums so children and parents can reap the maximum benefit. Toronto has several fine examples of schools that strive for excellence despite limitations of time and context.

Jewish heritage schools have an important place in our community as part of a global approach that places Jewish study high on the agenda.

Epi (Seymour Epstein) is the vice-president of Jewish Education at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.
